

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

April 18 and 19, 1877.

(Before COLERIDGE, C.J., BRAMWELL, and BRETT, J.J.A.)

REG. v. MONCK AND ANOTHER (Justices of Berks.) (a)
County rate—Liability of portion of county added to borough—Boundary Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64) —Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) s. 117.

The Municipal Corporations Act provided by sect. 117 that every borough which before the passing of the Boundary Act 1832 was liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate should pay such a proportion of the county rate as would have been chargeable upon the borough if this Act had not passed.

W. was a borough which did not, before the passing of the Boundary Act, contribute to the county rate. A part of a parish which did contribute to that rate was by that Act, and the Municipal Corporation Act, added to the borough for all purposes.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the borough of W. was liable to contribute to the county rate in respect of that portion of the borough which was added by the Boundary and Municipal Corporation Acts.

ERROR by the defendants on an order of the Queen's Bench Division giving judgment for the Crown on a demurrer to a return to a mandamus. The facts which appeared on the rule for the mandamus being made absolute were the same as those in the present case, and will be found reported ante, Vol. X., p. 121.

The mandamus was addressed to two justices of the county of Berks, and commanded them to hear and determine a complaint preferred by the treasurer of the county of Berks against the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor under the circumstances set out in the writ and the return, the material parts of which were as follows:

Prior to the year 1832 the borough of New Windsor consisted of the parish of that name and part of the parish of Clewer, which had never contributed to the county rate. The Boundary Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64) added to the parliamentary borough of New Windsor a part of Clewer, which had previously contributed to the county rate, and this part so added was by the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) made part of the municipal borough of New Windsor.

By sect. 112 of the Municipal Corporations Act, boroughs which have separate courts of quarter sessions are rendered free from all liability to contribute to the county rate otherwise than as in that Act thereafter provided.

By sect. 117 it is enacted that the treasurer of every county shall send a copy of the account of the expenditure for certain purposes therein specified to the council of every borough situate within such county which has a separate court of quarter sessions, "and which before the passing of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64 was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate of such county, and shall make an order on the council of such borough for the payment of such sum as would have been chargeable, if this Act had not passed, upon such borough as the same shall be bounded according to the provisions of this Act."

For several years the treasurer of the borough paid to the county treasurer the proportion charged; but in 1871 the council of the borough denied their liability, and the justices of the county refused to hear a complaint by the treasurer of the county against the treasurer of the borough, whereupon a mandamus commanding them to do so was issued.

The return to the mandamus was made by two of the justices of the county of Berks on behalf of the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor.

It recited the charter of the borough granting a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, and containing a non-intromittant clause; it alleged that no part of the borough did, before the passing of the Boundary Act, contribute to the county rate, that

(a) Reported by W. AFFLETON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI

the part of Clewer which was added by the Boundary and Municipal Corporations Act had become liable to borough rates and general district rates.

The return proceeded to point out the distinction between boroughs with courts of quarter sessions of limited jurisdiction and with charters not containing non-intromittant clauses, and boroughs such as New Windsor, which had never prior to the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act contributed in any way to the county rate, and concluded by denying the liability of the borough under sect. 117 of the Municipal Corporations Act, and by stating that the justices had dismissed the complaint of the county treasurer, and refused to make any order on the council of the borough.

To this return there was a demurrer and joinder.

The Queen's Bench Division, following the decision in the case of Reg. v. New Windsor, reported ante, Vol. X., p. 121, gave judgment for the Crown on the demurrer, and the defendants brought error.

Matthews, Q.C. (with him Bullen) for the appellants.—The contention on behalf the appellants is, that the borough of New Windsor is not liable to contribute to the county rate, because it was not so liable before the passing of the Boundary Act, and that the addition to the borough of part of a parish which had up to that time contributed to the county rate cannot impose on the old borough of New Windsor any liability to contribute to the county rate, inasmuch as the non-intromittant clauses of the charter must now apply to the part so added, and consequently the county justices can have no jurisdiction to levy a rate. The case of Reg. v. Birmingham (10 Q. B. 116) does not govern this case, as the lands and tenements within the area of what afterwards became the borough, did contribute to the county rate, Birmingham being an entirely new borough; it is therefore a decision, on a state of things quite different from those in this case, as the borough of New Windsor is a borough the area of which never contributed to the county rate. The part of the county added to the borough will now be liable to borough rates, and should therefore be relieved from the county rate, if this be not so, the whole borough will contribute, as there is no power to apportion the contribution to the county rate to the new part of the borough thus added. Oave, Q.C. and Greene for the respondent were stopped by the Court.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—We do not think it necessary to hear further argument on behalf of the respondents in this case, and it has been intimated to us that no fresh points have arisen on which the counsel for the appellant wishes to address us. At the commencement of the argument I was of opinion that the construction contended for on behalf of the appellant, the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor, must prevail, and that the judgment of the court below could not be supported. On further consideration, however, I think that my first impression was not correct, and that although there are undoubtedly difficulties in construing the Act of Parliament in the way in which it has been construed by the Queen's Bench Division, still the difficulties in adopting the construction contended for by the appellant are greater. The case comes before us on demurrer to a return to a mandamus which issued, directing two justices of the county of Berks to make an order on the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor, for the payment of the proportion of the sums of money expended out of the county rate for other purposes than the costs arising out of the prosecution, maintenance, conveyance, and transport of offenders committed for trial in the county of Berks, and other than out of coroner's inquests, as would have been chargeable after deducting all sums of money received in aid of the county rate if the Municipal Corporations Act had not passed. The question for our decision arises on the construction of sect. 117 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76. The important words are, "The treasurer of every county shall keep an account of the sums of money expended out of the county rate for other purposes . . . and shall send a copy of the account to the council of every borough in which a separate court of quarter sessions shall be holden, and which, before the passing of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64, was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate of such county, and shall make an order on the council of every such borough for the payment of such proportion of such sum as would have been chargeable if this Act had not passed upon such borough, as the same shall be bounded according to the provisions of this Act." Now, the question is whether these words apply to the borough of New Windsor. This borough is an old borough, and has had from time immemorial a separate court of quarter sessions, and a charter containing a non-intromittant clause. By the Boundary Act a part of the county of Berks was added to the borough for the purposes of Parliamentary elections. It was afterwards enacted by the Municipal Corporations Act that the boundaries of the municipal borough of New Windsor should be co-extensive with those of the Parliamentary borough, so that that part of the county of Berks, which I will for the sake of brevity call Clewer, which had been added to the Parliamentary borough of New Windsor, then became part of the municipal borough for all purposes. Prior to the passing of the Boundary Act it is clear that the borough of New Windsor did not contribute to the county rate, while it is also clear that Clewer did. Now we have to see whether New Windsor was at the time of the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act a borough which was "chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate" before the passing of the Boundary Act. The answer to that depends on the construction to be given to the words "whole or in part." If these words are to be taken as expressing the area of the borough, then New Windsor was a borough part of the area of which was liable to contribute to the county rate as being at that time part of the county of Berks. I do not say that it is quite clear that this is the true

[CT. OF APP.]

REG. v. MONCK AND ANOTHER.

and only true construction, and I admit the force of the arguments which have been adduced in support of the contrary construction. It is said that there were boroughs which did, before the Boundary Act, contribute to the county rate, and that, because their charter did not contain a non-intromittant clause, but it is also clear, I think, that the only reason which prevented the boroughs from being called on to contribute to county rates was that the non-intromittant clause prevented the county justices from levying a rate within a borough where they had no jurisdiction. It was further contended that there were some boroughs where the whole borough, as incorporated and represented by burgesses, was composed of two parts, one part having a non-intromittant clause and the other part not having any such clause, such as is the case in the borough of Leicester, and that therefore there are two classes of boroughs, one class containing such boroughs as New Windsor, to which sect. 117 does not apply, and another containing boroughs such as Leicester, to which the section may be held to apply. It was further urged on behalf of the appellant that, as the whole borough pays the contribution to the rate, the consequence would follow that every borough which had before the Boundary Act been exempt from county rates, and which had been enlarged by that Act, would thereby become liable to pay such portion of the county rate as had previously been assessed upon the area of the newly added portion of the borough. Without doubt these considerations do tell in favour of the appellant, and it does appear that in practice the view thus contended for has prevailed, and that the treasurers of counties have not hitherto availed themselves of that which, according to the principles of the decision of the court below, in this case they have a right to do. Now, in considering whether the construction contended for by the appellant is right, it seems to me, speaking for myself, not unimportant to examine whether that contention harmonizes with or conflicts with the general tenor of the whole of the Act. and for that purpose I refer to sect. 141, which provides for the incorporation of towns and boroughs not yet incorporated, and enables the Crown to extend to the inhabitants of such boroughs the powers and provisions contained in the Act. It is clear that it is contemplated that the power given in this section will be freely used, and it does to my mind weigh against the appellant's contention and in favour of the respondent, that if the view taken by the former be correct that then the provisions of sect. 117 cannot be extended to any new borough, whereas, on the contrary assumption, the case of new boroughs will give rise to no difficulty, as the area which lies within them did contribute to the county rate before the incorporation of the new borough, and so that portion of the new borough will continue to be assessed to the county rate. Reference has been made to the cases of such new boroughs as Birmingham, Manchester, and Brighton, and the case for the respondent is certainly strengthened by the consideration of what would be the effect upon the rateable area of a county, were that portion which has hitherto contributed to the county rate to be entirely withdrawn from contributing, owing to a charter having been granted to a borough. The case of Reg. v. Birmingham (ubi sup.) has decided that this Act can be applied to new boroughs, and that new boroughs do come within the sect. 117, or what is called the other purposes clause, even though the area known as the borough of Birmingham had not contributed to the county rate before the incorporation of the new borough, which included the old nominal borough and the newly added portions of the county of Warwick. Now, if this be so as to the whole it is not easy to see why the same conclusion should not hold good as to part of a borough. If, then, upon the construction of the statute and upon authority the contention of the respondent appears to be good, will anything like injustice follow upon our deciding in favour of the respondent? It seems that the only way in which the exemption of boroughs arose was through the failure of the jurisdiction of the county justices, and through the technical difficulties in the way of levying a rate; if this be so, then there is no reason why, when new legislation is being carried into effect, the exemption should not be removed, and the incidence of the rate be re-adjusted. That many boroughs never contributed at all to the county rate is clear, and the reason for this exemption was that there was no means of effecting a levy; but this reason does not hold good with regard to a portion of a county which has been put into a borough; for then the authority of the county justices is brought in over the borough, as far, at all events, as regards the portion which, previously to its addition to the borough, contributed to the county rate. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed, and that the grammatical construction of the section must be considered with regard to the object of the whole Act, and the practical application of the whole statute, and taking all those considerations together, I think that the section will fairly bear the construction which we are putting upon it. I agree with the remarks made by Lord Blackburn in this case when it came before the Queen's Bench Division on the rule for a mandamus, and for all these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, J.A.—I at first thought that our judgment must be for the appellant, but I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was correct. I am of opinion that it was intended that new boroughs should contribute to that portion of the county rate for which it is sought in this case to make the borough of New Windsor liable. It seems, indeed, reasonable that those who enjoy benefits should share the cost, and it cannot be supposed that when Brighton, to take an example, was incorporated, it was intended that it should be relieved from all contribution to county rates, and that the rest of Sussex should have to make up the deficiency which would be caused by the withdrawal of so valuable a rateable property as the town of Brighton from the county, although the inhabitants would still enjoy the benefit of the county bridges and other things supported by the county rates. Sect. 117 in my opinion applies to new boroughs and to new places added to old boroughs, and I think that the words of the section bear out this view. If the words of the Act mean that accounts are to be sent and orders are to be made upon every borough which at the time of the passing of the Boundary Act was liable, then, of course, the appellant is entitled to succeed, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division must be reversed; but if they mean, as they certainly may, and, as I think, do, to every borough which is a borough liable to contribute at the time of the sending the notice and making the order, then New Windsor is liable, and our judgment must be for the respondent. If that be so, then New Windsor is a borough which at the time of the copy of the account being sent and the order being made, has as part of its area a district which did, at the time of the passing of the Boundary Act, contribute to the county rate. The old borough which never contributed, does not now contribute, and the exemption which has always existed remains; but the new part of the borough does not by being incorporated with the borough gain an exemption which it never had before. If we are asked to consider the consequences of our decision, and cases are put such as that of Godmanchester and Huntingdon, where by incorporation Huntingdon, which was wholly exempt, became liable to pay half the rates of Godmanchester, we can but say that the Legislature must have thought either that such details come within the rule of de minimis, or that the same reasoning applied as was held to apply in the case of the rating of mines. For it is admitted that this injustice or hardship has been imposed on certain boroughs such as Leicester, and therefore the Legislature must have either overlooked the hardship involved or disregarded it. I think that the statute rightly bears the meaning which was given to it in the court below, and that our judgment should affirm that of the Queen's Bench Division.

BLAKE v. BEECH.

BRETT, J.A.—With regard to the argument of injustice, I hold that where a statute is capable of two constructions, one of which leads to manifest injustice, and the other in no way tends to injustice, then it is probably right to assume that the Legislature intended the second construction; but where one construction leads to injustice being inflicted on one class, and the other construction would inflict injustice on another class, the argument of injustice falls to the ground; and, further, if the alleged injustice is so far from manifest that it requires elaboration to make it plain, then it can hardly be assumed to have been so present to the mind of the Legislature as to enable any contention as to their intention to be founded upon it. Nor in this case does there seem to me to be injustice; there would be injustice to the county were the borough to escape from paying contribution; but that a part of the borough which was formerly liable to county rates should continue to be so liable, does not savour of injustice, and this view is confirmed by the history of the case, and by the remarks of Lord Blackburn as to the origin of the exemption, and the technical difficulties which led to its continuance. Injustice to the counties would in the case of the new boroughs, such as Brighton, result from our deciding the other way, for the borough would have the use of county property for nothing, when they probably contribute to the causes of expenditure almost as much as does all the rest of the county taken together. The ordinary rules of construction must be applied to sect. 117, the section on which our decision must turn, and so construing it, I am of opinion that there is really only one borough mentioned in it, and not two boroughs, as contended by the appellant. There was once an old borough of New Windsor, and there is the present existing borough as added to by the Boundary Act, including the Clewer district, added under the Parliamentary Reform Act and the Municipal Corporations Act, and this is the borough with which sect. 117 deals, and with it alone. The words "every borough" mean every borough now existing, "and which" refers to every borough now existing, that is the area which is within the ambit of the now existing borough; if this be so, then there is only one borough referred to in this section, and the section applies to all boroughs to which additions have been made by the Boundary Act. The case of Reg. v. Birmingham (ubi sup.) was decided on that ground, and the Queen's Bench Division followed that decision. I am of opinion that both decisions are right, that no injustice is done, and that by affirming this judgment, we do not transgress any rule of construction, but that we are following out the plain grammatical meaning of the statute, and giving effect to the words and the intention of the Act of Parliament.

BLAKE v. BEECH. (a)

Practice—Appeal—Conviction for keeping gaming house—Criminal matter—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act 1873, s. 47.

A conviction before justices under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3, for keeping a gaming house, is a "criminal cause or matter" within sect. 47 of the Judicature Act 1873, and the Court of Appeal has therefore no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a judgment on a case stated by justices of the High Court quashing the conviction.

APPEAL from a decision of the Divisional Court of Appeal from inferior courts.

Robert Blake was convicted before borough justices, at Bolton, for keeping a gaming house contrary to the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3.

A case for the opinion of the Divisional Court of Appeal was however stated by the justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The Divisional Court of Appeal quashed the conviction on the ground that no information was laid against and no summons issued to the defendant. Special leave to appeal was given to the respondent in the Divisional Court of Appeal under sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873.

The case in the court below will be found fully reported ante, Vol. X., p. 219.

Arbutnot, for the appellant (respondent below.)

—It will be contended that this is a "criminal cause or matter" within sect. 47 of the Judicature Act 1873, and that the court therefore has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. A conviction under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, is not a "criminal cause or matter." The court heard an appeal in Howes v. Peake (35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 584; L. Rep. 1, Ex. Div. 385; 46 L. J. 15, M. C.), and there the appellant was fined for keeping a refreshment house without a licence. The cases of Reg. v. Steel (35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 534; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 37; 46 L. J. 1, M. C.), and Reg. v. Fletcher (35 L. T.

[Q.B. Div.]

Reg. N.S. 538; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 43; 46 L. J. 4, M. C.), differ from this case. There there was no case stated or leave given to appeal. Sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873, says that "all appeals" from inferior courts is to go to the Divisional Court, and that the determination of such appeal by the Divisional Court shall be final, unless special leave to appeal is given to appeal to the Court of Appeal. Reading sects. 45 and 47 together it appears that all appeals, whether on a criminal matter or otherwise, may be taken from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal if special leave be given. In other words, sect. 47 does not apply to cases which have come before the Divisional Court, and as to which special leave to appeal has been given. [BARR, J.A.—If the case is clearly a criminal matter, and the Divisional Court gives leave to appeal, do you say an appeal would lie then?] It is submitted that it would if the case is within sect. 45. [BRAMWELL, J.A.—Sect. 45 provides the mode of appeal in cases in which there may be an appeal; sect. 47 states the cases in which no appeal shall lie.]

Baylis, Q.C. and Wheeler, for the respondents, were not called on to argue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It appears to me that we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal, because the subject matter of it is a criminal matter, and within the case of Reg. v. Steel (sup.), a decision in which I entirely concur.

BRAMWELL and BRETT, JJ.A., concurred.

TASSELL (app.) v. OVENDEN (resp.) (a)

Licensed premises—Grocer's shop—Closing time—Open for sale of liquors—37 & 38 Vict., c. 43, s. 9.

The appellant, who was licensed to sell by retail intoxicating liquors to be consumed off his premises, was convicted by justices under sect. 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, of keeping open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours.

The appellant's premises consisted of a shop for the sale of drapery and grocery, and during the prohibited hours the wines and spirits were all locked up in a large wooden case, upon which was a printed notice that in accordance with the Licensing Act wines and spirits could not be supplied after 10 o'clock at night.

Held, upon a case stated that when licensed premises were open under such circumstances, the magistrates should satisfy themselves that they were so open for the purpose of sale of intoxicating liquors before they convicted the owner; and that as the appellant had no such intention, the conviction must be quashed.

This was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the County of Kent, under the Statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

1. At a petty sessions holden at the Sessions House, Week-street, Maidstone, in the County of Kent, in and for the East Division of the Lathe of Aylesford, in the said County of Kent, on Monday the 5th March 1877, an information and complaint preferred by David Ovenden, a superintendent in the County of Kent constabulary (hereinafter called the respondent), against John Tassell of the Parish of Headcorn, in the said County of Kent, grocer, draper, and licensed dealer in wines and spirits (hereinafter called the appellant) under sects. 3 & 9 of the Act 37 & 38 Vict., c. 43, charging for that "he the said John Tassell, on Saturday, the 24th Feb. 1877, at the parish of Headcorn in the said county during a certain time, to wit, at twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock in the afternoon of the said 24th Feb., at which time premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail situate elsewhere than in the Metropolitan District or the Metropolitan Police District, or a town or populous place, as severally defined by the Licensing Act 1874, are directed to be closed by and in pursuance of the said Act, unlawfully did keep open certain premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail situate at Headcorn aforesaid, and being elsewhere than in the said Metropolitan District or the said Metropolitan Police District, or in such town or populous place as aforesaid, for the sale of intoxicating liquors, to wit, wines and spirits contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present; and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and the justices adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 1l., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 10s. for his costs in this behalf.

2. The appellant being dissatisfied with this determination upon the hearing of the said information and complaint, as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute, 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43, duly applied to the said justices in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination as aforesaid, for the opinion of this court, and he duly entered into a recognizance as required by the statute in that behalf.

3. The said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, and by consent of the said parties, stated and signed the following case.

4. Upon the hearing of the information and complaint, it was proved, or admitted as facts, that the appellant has, and occupies, a shop in Headcorn aforesaid, where he sells drapery, grocery, and wines and spirits, not to be consumed on such premises.

5. On the day named in the information and complaint a police constable, at twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock at night, found the appellant's shop open in the usual way of his trade; he went in and told appellant his shop ought to be closed at ten o'clock at night. The appellant drew the police constable's attention to a large wooden case that was standing in the shop, and to a printed notice that was hanging on the case. The constable observed that the front of the case was closed with interlaced shutters, and at the end of the last shutter there was a lock. The appellant told the constable that the case was locked, and took hold of the shutters to show they were properly secured by the lock; he also produced a key but did not try the lock with it. The wooden case above mentioned was 8ft. by 5ft., and capable of holding thirty dozen of bottles; it stood close to the entrance of the shop before the ordinary counter, and any person entering the shop could immediately see the contents when the shutters were not up, but when up the contents could not be seen. The notice hanging on the case was as follows (copy notice): "Notice.—Customers are informed that in accordance with the new Licensing Act, Messrs. W. and A. Gilbey's wines and spirits cannot be supplied in this shop after ten o'clock at night." And there was a similar notice placed in the shop window.

6. There was no proof of any sale or exposure of intoxicating liquors at the time in question, not that liquors were kept in any other place in the shop other than in the said wooden case.

7. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had not committed any offence against sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, under which the information was laid; generally that the shop was kept open for the sale of grocery and drapery, which the appellant was entitled to do, notwithstanding the sections of the Act before referred to, which require him to close at ten o'clock, provided there was a bona fide intention on his part not to sell intoxicating liquors after that hour, and that he had done as much as he could to show that such was his intention. The justices, however, were of opinion that the sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, were exceptional, and it was imperative that the appellant should close his licensed premises at ten o'clock at night.

8. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information and complaint is to be dismissed.

Tickell argued for the appellant.—The sections which relate to this matter are the 3rd and 9th of the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49). By the 3rd section: "All premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail shall be closed as follows (that is to say): . . . (3) If situate elsewhere than in the metropolitan district or the metropolitan police district, or such town or populous place as aforesaid," from ten at night to six in the morning. And by sect. 9: "Any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in such premises, shall for the first offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds, and for any subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds." In this case there is not only no evidence to support a conviction under these sections, but the evidence distinctly contradicts any intention to break the law. The case of Brigden v. Heighes (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 330; 34 L. T. Rep. 242) is, moreover, an authority against this conviction.

Biron, for the respondent.—Sect. 3 directs all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail to be closed during certain hours, and does not authorise the closing to be limited to a box containing the liquors; and the penalty is imposed by sect. 9 on a person who opens, or keeps open such premises during those hours. [FIELD, J.—The premises must be kept open for sale of intoxicating liquors to expose the licensed person to a penalty.] That is not the necessary construction of the clause; the words "for the sale of intoxicating liquors" may be taken as mere description of the premises. It is not necessary, therefore, to show any selling during prohibited hours to make the open premises an offence. As to the case of Brigden v. Heighes, the state of facts was different from this, and the ground of that decision does not apply here. There the appellant had two separate shops, and at ten o'clock shutters were put up between them, so that the grocer's shop was left in darkness. Mellor, J. said in his judgment, "the only fact they have proved is that the draper's shop was open when the other shop was closed, although from the circumstances which they state they seem to think it possible that the separation was hardly a sufficient inclosure. That may be, but when such a case arises they must furnish some evidence to show that the separation is not one in reality. There is nothing of the kind in this case. I do not think that the fact that the two shops are the same premises in the sense that they are under the same roof at all affects the case. The access of one shop to the other being closed at night, and this being shown to have been the case here, I do not see anything to prevent a draper carrying on the business of a grocer, provided that the premises upon which the sale of liquor takes place are sufficiently divided from those in which no liquor is sold at all." Here there is no division at all; the grocer's shop which was open during prohibited hours being the actual premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors. [MELLOR, J.—Mr. Manisty, as counsel for the appellant in that case, seems to concede your interpretation of the statute.] That case certainly does not govern this.

Tickell in reply.—Brigden v. Heighes decided that the keeping premises open for the purpose of sale is the gist of the offence. [FIELD, J.—No. That point was not present to my mind. MELLOR, J.—Sect. 3 is an absolute prohibition to the opening of licensed premises at all during these hours, and although sect. 9 may give rise to doubt, the two must be taken together.] If the respondent's construction of sect. 9 be right, everybody visiting the premises for the purpose of buying groceries after ten o'clock might be convicted under sect. 25 of the Licensing Act 1872. [FIELD, J.—That seems to be so.]

MELLOR, J.—We need not trouble Mr. Tickell any further. These matters may be difficult of proof, but our conclusion of the effect of sect. 9 is not merely that the doors of licensed premises must all be closed at the time fixed. Magistrates must consider whether the precautions taken are sufficient; and if the premises are open, they must further consider whether they are opened or kept open for the purpose of sale of intoxicating liquors. I glean from the statements in this case that the justices concluded the appellant to be acting in good faith, and although the premises were open, they considered he had no intention to sell liquors during prohibited hours. I am fortified in this construction of the offence created by sect. 9 by the effect which the other construction would give to sect. 25 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94. By that section any person found upon licensed premises during prohibited hours may be convicted "unless he satisfies the court that he was an inmate, servant, or a lodger on such premises, or a bond fide traveller, or that otherwise his presence on such premises was not in contravention of the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of licensed premises." These two Acts are to be read as one. Taking these sections together, I think it safer to hold that magistrates must be satisfied that premises are open for the purpose of sale before they are justified in convicting under such circumstances as these. I agree with Mr. Biron that Brigden v. Heighes was decided on the ground that the grocer's shop was bond fide closed at ten o'clock, but the point upon which this case must turn was not present to our minds. We thought there was no evidence that the premises were open within the meaning of the Act, and although we are represented to have concurred with Mr. Manisty's arguments, we did not consider whether premises open with no purpose of sale came within the offences created by the 9th section of the Act of 1874. This conviction will, therefore, be quashed.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I quite agree that we are not bound in this case by the authority of Brigden v. Heighes. Here the appellant kept his licensed premises open during prohibited hours, but the magistrates seem to have found his intention was bond fide not to sell or expose for sale any intoxicating liquors, or to open or keep open his premises for the purpose of selling such liquors after the hour of closing. The magistrates seem to have been of opinion that notwithstanding these findings the law was too strong for them, but I think not. Under the circumstances they should not have convicted.

WOMBWELL v. CORPORATION OF BARNSELY. (a)

Arbitration under Lands Clauses Act—Taxation of costs—Agreement between parties—8 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 38—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 18, s. 1).

The Corporation of Barnsley demanded of a neighbouring landowner a statement of his interest in certain lands required for the disposal of sewage under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and in answer a claim was made for compensation, and notice given to settle by arbitration. Arbitrators and umpire were duly appointed, but before award the parties agreed in writing that the corporation should have immediate possession of the lands required upon certain terms as to payment of interest; the corporation were to pay all costs incidental to the agreement, arbitration, and conveyance of the land as between solicitor and client, and the time for making the award might be extended. Upon delivery of the bill of costs after the award, the

Held, that the parties had contracted themselves out of the application of that Act, and that the costs might be taxed in Chancery under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 38.

THIS was a motion for a rule for mandamus on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Barnsley, calling upon Master Manley Smith to tax the costs incurred by Col. Adolphus Ulick Wombwell in respect of an arbitration concerning the value of some lands obtained by the corporation from Col. Wombwell under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts.

The following agreement sets out the circumstances of the arbitration until the 15th Feb. 1876, the date thereof:

An agreement made and entered into this 15th Feb. 1876, between Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, of Thorporch Hall, near Tadcaster, in the county of York, Esq., late Lieut.-Col. of the 12th Regiment of Lancers, of the one part, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Barnsley, in the county of York, of the other part. Whereas by a notice in writing dated the 27th Oct. 1875, under the hand of William Harrison Peacock, the town clerk of the said borough, for and on behalf of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting as the Urban sanitary authority within the district of the said borough, the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses demanded from the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell a statement in writing of the particulars of his estate and interest in certain lands therein mentioned and thereby required for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the said borough of Barnsley by way of irrigation upon the surface of and of filtration through the said lands, and also of the claims made or the amount of compensation demanded by the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell in respect thereof. And whereas by a notice in writing dated the 29th Oct. 1875, under the hand of Charles Newman, of Barnsley aforesaid, gentleman, as agent for and on behalf of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, addressed to the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, it was stated that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell claimed an estate for life in the said lands, and further that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, on behalf of himself and the other parties entitled and capable of making a conveyance of the fee simple in possession of the lands specified in the said notice, claimed the sum of 80,000*l.* for the purchase of the said lands specified in the said notice (excepting all minerals lying within and under the same) as required for the purpose aforesaid, and for compensation for the damage that might be sustained by the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell and the said other parties competent to convey as aforesaid by reason of the execution of the works for which the said lands and premises were so required as aforesaid, or of the exercise as regards such lands and premises of the powers vested in the said urban sanitary authority as in the said first recited notice is mentioned. And notice was further given to the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses that unless they agreed to pay the sum of money thereinbefore claimed it was the desire of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, and he thereby elected that the amount to be paid in respect of the said claims should be settled by arbitration in the manner prescribed in "the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845;" and that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell had by writing under his hand bearing even date with the notice now in recital nominated and appointed Samuel Dickinson Martin, of Leeds, in the county of York, to be the arbitrator on behalf of himself and the said other parties in the matters aforesaid, and did thereby request the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses to nominate and appoint some person to act as arbitrator on their behalf in the said matters.

And whereas, by writing dated the 29th Oct. 1875, under the hand of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, he, the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, in pursuance of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, nominated and appointed the said Samuel Dickinson Martin to be the arbitrator on his behalf of and the last shutter there was a lock. The appellant told the constable that the case was locked, and took hold of the shutters to show they were properly secured by the lock; he also produced a key but did not try the lock with it. The wooden case above mentioned was 8ft. by 5ft., and capable of holding thirty dozen of bottles; it stood close to the entrance of the shop before the ordinary counter, and any person entering the shop could immediately see the contents when the shutters were not up, but when up the contents could not be seen. The notice hanging on the case was as follows (copy notice): "Notice.—Customers are informed that in accordance with the new Licensing Act, Messrs. W. and A. Gilbey's wines and spirits cannot be supplied in this shop after ten o'clock at night." And there was a similar notice placed in the shop window.

6. There was no proof of any sale or exposure of intoxicating liquors at the time in question, not that liquors were kept in any other place in the shop other than in the said wooden case.

7. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had not committed any offence against sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, under which the information was laid; generally that the shop was kept open for the sale of grocery and drapery, which the appellant was entitled to do, notwithstanding the sections of the Act before referred to, which require him to close at ten o'clock, provided there was a bond fide intention on his part not to sell intoxicating liquors after that hour, and that he had done as much as he could to show that such was his intention. The justices, however, were of opinion that the sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, were exceptional, and it was imperative that the appellant should close his licensed premises at ten o'clock at night.

8. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information and complaint is to be dismissed.

Tickell argued for the appellant.—The sections which relate to this matter are the 3rd and 9th of the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49). By the 3rd section: "All premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail shall be closed as follows (that is to say): . . . (3) If situate elsewhere than in the metropolitan district or the metropolitan police district, or such town or populous place as aforesaid," from ten at night to six in the morning. And by sect. 9: "Any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in such premises, shall for the first offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds, and for any subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds." In this case there is not only no evidence to support a conviction under these sections, but the evidence distinctly contradicts any intention to break the law. The case of Brigden v. Heighes (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 330; 34 L. T. Rep. 242) is, moreover, an authority against this conviction.

Biron, for the respondent.—Sect. 8 directs all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail to be closed during certain hours, and does not authorise the closing to be limited to a box containing the liquors; and the penalty is imposed by sect. 9 on a person who opens, or keeps open such premises during those hours. [FIELD, J.—The premises must be kept open for sale of intoxicating liquors to expose the licensed person to a penalty.] That is not the necessary construction of the clause; the words "for the sale of intoxicating liquors" may be taken as mere description of the premises. It is not necessary, therefore, to show any selling during prohibited hours to make the open premises an offence. As to the case of Brigden v. Heighes, the state of facts was different from this, and the ground of that decision does not apply here. There the appellant had two separate shops, and at ten o'clock shutters were put up between them, so that the grocer's shop was left in darkness. Mellor, J. said in his judgment, "the only fact they have proved is that the draper's shop was open when the other shop was closed, although from the circumstances which they state they seem to think it possible that the separation was hardly a sufficient inclosure. That may be, but when such a case arises they must furnish some evidence to show that the separation is not one in reality. There is nothing of the kind in this case. I do not think that the fact that the two shops are the same premises in the sense that they are under the same roof at all affects the case. The access of one shop to the other being closed at night, and this being shown to have been the case here, I do not see anything to prevent a draper carrying on the business of a grocer, provided that the premises upon which the sale of liquor takes place are sufficiently divided from those in which no liquor is sold at all." Here there is no division at all; the grocer's shop which was open during prohibited hours being the actual premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors. [MELLOR, J.—Mr. Manisty, as counsel for the appellant in that case, seems to concede your interpretation of the statute.] That case certainly does not govern this.

MELLOR, J.—We need not trouble Mr. T. any further. These matters may be difficult to prove, but our conclusion of the effect of the Act is not merely that the doors of licensed premises must all be closed at the time fixed; we must consider whether the premises are sufficiently separated to be kept open for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors. I glean from the case that the justices were acting in good faith, and were open, they c

the last shutter there was a lock. The appellant told the constable that the case was locked, and took hold of the shutters to show they were properly secured by the lock; he also produced a key but did not try the lock with it. The wooden case above mentioned was 8ft. by 5ft., and capable of holding thirty dozen of bottles; it stood close to the entrance of the shop before the ordinary counter, and any person entering the shop could immediately see the contents when the shutters were not up, but when up the contents could not be seen. The notice hanging on the case was as follows (copy notice): "Notice.—Customers are informed that in accordance with the new Licensing Act, Messrs. W. and A. Gilbey's wines and spirits cannot be supplied in this shop after ten o'clock at night." And there was a similar notice placed in the shop window.

6. There was no proof of any sale or exposure of intoxicating liquors at the time in question, not that liquors were kept in any other place in the shop other than in the said wooden case.

7. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had not committed any offence against sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, under which the information was laid; generally that the shop was kept open for the sale of grocery and drapery, which the appellant was entitled to do, notwithstanding the sections of the Act before referred to, which require him to close at ten o'clock, provided there was a bona fide intention on his part not to sell intoxicating liquors after that hour, and that he had done as much as he could to show that such was his intention. The justices, however, were of opinion that the sects. 3 and 9 of the Licensing Act 1874, were exceptional, and it was imperative that the appellant should close his licensed premises at ten o'clock at night.

8. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information and complaint is to be dismissed.

Tickell argued for the appellant.—The sections which relate to this matter are the 3rd and 9th of the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 40). By the 3rd section: "All premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail shall be closed as follows (that is to say): . . . (3) If situate elsewhere than in the metropolitan district or the metropolitan police district, or such town or populous place as aforesaid," from ten at night to six in the morning. And by sect. 9: "Any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in such premises, shall for the first offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds, and for any subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds." In this case there is not only no evidence to support a conviction under these sections, but the evidence distinctly contradicts any intention to break the law. The case of Brigden v. Heighes (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 330; 34 L. T. Rep. 242) is, moreover, an authority against this conviction.

Biron, for the respondent.—Sect. 8 directs all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail to be closed during certain hours, and does not authorise the closing to be limited to a box containing the liquors; and the penalty is imposed by sect. 9 on a person who opens, or keeps open such premises during those hours. [FIELD, J.—The premises must be kept open for sale of intoxicating liquors to expose the licensed person to a penalty.] That is not the necessary construction of the clause; the words "for the sale of intoxicating liquors" may be taken as mere description of the premises. It is not necessary, therefore, to show any selling during prohibited hours to make the open premises an offence. As to the case of Brigden v. Heighes, the state of facts was different from this, and the ground of that decision does not apply here. There the appellant had two separate shops, and at ten o'clock shutters were put up between them, so that the grocer's shop was left in darkness. Mellor, J. said in his judgment, "the only fact they have proved is that the draper's shop was open when the other shop was closed, although from the circumstances which they state they seem to think it possible that the separation was hardly a sufficient inclosure. That may be, but when such a case arises they must furnish some evidence to show that the separation is not one in reality. There is nothing of the kind in this case. I do not think that the fact that the two shops are the same premises in the sense that they are under the same roof at all affects the case. The access of one shop to the other being closed at night, and this being shown to have been the case here, I do not see anything to prevent a draper carrying on the business of a grocer, provided that the premises upon which the sale of liquor takes place are sufficiently divided from those in which no liquor is sold at all." Here there is no division at all; the grocer's shop which was open during prohibited hours being the actual premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors. [MELLOR, J.—Mr. Manisty, as counsel for the appellant in that case, seems to concede your interpretation of the statute.] That case certainly does not govern this.

MELLOR, J.—We need not trouble Mr. Tickell any further. These matters may be difficult of proof, but our conclusion of the effect of sect. 9 is not merely that the doors of licensed premises must all be closed at the time fixed. Magistrates must consider whether the precautions taken are sufficient; and if the premises are open, they must further consider whether they are opened or kept open for the purpose of sale of intoxicating liquors. I glean from the statements in this case that the justices concluded the appellant to be acting in good faith, and although the premises were open, they considered he had no intention to sell liquors during prohibited hours. I am fortified in this construction of the offence created by sect. 9 by the effect which the other construction would give to sect. 25 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94. By that section any person found upon licensed premises during prohibited hours may be convicted "unless he satisfies the court that he was an inmate, servant, or a lodger on such premises, or a bond fide traveller, or that otherwise his presence on such premises was not in contravention of the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of licensed premises." These two Acts are to be read as one. Taking these sections together, I think it safer to hold that magistrates must be satisfied that premises are open for the purpose of sale before they are justified in convicting under such circumstances as these. I agree with Mr. Biron that Brigden v. Heighes was decided on the ground that the grocer's shop was bond fide closed at ten o'clock, but the point upon which this case must turn was not present to our minds. We thought there was no evidence that the premises were open within the meaning of the Act, and although we are represented to have concurred with Mr. Manisty's arguments, we did not consider whether premises open with no purpose of sale came within the offences created by the 9th section of the Act of 1874. This conviction will, therefore, be quashed.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I quite agree that we are not bound in this case by the authority of Brigden v. Heighes. Here the appellant kept his licensed premises open during prohibited hours, but the magistrates seem to have found his intention was bond fide not to sell or expose for sale any intoxicating liquors, or to open or keep open his premises for the purpose of selling such liquors after the hour of closing. The magistrates seem to have been of opinion that notwithstanding these findings the law was too strong for them, but I think not. Under the circumstances they should not have convicted.

WOMBWELL v. CORPORATION OF BARNSLEY. (a)

Arbitration under Lands Clauses Act—Taxation of costs—Agreement between parties—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 38—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 18, s. 1).

The Corporation of Barnsley demanded of a neighbouring landowner a statement of his interest in certain lands required for the disposal of sewage under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and in answer a claim was made for compensation, and notice given to settle by arbitration. Arbitrators and umpire were duly appointed, but before award the parties agreed in writing that the corporation should have immediate possession of the lands required upon certain terms as to payment of interest; the corporation were to pay all costs incidental to the agreement, arbitration, and conveyance of the land as between solicitor and client, and the time for making the award might be extended. Upon delivery of the bill of costs after the award, the corporation applied to have taxation, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869, by a master.

Held, that the parties had contracted themselves out of the application of that Act, and that the costs might be taxed in Chancery under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 38.

THIS was a motion for a rule for mandamus on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Barnsley, calling upon Master Manley Smith to tax the costs incurred by Col. Adolphus Ulick Wombwell in respect of an arbitration concerning the value of some lands obtained by the corporation from Col. Wombwell under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts.

The following agreement sets out the circumstances of the arbitration until the 15th Feb. 1876, the date thereof:

An agreement made and entered into this 15th Feb. 1876, between Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, of Thorparch Hall, near Tadcaster, in the county of York, Esq., late Lieut.-Col. of the 12th Regiment of Lancers, of the one part, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Barnsley, in the county of York, of the other part. Whereas by a notice in writing dated the 27th Oct. 1875, under the hand of William Harrison Peacock, the town clerk of the said borough, for and on behalf of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting as the Urban sanitary authority within the district of the said borough, the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses demanded from the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell a statement in writing of the particulars of his estate and interest in certain lands therein mentioned and thereby required for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the said borough of Barnsley by way of irrigation upon the surface of and of filtration through the said lands, and also of the claims made or the amount of compensation demanded by the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell in respect thereof. And whereas by a notice in writing dated the 29th Oct. 1875, under the hand of Charles Newman, of Barnsley aforesaid, gentleman, as agent for and on behalf of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, addressed to the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, it was stated that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell claimed an estate for life in the said lands, and further that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, on behalf of himself and the other parties entitled and capable of making a conveyance of the fee simple in possession of the lands specified in the said notice, claimed the sum of 30,000*l.* for the purchase of the said lands specified in the said notice (excepting all minerals lying within and under the same) as required for the purpose aforesaid, and for compensation for the damage that might be sustained by the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell and the said other parties competent to convey as aforesaid by reason of the execution of the works for which the said lands and premises were so required as aforesaid, or of the exercise as regards such lands and premises of the powers vested in the said urban sanitary authority as in the said first recited notice is mentioned. And notice was further given to the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses that unless they agreed to pay the sum of money thereinbefore claimed it was the desire of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, and he thereby elected that the amount to be paid in respect of the said claims should be settled by arbitration in the manner prescribed in "the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845;" and that the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell had by writing under his hand bearing even date with the notice now in recital nominated and appointed Samuel Dickinson Martin, of Leeds, in the county of York, to be the arbitrator on behalf of himself and the said other parties in the matters aforesaid, and did thereby request the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses to nominate and appoint some person to act as arbitrator on their behalf in the said matters.

And whereas, by writing dated the 29th Oct. 1875, under the hand of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, he, the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, in pursuance of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, nominated and appointed the said Samuel Dickinson Martin to be the arbitrator on his behalf of and concerning the premises. And whereas by writing dated the 23rd Nov. 1875, under the hand of the said William Harrison Peacock, the town clerk of the said borough of Barnsley, and the clerk to the said urban sanitary authority, and also under the corporate common seal of the said borough, the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, acting as such urban sanitary authority as aforesaid, nominated and appointed Edward Lancaster, of Barnsley, aforesaid, land agent, to be the arbitrator on the part of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses for the purposes of the said arbitration. And whereas the said Samuel Dickinson Martin and Edward Lancaster did by writing under their hands dated the 6th Jan. 1876, before entering upon their said arbitration, nominate and appoint Thomas Barham Foster, of Manchester, civil engineer, to be their umpire. And whereas the said arbitrators and umpire have not yet made their award in the said matters, and the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses are desirous of obtaining immediate possession of the said lands and tenements. Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed as follows:—

1. The said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall be forthwith let into possession of the said lands and premises comprised in the first hereinbefore recited notice, subject to their arranging with the tenants or tenant thereof.

2. The said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall, in addition to the amount to be settled by arbitration as the sum to be paid for the said lands and premises, and compensation as aforesaid, pay interest on such sum until the same shall be fully paid at the rate of 5l. per centum per annum from the time of taking possession of the same premises or any part thereof.

3. The said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall pay to the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell the price and interest as aforesaid, irrespective of any sum which they the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses may be liable to pay to the tenants or tenant as compensation for the value of their or his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for the damage done to them or him in their or his tenancy of the said lands and premises as aforesaid, they, the said tenants, being tenants from year to year.

4. The said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall pay all and every the costs and expenses of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell of and incidental to this agreement and the said reference and arbitration, and to the conveyance of the said lands and premises, including valuers' and surveyors' charges and solicitors' charges as between solicitor and client.

5. The said arbitrators shall have power, and they are hereby authorized, to extend the time for hearing evidence and making their award herein until the 23rd of May next, before the said arbitration shall devolve upon the said umpire, anything in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding. As witness the hand of the said Adolphus Ulick Wombwell, and the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Barnsley, have hereunto affixed their common seal the day and year first above written.

Sealed with the corporate common seal of the borough of Barnsley, in the presence of
JOSEPH BRADLEY,
Clerk to Mr. Peacock,
Solicitor,
Barnsley.

RICHARD CARTER,
Mayor,
[Seal.]

To this agreement were appended three memoranda, dated respectively the 17th April, the 9th May, and the 13th June, 1876, by which the time for the award was extended to the 1st Sept. 1876.

On the 9th Aug. 1876, the umpire duly made his award, reciting the facts mentioned in the said agreement, but not referring in any way to the agreement itself, and also reciting that on the 15th July 1876, it was mutually agreed that certain additional lands should be purchased and taken by the corporation from Col. Wombwell at an amount to be settled by the umpire. He proceeded to award the sum of 19,585l. 3s. to be paid under the notice to treat, and the sum of 448l. 14s. to be paid under the agreement for purchase of additional lands, amounting in all to 20,033l. 17s. to be paid by the corporation to Col. Wombwell.

A bill of the costs incurred by Col. Wombwell was delivered to the Corporation of Barnsley, whose solicitors applied by summons at chambers to have the said bill taxed in accordance with sect. 1 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 18). It is enacted by that section that "Where in England, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, or any Act incorporating the same, any question of disputed compensation is determined by arbitration, the costs of and incidental to the arbitration and award shall, if either party so requires, be taxed and settled as between the parties by any one of the taxing masters of the Superior Courts of law, and such fees may be taken in respect of the taxation as may be fixed in pursuance of the enactments relating to the fees to be demanded and taken in the offices of such masters, and all those enactments, including the enactments relating to the taking of fees by means of stamps, shall extend to the fees in respect of the said taxation."

Master Manley Smith, upon the hearing of this summons, was of opinion that he ought to proceed to tax under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; that the agreement of the 15th Feb. 1876, was collateral to the arbitration, and though it might affect the scale of allowance, it ought not to prevent taxation. By consent of the parties, however, he adjourned the matter in order that the corporation might move the court for this rule, Col. Wombwell undertaking to show cause against it in the first instance.

Charles, Q.C. (with him Jeune) accordingly now moved on behalf of the Corporation of Barnsley.—The 4th clause of the agreement of the 15th Feb. 1876, which it is contended on the other side ousts the jurisdiction of a master of this court, merely provides a scale of taxation by which the master may be guided. Bramwell, B. said in Eccles v. Mayor, &c., of Blackburn (30 L. J. 358, Ex., at p. 370), "The master cannot tax costs as between party and party on two different scales, unless there is some agreement between the parties to enable him to do so." Here there is nothing to prevent the master from taxing according to the terms of the agreement. The objection to this taxation is founded on the case of Doulton v. Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 533), but there was in that case an express provision that the costs, charges, and expenses should, "in case of difference, be from time to time settled by the arbitrator;" and, accordingly, it was held by Lush, J. that this was not a case within the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and, therefore, the provision as to taxation of costs in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869, did not apply.

A. Wills, Q.C. (with him W. G. Harrison, Q.C. and Bowen), showed cause in the first instance on behalf of Colonel Wombwell.—According to the agreement the 4th clause indemnifies Colonel Wombwell from "all and every the costs and expenses of and incidental to this agreement, and the said reference and arbitration, and to the conveyance of the said lands and premises, including valuers' and surveyors' charges, and solicitors' charges as between solicitor and client." It would be impossible to tax under the Lands Clauses

Consolidation Act 1869, the charges in respect of the agreement of the 15th Feb. 1876, or those in respect of the conveyance of the lands and premises. One taxation, however, of the whole costs would be sufficient under sect. 38 of the Attorneys and Solicitors' Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), by which it is enacted, "That where any person, not the party chargeable with any such bill within the meaning of the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall be liable to pay, or shall have paid such bill either to the attorney or solicitor, his executor, administrator, or assignee, or to the party chargeable with such bill as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such person, his executor, administrator, or assignee, to make such application for a reference for the taxation and settlement of such bill as the party chargeable therewith might himself make, and the same reference and order shall be made thereupon, and the same course pursued in all respects as if such application was made by the party so chargeable with such bill as aforesaid." By the previous sect. 37, it is provided, amongst other things, that "upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month, it shall be lawful, in case the business contained in such bill or any part thereof, shall have been transacted in the High Court of Chancery, or in any other Court of Equity, or in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, or in case no part of such business shall have been transacted in any court of law or equity, for the Lord High Chancellor or Master of the Rolls." . . . "and they are hereby respectively required to refer such bill, and the demand of such attorney or solicitor, executor, or administrator, or assignee, thereupon to be taxed and settled by the proper officer of the court in which such reference shall be made without any money being brought into court." With the exception that this bill should be taxed by the proper officer in Chancery instead of by the arbitrator, the case of Doulton v. Metropolitan Board of Works is an authority exactly in point with respect to this case. The agreement there provided that the reference and award should be subject to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, except as modified by the agreement, and the modifications are almost exactly the same as in this agreement of the 15th Feb. 1876. In both are provisions for the costs of the agreements and conveyances, and valuers' and solicitor's charges. The objection of Lush, J., to the motion, which was similar to this, was, "If the Act were held to apply, the costs might have to be taxed by two different persons. I think that sect. 1 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869, can only be taken to apply to arbitration pure and simple, begun and carried out under the Lands Clauses Acts. Where there are special agreements concerning matters to which those statutes do not apply, the Act of 1869 is not applicable." The object of the agreement was to save the corporation from having to deposit a sum of money they would otherwise have been liable for, and the consideration for this advantage was the better scale of costs allowed to the landowner by the Chancery taxation.

Charles, Q.C., in reply.—This motion is merely to obtain the costs of the arbitration, if there are any charges for the agreement or conveyance, the master would disallow them. There must be two taxations in any event, for the conveyance is not yet completed. This is an agreement collateral to the arbitration, and contains nothing to deprive the corporation of the benefit of the Act of 1869. [LUSH, J.—The agreement indemnifies Colonel Wombwell, but there is nothing in the Act of 1869, to prevent his solicitor from recovering against him the costs taxed off under that Act.] The solicitor may have the same right if the taxation take place in Chancery, the words "as between solicitor and client," in the 4th clause of the agreement apply only to solicitors' charges, not to the other costs and expenses of Colonel Wombwell.

MELLOR, J.—I confess that I feel considerable difficulty in this matter. If this were the first time the point had been raised I should have much doubted the propriety of depriving a party to such an arbitration of the benefit of this Act of 1869. But upon the authority of the decision of my brother Lush in Doulton v. Metropolitan Board of Works, I am willing to hold that the parties have here agreed to take themselves out of the operation of that Act. The object of the 1st section no doubt was to give such taxations to persons skilled in like matters, and the provision is to apply where any question of disputed compensation, under the Lands Clauses Act 1845, or any Act incorporating the same, is determined by arbitration. Mr. Charles contends that there is nothing in the Act as to the scale upon which the taxation is to be carried out, and that the duty imposed upon a master may be regulated by agreement. I feel the weight of that contention, but on the other side it is reasonably maintained that there is nothing to prevent parties from agreeing to exclude the Act from applying to their arbitration. Here the agreement was that the corporation should pay all and every the costs and expenses of Col. Wombwell "of and incidental to this agreement and the said reference and arbitration, and to the conveyance of the said lands and premises, including valuers' and surveyors' charges and solicitors' charges as between solicitor and client." These words mean, I think, to indemnify Col. Wombwell from all expenses attending the whole proceeding, and in order to do that the parties have agreed to remove themselves from the application of the Act of 1869. But does the clause mean to make the corporation liable for any costs which the solicitors may charge? I think not; it may well be that the costs should be taxed under the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act referred to by Mr. Wills. A taxing officer in Chancery is a most suitable tribunal for this work, and he would not be limited to the treatment of the costs of the arbitration only. I think, therefore, we should not compel this taxation to be undertaken by a master under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1869, and this rule will be refused.

LUSH, J.—I think also there is no power to compel Col. Wombwell to have these costs taxed under the Act of 1869. It is competent to the parties to an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Acts to contract themselves out of the Act of 1869, and I think the agreement here has that effect. I think it means that Col. Wombwell should be indemnified from all costs with which his solicitor would have a right to charge him. Those costs may be ascertained in the Court of Chancery, not only by Col. Wombwell or his solicitor, but under sect. 38 of the Attorneys' Act, by the Corporation of Barnsley, who have to pay them. There is no difficulty about it, and it

REG. v. INHABITANTS OF CENTRAL WINGLAND. (a)

Extra-parochial place, repair of highway by—20 Vict. c. 9—25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, ss. 17, 32, 35—27 & 28 Vict. c. 101, ss. 3, 9.

An extra-parochial place which is annexed to a union under 20 Vict. c. 19, is not liable to indictment for non-repair of a highway.

THIS was an indictment of the Inhabitants of Central Wingland for non-repair of a highway. The indictment followed a common form, and the only plea of the defendants was "Not Guilty."

At the trial of the indictment before Amphlett, L.J., at the Lincoln Spring Assizes, 1876, the following facts were, by agreement of counsel, placed on the learned judge's notes:

Prior to the passing of the Nene Outfall Act 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. lxxxv.), all the lands which now form Central Wingland were un-reclaimed salt marshes and extra-parochial. Pursuant to the Nene Outfall Act 1827, these lands were embanked and reclaimed from the sea, and by sect. 176 of that Act were declared to be extra-parochial. By sect. 180 of the same Act it was provided that Thomas Pear, surveyor, should set out so much of the said lands as he should think proper for public roads and highways, and he accordingly made an award, dated 20th Dec. 1836, setting out amongst others the road now in question as a public highway. The Nene Outfall Commissioners, under the said Act, became the owners of the whole of Central Wingland, and on the 20th Aug. 1840, they sold by auction, under conditions of sale, a portion of their said land adjoining the road in question. Under the ninth of the said conditions of sale the purchasers were required to enter into certain covenants to repair the highway according to their frontages. Pursuant to the said ninth condition of sale, Thomas Pear made an award dated 7th Dec. 1840, which included the said road. The purchasers of the said lands entered into the covenants required by the said ninth condition of sale by a deed of covenant, dated 9th Jan. 1841. [Deed put in.] The highway in question was set out or commenced to be set out under the direction of the said Thomas Pear, in the year 1843. Since the passing of 20 Vict. c. 19, Central Wingfield has been added to the Holbeach Union by an order of the Poor Law Board, dated 2nd May 1866, and an overseer and a guardian were appointed from time to time. In May 1875, Joseph Faulkner was appointed surveyor of highways for Central Wingland by the justices of the parts of Holland, in Lincolnshire, under the provisions of the Highway Acts. It was contended by the defendants that this appointment was invalid. Central Wingland is not a highway district, and no highway board has been appointed for any district in which Central Wingland is included. No highway rate has ever been made in Central Wingland.

(a) Reported by J. M. LELY Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The road in question was at the time of the trial and had been for some time out of repair. On 21st Jan. 1876, the prosecutor took out a summons against Joseph Faulkner, as such overseer as aforesaid in respect of the non-repair of such highway. The said Joseph Faulkner appeared at Spalding, on Feb. 1st 1876, before the justices of the parts of Holland, in answer to the said summons, and admitted the said road to be a public highway, but denied the liability of the inhabitants to repair it. The case was adjourned to the 15th Feb., when the justices ordered the present indictment to be prepared at the then next Lincoln assizes.

The learned judge directed a verdict of guilty, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendants.

The following enactments are material:

20 Vict. c. 19, s. 1:

Every place entered separately in the report of the Registrar-General on the last census which now is or is reputed to be extra-parochial, and wherein no rate is levied for the relief of the poor, shall for all the purposes of the assessment to the poor rate, the relief of the poor, the county police, or borough rate, the burial of the dead, the removal of nuisances, the registration of births and deaths, be deemed a parish for such purposes, and shall be designated by the name which is assigned to it in such report; and the justices of the peace having jurisdiction over such place or over the greater part thereof shall appoint overseers of the poor therein; and with respect to any other place being or reputed to be extra-parochial, and wherein no rate is levied for the relief of the poor, such justices may appoint overseers of the poor therein, notwithstanding anything contained in 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101. [The Poor Law Amendment Act 1844.]

25 & 26 Vict. c. 61 (The Highway Act 1862) s. 17:

The highway board shall maintain in good repair the highways within their district, and shall, subject to the provisions of the Act as respects the highways in each parish within their district perform the same duties, have the same powers, and be liable to the same legal proceedings as the surveyor of such parish would have performed, had, and been liable to if this Act had not passed. It shall be the duty of the district surveyor to submit to the board at their first meeting in every year an estimate of the expenses likely to be incurred during the ensuing year for maintaining and keeping in repair the highways in each parish within the district of the board, and to deliver a copy of such estimate, as approved or modified by the board so far as the same relates to each parish, to the waywarden of such parish.

Sect. 32:

Where, in pursuance of 20 Vict. c. 19, any place is declared to be a parish, or where overseers of the poor are appointed for any place, such place shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be a parish separately maintaining its own highways; and where in pursuance of the same Act any place is annexed to any adjoining parish, or to any district in which the relief of the poor is administered under a local Act, such place shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be annexed to such parish or district for the purposes of the maintenance of the highways, as well as for the purposes in the said Act mentioned.

27 & 28 Vict. c. 101 (Highway Act 1864) s. 9:

The justices in petty sessions may appoint overseers, or otherwise deal with any extra-parochial place with a view to constituting it a highway parish or part of a highway parish, in the same manner as the justices may deal with such place for the purpose of constituting it a place or part of a place maintaining its own poor, in pursuance of the powers for that purpose given by 20 Vict. c. 19.

Sect. 5:

Any parish, township, tithing, hamlet, or other place having a known legal boundary in which there are no highways repairable at the expense of the place, or in which the highways are repaired at the expense of the place, or in which the highways are repaired at the expense of any person, body politic or corporate by reason of any court, tenure, limitation or appointment of any charitable gift, or otherwise howsoever than out of a highway rate or other general rate, shall, for the purposes of the Highway Acts, be deemed to be a place separately maintaining its own highways.

A rule was afterwards obtained to set aside the verdict for the Crown and to enter a verdict for the defendants, on the grounds that on the facts admitted at the trial the defendants were entitled to the verdict, that the justices had no power to appoint a surveyor, or to constitute the parish a highway parish, the same not being in a highway district, that the Nene Outfall Act provides that Central Wingland shall at all times be deemed extra-parochial, and is not repealed by the General Highway Acts, and that the provisions of the Highway Act 1835, s. 23, had not been complied with. Against this rule

Merewether, Q.C. and Dugdale, for the prosecution, now showed cause, and relying principally on sect. 32 of the Highway Act of 1862, argued that the defendants were subject to the law of highways generally, so as to be separately indictable, and that inasmuch as the question was not one between one part of the inhabitants and another, but between the inhabitants and the public, the Highway Acts ought not to be construed literally in favour of the defendants.

Graham, for the defendants, supported the rule, and argued that as no highway board had been appointed, the justices had no jurisdiction to appoint a surveyor, and that the words "for the purposes of this Act," in sect. 32 of the Highway Act of 1862 had reference solely to the administrative purposes of the Highway Acts, and imposed no liability to indictment for non-repair. He cited

Reg. v. Midville, 4 Q. B. 240; 2 G. & D. 522.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute. The case is one of some difficulty and complexity, the question being whether the object of the statute was to change the liability of parishes, or to throw the obligation to repair upon the surveyor. Mr. Merewether assumes, and he is bound to assume, that the defendants are liable to an indictment, but he has failed to make out his case. The soil of Central Wingland was vested by the Nene Outfall Act in commissioners, and declared to be extra-parochial for ever. These commissioners sold portions of the soil on condition that the purchasers would repair in proportion to their frontages. By the operation of 20 Vict. c. 19, Central Wingland became a parish for the purposes of the poor-rate and other specific purposes set forth in the second section of that Act. But highway rates are certainly not included in that section. Mr. Merewether, however, contends that by sect. 32 of the Highway Act 1862, the liability is thrown upon the defendants. [The learned judge read the section and proceeded:] No doubt the scheme of the Act of 1862 was that the difficulties in the way of a perfect highway system which were caused by the interposition of extraparochial places should be obviated, and that the new law should prevail generally throughout England. But I think that this section does not give a power to proceed against this particular parish; the words "for the purposes of this Act" show that for the parish to be liable, it was first necessary that a highway district should be appointed, and this has not been done. Neither do any other of the enactments referred to render the indictment maintainable. The rule, therefore, must be absolute.

FIELD, J.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. This indictment charges that the defendants are bound to repair a certain highway. On such an indictment it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove that the defendants are a parish. That is laid down very clearly by R. v. Ecclesfield (1 B. & Ald. 359), which is the foundation of all the authorities on the subject. The place was never a parish for any purpose till the passing of 20 Vict. c. 19, which was passed to obviate the many difficulties which arose from the chain of communication being broken up by extraparochial places, but though it applied to many public purposes, it did not refer to highways. We then come to the 32nd section of the Act of 1862. [Section read.] Now if this section had stopped at the words "separately maintaining its own highways," Mr. Merewether would no doubt have had a very strong case. But the section goes on to speak of "places annexed to adjoining parishes," and to provide that these places shall, "for the purposes of this Act," be deemed to be annexed to the adjoining parishes "for the purposes of maintaining the highways." Now what are the purposes of the Act? Clearly to provide a machinery for forming "highway districts" and "highway parishes." Following out this interpretation, we find that the inhabitants of Central Wingland come within the operation of sect. 10, so as to be able to elect a waywarden. But they are not liable to be separately indicted.

Rule absolute.

WEBB v. KNIGHT.(a)

Adulteration — Dilution — Quality of article — Question of fact—38 & 39 Vict. c. 63.

A purchaser asked for a pint bottle of gin at the appellant's licensed premises. The barman inquired at what price, saying there were two kinds, one at 2s., the other at 1s. 4d. a pint. The purchaser chose the latter, and was supplied with a liquid which proved on analysis to be 43.15 per cent. under proof. It was found that the custom of the trade in the district was to buy gin from the distillers about 20 under proof, and to sell at prices from 2s. to 1s. a pint. The appellant was convicted under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article of food which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded.

Held, upon a case stated, that in the absence of any custom in the neighbourhood as to the amount of dilution corresponding to a particular price, the breach of the statute was a question of fact for the magistrates; and that the court could not interfere with any common sense view of the matter taken by them.

WEBB v. KNIGHT.

[Q.B. Div.]

THIS is a case stated by one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Stafford, and the stipendiary magistrate for the district of the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, and certain places adjoining within the said district in the said county, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with the decision, upon the question of law which arose, as hereinafter stated, on the 19th Jan. 1877, at Stoke-upon-Trent, in the said county, the appellant having duly entered into a recognizance to prosecute the appeal:

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the respondent against the appellant, under sect. 6 of the Act 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, "That on the 7th Nov. 1876, at the parish of Burslem, in the said county, the appellant unlawfully did sell to the prejudice of one William Gifford, the purchaser of a certain article of food, to wit, one pint of gin, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser." I convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to pay the sum of 10s. for his said offence, to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 1l. 16s. for his costs in that behalf; and it was further adjudged that if the said several sums should not be paid forthwith, the said William Webb should be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Stafford, in the said county, and there kept to hard labour for the space of fourteen days, unless the said several sums should be sooner paid.

2. The following facts were proved before me.

(1.) The said William Gifford, the assistant to the respondent, who is the authorised inspector under the said Act, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, went to the appellant's licensed house, known by the sign of the Nile Street Hotel, at Burslem, on the 9th Nov., and asked for a pint of gin. The appellant's barman, John Ward, asked Gifford at what price he wanted it, stating that they had it at 2s. and 1s. 4d. per pint. Gifford selected a pint at 1s. 4d., which was supplied to him. He admitted on cross-examination that the prices of gin varied from 2s. to as low as 1s. 1d., and that he had purchased gin for analysis as low as 1s. Gifford then divided the pint of gin into three parts, two of which were sealed by the appellant, and retained by Gifford. The other portion was sealed by Gifford and left with the appellant. Gifford, at the time he sealed the samples, marked them A. 584.

(2.) The two samples of gin marked A. 584 were handed to the respondent on the same day; and on the 10th Nov., 1876, the respondent handed the said two samples to Mr. Wentworth Scott, the duly authorised analyst for the district A. in North Staffordshire for analysis.

(3.) On or about the 18th Nov., 1876, the said analyst forwarded his certificate of analysis to the respondent, of which the following is a copy:—

County of Stafford
(Northern Division).
Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.
Certificate of analysis,
District A.

No. 41,
Sample of gin.
Marked A. 584, sealed with key.
Received Nov. 10.h, 1876.

From J. E. Knight, Food Inspector,
County Analyst's Laboratories,
Wolverhampton, 18th Nov., 1876.

I, the undersigned, public analyst for the County of Stafford, do hereby certify that I have analysed chemically, and have otherwise examined the sample of gin referred to above, and that I find the same very largely adulterated, the under-mentioned per centages or proportions of foreign ingredients being present therein—
Water 43.15 per cent.

In my opinion the said sample is not so adulterated as to be injurious to health.

To Major Knight, Stafford.

WENTWORTH L. SCOTT.

(4.) The appellant called witnesses, and proved that when he bought the gin of the distillers it was seventeen under proof, and that it was the custom of the trade, in this district, to purchase gin at degrees varying from seventeen to twenty-two under proof, and that the prices at which gin is usually sold by the trade in the district are, for the best gin 2s., and for common gin 1s. 4d., and as low as 1s.

3. On the part of the appellant it was further contended the article of food, namely, the pint of gin sold to Gifford as the purchaser, could not be to the prejudice of the said purchaser, as he had selected a low priced gin, and that he got his value in genuine spirit diluted only by the addition of water to accommodate the purchaser in the price to be paid, and that, therefore, he got a more diluted or less strong spirit, and that it was a well known fact that in the sale of gin the custom of the trade was that pure gin was an article not sold for consumption in licensed houses, and that there was no standard of alcoholic strength retailers were required to sell, and that under all the circumstances the custom regulating the traffic in gin, could not be affected by the before-named statute.

4. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that, when a purchaser asked for gin, it was to the prejudice of the purchaser if he got gin mixed with a large per centage of water.

5. I, however, was of opinion that when a purchaser asked for gin, he did not expect to be supplied with gin and a large per centage of water added thereto by the vendor, and that though there is no recognised standard of alcoholic strength for gin, but that it varies from proof to twenty under proof, a purchaser may well believe that when he asks for best gin he will obtain that of a strength about proof or a few degrees under, and when he asks for lower priced gin he will obtain gin of a quality between that and twenty under proof, at any rate, if he asks for gin, he might expect to obtain an article not more than twenty or twenty-two under proof. If the contention of the appellant were right, there would be no limit to the amount of water he might be entitled to add, because it was admitted in evidence that gin was sold at a less price per gallon than was paid for it, and that the profit was made only by the quantity of water that was added to the gin after it was received from the distiller's. I was of opinion that such a contention was contrary to the decision of the learned judge in the case of Pashler v. Stevenitt, reported in 40 J. P. 357, and I consequently gave my decision against the appellant.

6. The question of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore is: 1st, Was the pint of gin and water sold to Gifford as gin, to the prejudice of the purchaser, within the meaning of the said Act? If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was right, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction is to be quashed.

Given under my hand and seal this 5th Feb., 1877. H. C. GREENWOOD.

Upon the first argument of the case (the 25th April), the court (Mellor and Lush, JJ.) ordered that it should be remitted to the magistrate who stated and signed the same, in order that he might amend the same by stating whether the liquid sold was of the nature, substance, and quality of gin usually sold at that price in the neighbourhood:

The following was the amended case stated pursuant to the order of the court:

"As to whether the liquid sold was of the nature, substance, and quality of gin usually sold at that price in the neighbourhood, I can only refer to several other cases of a similar character to the present, awaiting to abide the decision of the High Court of Justice in this case, and by consent using the certificates, as also the prices paid for the gin in each case, of which the following is a list:

PRICES PAID.	NAMES OF VENDOR.	PER CENTAGE OF WATER.
2s. per pint. ...	Hannah Bell	29.8 per cent.
1s. 10d. " ...	Joseph Bosworth .	31.5 "
1s. 4d. " ...	Elizabeth Hancock .	32 "
1s. " ...	Charles Lochett ...	51.1 "
2s. " ...	Thomas Pover	44.18 "
1s. 4d. " ...	Charles Green	40.3 "
1s. 8d. " ...	Albert Turner	52.28 "

"I convicted the appellant, inasmuch as he had not brought himself within the exception of the 25th section of the Act."

June 13.—Poland again argued for the appellant.—Although the magistrate has not directly answered the question for which the court remitted the case to him, it may be taken that he now finds gin to vary in price and strength in the neighbourhood; and it becomes therefore more difficult than before to say that this is a case within the application of the statute. By sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), "No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser under a penalty not exceeding 20l.; provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases, that is to say: (1), Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof; (2), Where the drug or food is a proprietary medicine, or is the subject of a patent in force, and is supplied in the state required by the specification of the patent; (3), Where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned; (4), Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation." By sect. 7: "No person shall sell any compound article of food or compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding 20l."

Sect. 25, to which reference is made by the magistrate, provides that the defendant is to be discharged if he can prove that he bought the adulterated article in the state in which he sold it, with a written warranty. Here the article sold is admittedly of the nature and substance of the article demanded by the purchaser; as to the quality, a purchaser demanding gin at 1s. 4d. a pint could only mean to ask for gin so mixed with water as to be obtained at that price. [LUSH, J.—All gin must be diluted with water to prepare it as an article of commerce.] Water is not a foreign ingredient. In the case referred to before the magistrate (Pashler v. Stevenitt, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 862), the purchaser merely asked for a bottle of gin, without mentioning quality or price. [LUSH, J.—Is not this like the mustard case which we had before us lately?] Sandys v. Markham was a refusal by justices to convict under this Act for selling mustard adulterated by flour. It seems from the Justice of the Peace (Jan. 27, 1877) that the case was remitted to the justices to find the facts more precisely, and there is no further report of it. To quash this conviction would not affect the object of this legislation against adulteration, for the purchaser here obtained the article for which he asked.

Bosanquet for the respondent.—The amendment by the magistrate is no answer whatever to the question of the court. We must therefore consider the effect of the statements in the original case, from which it appears that the purchaser asked for gin, not gin and water, and obtained this compound. The steps afterwards taken by the analyst are exactly those prescribed by the Act of Parliament, and the certificate which is made evidence distinctly states that the analyst finds the sample of gin very largely adulterated, the foreign ingredient of water being present to to the extent of 43.15 per cent. The finding of fact by the magistrate is that this dilution was greater than any purchaser of gin would expect, and therefore was within the mischief to be remedied by the statute. In the case of Pashler v. Stevenitt the strength of the sample of gin was just the same as in this case, 44 per cent. under proof, and Cleasby, B. said in his judgment "The justices have come to the conclusion that a mixture of alcohol and water, so far as 44 per cent. below proof, is not of the quality of gin as known commercially, but a fraudulent increase of the measure of the liquid. It is impossible for us to say they were wrong, and they were therefore justified in convicting the appellant." Grove, J. added, "We cannot decide whether upon the weight of the evidence, the case comes within the first exception or not; that is a question for the magistrates." . . . "If 44 per cent. beyond the ordinary proportion be not adulteration, it must be difficult to discover anything to which the statute could apply. It is really a question of fact, and I think the justices have decided it rightly." [MELLOR, J.—I certainly see no objection to the grounds of that decision.]

Poland, in reply.

MELLOR, J.—I confess I should have been much better satisfied if we had received an answer to our question. The magistrate I suppose could not give us one, so we must come to the best conclusion we can upon the facts stated. A reasonable view must be taken of such a matter as this, and if there were a general custom well known in the neighbourhood that a person asking for gin at 1s. 4d. a pint would get this mixture, there could be no breach of the statute by the seller. Such a custom is not found in this case, and without a guide of that kind it must be left to the common sense of the magistrates to come to a conclusion. If they show a reasonable consideration of the facts, and decide upon a common sense view, we ought not to interfere. This was the effect of the judgment in Pashler v. Stevenitt by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with ourselves, and we ought I think to follow it. I can see no distinction between this case and that, and we must therefore affirm the present conviction.

BROWN (app.) v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

LUSH, J.—I am, of the same opinion. As we cannot get the information we desired, we must see if we have upon the case stated any ground for impugning the conviction. The Act says no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. Now the article demanded here was gin at 1s. 4d. a pint, and the article sold by the appellant was of the proper nature and substance. Whether it was of the proper quality depends I think upon facts which we cannot get at. A purchaser must know, as it seems to me, that if he wants cheap gin he will get diluted gin; but how much water should be allowed for a particular reduction of price is a matter which a magistrate ought to be able to determine better than we can. I can see no reason for saying that the finding in this case is wrong; and that being so, it must be decisive. Moreover, it accords with another finding which was adopted by another Division in Pashler v. Stevenitt, and we ought I think to follow that case. The appeal therefore will be dismissed.

BROWN (app.) v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (resps.) (a)

Railway company—Bye-laws—Passenger failing to produce ticket—Demand of fare—Penalty or forfeiture.

By one of the bye-laws of a railway company it was provided that any passenger travelling without a ticket, or failing or refusing to show or deliver up his ticket, should be liable to pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started.

Held, that, before the bye-law could be enforced by the company, a demand must have been made for the amount of the fare at the time the offence was committed.

Semble 1. That such a bye-law is not void for uncertainty.

Semble 2. That the fare to be so paid is in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture.

This was a case stated by two of the justices of the Metropolitan Police District, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, which was as follows:

It was proved on the part of the respondents, the Great Eastern Railway Company, that the appellant did travel by one of the company's trains from some station on their railway to Stratford, on the 28th Dec. last; that he was then and there asked by one Croft, he being one of the company's ticket collectors, in the ordinary course of duty, to show his ticket; that the defendant refused to do so; that he was then asked from what station he had come, and that he was then understood to reply "from ——" (which was not on the company's line), and that he afterwards added that "the collector knew very well where he had come from, and that he was a season ticket holder."

The Great Eastern Railway Company have duly made and published under the various statutes relating to their railway bye-laws for the regulation of their various lines. Bye-law No. 1 is as follows:

No passenger will be allowed to enter any carriage on the railway, or to travel therein upon the railway, unless furnished by the company with a ticket, specifying the class of carriage and the stations, for conveyance between which such ticket is issued. Every passenger shall shew and deliver up his ticket (whether a contract or season ticket, or otherwise) to any duly authorised servant of the company, whenever required to do so for any purpose. Any passenger travelling without a ticket, or failing or refusing to shew or deliver up his ticket as aforesaid, shall be required to pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started to the end of his journey.

It was admitted at the hearing that the appellant did hold a second-class season ticket from Brentwood Station to Liverpool-street Station on the respondents' railway. It was also admitted that the train in which the defendant was travelling started from Colchester, and that the fare from that place was 7s. 6d., or 4s. more than the fare from Brentwood, the place from which the season ticket was available.

At the hearing it was urged on behalf of the appellant that the information ought to be dismissed on the ground that no demand for the sum required to be paid was made upon him at the time when the offence was committed, and therefore the provisions of the said bye-law had not been complied with by the respondents.

And it was further urged that the justices had no jurisdiction on the ground that the act done was not within the bye-law, as such bye-law only required the fare to be paid from whence the train originally started to the end of the journey, which payment was not a penalty or forfeiture, and therefore not recoverable by virtue of the said bye-law and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 145, which enacts that:

Every penalty or forfeiture imposed by this or the special Act, or by any bye-law made in pursuance thereof, the recovery of which is not otherwise provided for, may be recovered by summary proceeding before two justices. . . . and it shall be lawful for the justices to convict the offender, and upon such conviction to adjudge the offender to pay the penalty or forfeiture incurred, as well as such costs attending the conviction as the justices shall think fit.

It was also contended that an order upon the appellant to pay the amount required by the respondents would constitute a penalty, and the case of Dearden v. Townsend (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 10; 35 L. J. 50, M. C.) was called to our attention on this point.

We were of opinion that the sum of 7s. 6d., the full second class fare from Colchester, was recoverable as a forfeiture under the said bye-law,

(a) Reported by A. H. FORTNA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div]

BROWN (app.) v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

in conjunction with the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 14, and appellant was ordered to pay that amount, with costs.

The questions upon which the opinion of the court is desired are:

1. Whether a demand for the sum required by the respondents to be paid was necessary at the time the offence was committed, or whether the proceedings taken before us were a sufficient requirement under the said bye-laws.

2. Whether the extra payment required to be made under the said bye-law (the appellant being a season ticket holder from Brentwood only) was a forfeiture, and recoverable within the meaning of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20; or whether it constituted a penalty, and consequently came within the principles laid down in Dearden v. Townsend.

If the court shall be of opinion that a demand of the amount required by the respondents was necessary at the time of the offence, or that the amount so required constituted a penalty, the order made by us upon the appellant is to be discharged.

If the court shall be of opinion that there was a sufficient requirement by the respondents, or that the amount so required constituted a "forfeiture," then the order made by us is to stand.

J. Brown, Q.C. (McLeod with him) for the appellant.—I do not contend that the appellant was not bound to produce his ticket; he was wrong, no doubt, in not doing so. But in order to be able to enforce the bye-law, the officer of the company should have demanded at the time the amount of fare claimed. The company were aware of the amount, the passenger was not. In previous cases notice has always been alleged; here it is negatived. [LUSH, J.—That argument would hold equally good supposing the appellant had been sued in County Court.] That is so. But in any case the amount of fare charged is not in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture (Chilton v. London and Croydon Railway Company, 8 L. T. Rep. O. S. 366; 16 M. & W. 212; 16 L. J. 89, Ex.), and is, therefore, not recoverable before magistrates. If this were a penalty or forfeiture the bye-law would be bad, because the company have no power to demand a higher sum than 5*l.* as a forfeiture (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 109) (a), and the fare under this bye-law might exceed that amount. The penalty ought to be stated in the bye-law.

Metcalfe, Q.C. (Austin Metcalfe with him) for the company.—This case was rightly decided by the magistrates. Chilton v. London and Croydon Railway Company (ubi sup.) is a different case. The question there was as to the arrest of a passenger, and it was for an offence against the Act, and not against the bye-laws. The amount of fare would most probably exceed the amount that would have been due for the distance actually travelled. The amount awarded by the magistrates is in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture. A sufficient demand was made for the fare by summoning the appellant before the magistrates. The appellant refused to show his ticket in such a manner as to waive any necessity for the demand of the fare. There is no fare on the company's line exceeding 5*l.*, so that under any circumstances the bye-law is within sect. 109 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.

(a) For better enforcing the observance of all or any such regulations, it shall be lawful for the company . . . to make bye-laws, and from time to time to repeal or alter such bye-laws, and make others, provided that such bye-laws be not repugnant to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or to the provisions of this or the special Act. . . . And any person offending against any such bye-law shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, to be imposed by the company in such bye-laws as a penalty for any such offence &c.

MELLOR, J.—I must say that it strikes me that, upon general principles of law, it is the duty of a company who seek to impose terms upon the public by means of bye-laws like the present to inform a passenger at the time when his ticket is demanded, and he refuses to produce it, that he is liable to pay some fixed sum, a sum such as may be recognised as within the terms of the Act of Parliament. I think it would be far safer to impose a specific sum under 5*l.* as a penalty for such an offence. Nevertheless, I think it is sufficient if none of the fares which could be demanded under the bye-law should exceed the sum of 5*l.* But it is clear to me that it would be manifestly unjust, if a man is willing to pay the amount, that he should be told by the company that he must be taken before a magistrate, and thus have to incur the expenses of litigation, in addition to the sum he would have to pay under the bye-laws. The effect of the bye-law is to exclude persons travelling without a ticket, but until the person has got into a carriage he is not subject to the bye-law. If, however, he has got into a carriage, he has become a passenger, and is bound to shew a ticket; and if he fails, the company may recover the fare from the place whence the train started. The offence is committed when the person has refused or failed to produce his ticket; but in order that the company may recover, they ought to make a demand of the amount of the fare claimed, for it is exclusively within their knowledge, for the passenger may not know either the amount of the fare or the place from whence the train started. Therefore it is necessary that a demand should be made in order to afford the passenger an opportunity of paying. Although I am of opinion that the expression of Parke, B. in Chilton v. Croydon Railway Company (ubi sup.), that the sum demanded was a fare and not a penalty, may have been warranted by the circumstances of that case, still here I am inclined to think that the amount of the fare to be recovered is in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture. However, I do not think it is necessary for me to decide that point, for I am of opinion that a demand for the amount of the fare should have been made when the appellant refused or failed to produce his ticket, and that the decision of the magistrates is therefore erroneous, and must be reversed.

LUSH, J.—I should say, if it were necessary to decide the point, that the fare due under this bye-law is in the nature of a penalty, for the amount of the fare from the original station whence the train starts is generally a larger sum than the passenger would have had to pay from the station whence he started, and he has to pay it for some act or omission on his own part. I am also of opinion that the bye-law is not bad merely because it does not fix the exact amount that is to be paid. For it has been held that a bye-law is good which imposes a reasonable charge, the exact amount of which must be subsequently ascertained; for instance, a bye-law that every burgess pay a reasonable sum for building of law courts, or for cleaning the borough upon the coming of the judges, or for his proportion of pontage and murage, &c. (Com. Dig., Tit. "Bye-law" (B. 4). Therefore I am of opinion that this bye-law is not bad because upon the face of it it might include a larger sum than 5*l*. However, it is not necessary to decide that point, as I am of opinion that, as the amount was uncertain, and had to be ascertained by reference to the place from which the train originally started, and that as that fact is presumably better known by the company than by the passenger, it was necessary that a demand should have been made at the time for the amount of the fare. The ground on which I decide this case is, that before proceedings are taken under the bye-law, notice of the amount claimed must be given to the passenger.

NEWARK UNION (apps.) v. GLANFORD BRIGG UNION (resps.). (a)

Poor law—Irremovability—Break of residence—One night's absence.

A pauper had resided for fifteen years continuously in the respondents' union, and received relief for the last two years and a half of that period from the respondents. Having received notice to quit the house in which he lived, he took a house as weekly tenant in the neighbouring union; he sold some of his furniture, and removed the rest and his family into the house he had taken. After sleeping there one night, he found for the first time, upon his application for weekly relief, that his new residence was not in the respondents' union, and on the same day he moved back again to another house inside the respondents' union. He again became chargeable, and the respondents removed him to his last place of settlement, which was in the appellant's union.

Held, upon appeal from this order of removal, that this break of residence was sufficient to destroy the pauper's status of irremovability in the respondents' union; and that the order of removal was right.

1. This is a special case stated by consent of parties and by order in an appeal against an order dated the 1st Aug. 1876, and made by two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the parts of Lindsey and county of Lincoln, for the removal of a pauper named Joseph Crosby, together with his wife and child, from the union of the respondents to that of the appellants.

2. Due notice of the appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions was given.

3. The pauper resided in the parish of Scawby, in the respondents' union, for fifteen years continuously, when he became unable to work, and became chargeable to the respondents' union.

4. He still continued to reside in Scawby, and to receive relief from the respondents continuously for two years and a half.

5. During such period the pauper resided in different houses, and on the 3rd Aug. 1875, he took a house of one William Wilson at 2*s*. per week, for which he paid the rent until his tenancy was determined on the 13th May 1876, by a week's notice to quit.

6. In the month of March 1876, William Wilson's house was sold, and the pauper, having received notice to quit, arranged (through his wife) to take a house situate in the parish of Bigby, in the Caistor Union, belonging to one George Dent, from the 14th May 1876, as weekly tenant. The pauper sold a portion of his furniture, and on the 15th May 1876, removed into Dent's house with all his family, and all his unsold goods, chattels, furniture, and effects, and resided and slept in such house one night, namely, the night of the said 15th May 1876. Dent's house is distant about half a mile from Wilson's, and when the pauper hired the former house, he was not aware that in going to live there he was removing into another union.

7. On the 16th May 1876, being the weekly pay day, the pauper went as usual to the relieving officer of the respondents' union for relief, but was informed that, as he had removed into another union, his residence in the respondents' union had been broken, and relief could not be given him from such union.

8. The pauper thereupon went and hired a house in the township of Glanford Brigg, also in the respondents' union, and moved into such house on the said 16th May 1876. The pauper subsequently made a fresh application to the relieving officer of the respondents' union for relief, and on the 23rd May 1876, was again relieved by the respondents.

The question for the court is whether the removal by the pauper from the respondents' into the said Caistor Union, under the circumstances above set out, constitutes such a break in the residence as to destroy the pauper's status of irremovability in the respondents' union.

If the court should be of opinion that such break of residence has destroyed the pauper's status of irremovability, then the order of the justices is to stand, and judgment affirming the same is to be entered at the sessions accordingly. If the court should be of opinion that such break of residence has not destroyed the status of irremovability, then judgment quashing the said order is to be entered.

Cave, Q.C. (with him Horace Smith) argued for the appellants.—This unintentional absence of the pauper for one night from the respondents' union cannot be such a break of residence as to destroy his status of irremovability. In Reg. v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch (L. R. 1 Q. B. 21) an absence under similar circumstances for twenty-one successive nights was held to be no break of residence, and mere sleeping out of a parish was said to be insufficient to establish any departure from the parish at all. [MELLOR, J.—That, however, was on the assumption of the pauper's continuance of intention to return.] Here there was no intention to leave the union. Reg. v. Whitby (L. R. 5 Q. B. 325) is another authority in favour of the appellants; one night's absence being held insufficient to destroy a status of irremovability. [LUSH, J.—That was the case of a lunatic, who could not, it was said, exercise any intention to return or stay away.]

Appleton appeared for the respondents, but was not heard.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

MELLOR, J.—There must, in my opinion, be an actual desertion of the old premises and an occupation of the new to constitute a break of residence under such circumstances as these; but there is no necessity to consider here how short an occupation can destroy a status of irremovability. The question is whether the facts make a break in the pauper's residence in this case. He was turned out of his house in the respondents' union; he sold some of his furniture, and made a complete desertion of his old premises. He removed the rest of his goods and his family into a house in the neighbouring union, having taken the new house for a week. He and his family slept one night under the new tenancy, and fully intended to continue their residence there, until they discovered the house was out of the respondents' union. I think the pauper could not, by moving back again into another house inside the union the next day pretend that his residence in the union was continued. It is nothing to us that he never meant to leave the union, he clearly meant to change his residence, and had no intention to return to the union from the house which he had taken at the time he moved. We must say this was a break of residence sufficient to destroy the pauper's irremovability; and therefore the order of removal must be affirmed.

LUSH, J.—I also am of opinion that the pauper ceased to reside in the respondents' union, and therefore he was no longer irremovable.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON. (a)

Illegal vestments at communion—Alb and chasuble—1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25—Advertisements of Elizabeth—Eastward position during prayer of consecration—"Before the people," meaning of—Administering wafer bread at communion—Crucifix—Faculty—Public Worship Regulation Act 1874.

It is not lawful for the officiating minister to wear during the service of the Holy Communion the vestments known as an alb and a chasuble.

By the first book of Edward VI. (1549) the minister is directed, while celebrating the Holy Communion, to wear "a white alb, plain with a vestment"

(chasuble), "or cope." By 1 Eliz. c. 2 s. 25, it was enacted that "Such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, shall be retained and be in use, as was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI. (1549), until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of her commissioners, appointed under the Great Seal of England for causes ecclesiastical, or of the metropolitan of this realm." In 1566, advertisements were issued by the metropolitan and other prelates, which contained the following direction: "Every minister saying any public prayer, or ministering the sacraments, or other rites of the Church, shall wear a comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish." The rubric of the present Prayer Book (1662) directs that "Such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." (1549).

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Arches), that the ornaments rubric of 1662 does not repeal all legislation on the question subsequent to 1549, but must be read as subject to any further order taken under 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25; that the advertisements of Elizabeth were a "taking other order," within the Act, by the Queen, with the advice of the metropolitan; and that, as the advertisements enjoined the use of the surplice at the administration of the Holy Communion, they rendered the use of albs or chasubles, at that administration, unlawful.

It is not unlawful for the officiating minister, while saying the prayer of consecration in the communion service, to stand at the west side of the communion table, with his face to the east and his back to the people, provided that the communicants present, or the bulk of them, being properly placed, are able, if they wish it, to see him break the bread and take the cup in his hands. (Decision of the Court of Arches reversed.)

Semble, that evidence that persons sitting immediately behind the officiating minister could not see him perform the manual acts mentioned is not sufficient to establish the charge of illegality.

It is not unlawful for the minister to use in the administration of the communion bread made in the form of circular wafers, provided that the substance is bread such as is usual to be eaten, and not a composition of flour and water unleavened, such as the word wafer usually denotes. (Decision of the Court of Arches reversed.)

On the top and in the centre of a screen, stretching across a church at the entrance to the chancel, was placed a figure of our Saviour on the cross, in full relief, and about eighteen inches long, facing the congregation.

Held, that the faculty authorising the erection of the screen having been granted without any knowledge that it was to be surmounted by a crucifix, did not authorise the erection of the crucifix, which, therefore, in the absence of a proper faculty, had been unlawfully set up and retained.

Held further (affirming the decision of the Court of Arches), that the ordinary ought not to grant a faculty for the crucifix, it being in danger of becoming the object of superstitious reverence.

Semble, that, in proceedings under the Public Worship Regulation Act, where the only objection to an ornament in a church is, that it has been set up without a faculty, the court will, before pronouncing judgment, give the person charged an opportunity of applying for a faculty.

A previous decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council between other parties, and an Order of the Sovereign in Council founded thereon, is not necessarily conclusive in all similar cases subsequently coming before that tribunal.

Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605) followed as to the vestments, and differed from as to the illegality of the eastward position during the prayer of consecration, and as to the sufficiency of the averment with regard to the wafer-bread.

This was an appeal from a decision of Lord Penzance, sitting as Dean of Arches, in a proceeding brought before him, under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, by three parishioners of St. Peter's, Folkestone. The representation put forward by the complainants is set out in the report of the proceedings in the Court of Arches (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432). The judgment of that court was on all the charges in favour of the complainants. From that judgment, in respect of the charges numbered in the representation 2, 4, 5, and 11 respectively, the present appeal was brought.

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C. A. Charles, F. H. Jeune, and Dr. Phillimore for the appellant.

Dr. Stephens, Q.C. and B. Shaw for the respondents.

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C. for the appellant.—The appeal in this case is on four points. The first point is as to whether certain vestments worn at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion are legal; the second, as to whether the administration of what is known as wafer-bread in celebrating the Holy Communion is legal; the third, as to whether what is known as the eastward position, which means the clergyman's standing with his face to the east while reading the consecration prayer in the communion service, is legal; and the fourth, as to whether a crucifix in a church is legal. As to the first three of these points, the decision of your Lordships in the case known originally as Elphinstone v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 245), and in its later stages as Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605) was conclusive in the court below, and I consequently did not attempt there to argue them. I now ask to be allowed to argue that the decision of your Lordships in respect of those matters was wrong. In support of that request, I would first urge the view taken by the learned judge in the court below, expressed in the following words: "The question of vestments is one which stands in a peculiar position in respect of the judicial decisions of which it has been the subject. Dr. Lushington, Sir John Dodson, and Sir Robert Phillimore have all held what are called the Edwardian vestments to be lawful. By the Court of Appeal in Liddell v. Westerton (Moore's Sp. Rep.), consisting of some of the ablest judges of our time, Lord Cranworth, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Kingsdown, Sir John Patteson, and Mr. Justice Maule, with the late and present Archbishops of Canterbury, it was affirmed in the following words, that "the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used.' . . . The later case of Martin v. Mackenochie (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365) . . . affords not a mere judicial dictum, but a direct authority as to the true meaning of the rubric, judicially announced as the ratio decidendi of the court, and acted upon as the basis of its ultimate decision. With this decision, the subsequent one of Hebbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605), condemning the vestments which are among the 'ornaments' prescribed by the first Book of Edward VI., appears to be directly in conflict. . . . I cannot doubt that, of two judgments delivered in the Appellate Court, which are in any degree inconsistent, I am bound in pronouncing the decision of the inferior court to obey and carry out that which was addressed directly to the matter in issue here, and which also was the last pronounced. As this result was inevitable, the learned counsel have done well, I think, not to argue the question, and as the question has been argued, I forbear to express my own opinion on the subject. I must therefore hold that Mr. Ridsdale has offended against the law in celebrating the communion in a chasuble and in an alb, and admonish him to refrain from doing so in future. If this decision is wrong, it must be corrected by the Appellate Court." Lord Penzance, therefore, is of opinion that there are two conflicting decisions of your Lordships. Secondly, your Lordships have under similar circumstances reconsidered a previous decision. In Fenton v. Hampton (11 Moo. P.C. 347), which turned upon the power of the Legislative Assemblies in the British Colonies to commit for contempt, Pollock C.B., said: "The subject is not new to this court; it has been discussed before on more than one occasion. In the case of Beaumont v. Barrett (1 Moo. P.C. 59), from Jamaica, it was decided that the assembly possessed of supreme legislative authority had the power of punishing contempt. But in the year 1842, the same question, in substance, came before this committee on an appeal from Newfoundland, and was twice argued;" &c. Further, there are in this case special circumstances why your Lordships' decision in Hebbert v. Purchas should not be held conclusive of the points which it decides; namely, that in that case, owing solely to his poverty, Mr. Purchas was not represented by counsel, and that the questions turned upon the result of the most minute investigations of ecclesiastical history, which it would have been almost impossible for their Lordships to have had in their mind without the assistance of the accumulated special labour and learning of which I am the mouthpiece. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Their Lordships are of opinion that you may pursue your arguments on the points you have referred to; and they will consider hereafter how the previous decisions affect the question.] The question of the legality or otherwise of these vestments turns upon the construction to be put upon the words of the ornaments rubric in the present Prayer Book, which is as follows: "That such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of king Edward the Sixth." It is admitted that the words "by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

King Edward the Sixth," refer to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.; and it is further admitted that by that book the vestments in question are lawful. I can therefore put my argument on this part of the case in the form of a syllogism, the very words of the major premias being identical with those used in the judgment in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.): The same dresses and the same utensils as were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used; the vestments in question were used under that Prayer Book: these vestments may therefore still be used. But this Court having taken a different view of the matter in Hebbert v. Purchas, it remains to consider the facts and deductions upon which that view was based. The judgment in that case was based upon the supposition that the vestments in question were forbidden by certain advertisements issued in the reign of Elizabeth, and by the canons of 1604, and the committee appear to have been of opinion that the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. is to be taken as the rule, but subject to any modifications introduced by the advertisements of Queen Elizabeth or the canons of 1604; and consequently that the surplice is lawful, but the chasuble and alb not. Now first, we deny that the advertisements of Elizabeth had the force of law; we say they were mere administrative notices. And we say further, that even if they had the force of law, they had not the intention of forbidding, and do not forbid, the use of the vestments in question, but had a totally different purpose. Secondly, we deny that in consequence of the advertisements of Elizabeth these vestments were discontinued; and we shall show that they were all destroyed and discontinued before the advertisements were issued. Thirdly, we deny that the Prayer Book of James I. received its authority from the canons of 1604. Fourthly, we deny that the ornaments rubric in the Prayer Book of 1662 (the one now in use) was a compromise in deference to the objections of the Puritan party at the Savoy Conference in 1661. I will now consider whether the Act upon which we rely has been repealed by subsequent Acts; and this is really a question of history. The Act of Uniformity, 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 1 (1549), prescribed under very heavy penalties the use of the Prayer Book published in June of the same year, and which is known as the first Prayer Book of Edw. VI. That book contained the following rubric: "Upon the day, and at the time appointed for the ministration of the Holy Communion, the priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration; that is to say, a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope. And where there may be many priests or deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the priest in the ministration as shall be requisite; and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albes with tunicles." In 1552, the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. was published, and this, no doubt, left out the above rubric. In 1553, Queen Mary came to the throne, and the services of the Mass were restored. In 1559, the first year of Elizabeth's reign, an Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2) was passed, authorising the Prayer Book of Elizabeth, published in the same year, and imposing penalties of surprising stringency—such, for instance, as imprisonment for life, and which, it may not be generally known, are still in force—on persons not conforming to this book. Now, the Prayer Book of Elizabeth is substantially identical with the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., with this exception; that such ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof, are to be retained and be in use as were prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. To this Act there is a proviso (sect. 25) that the above order as to ornaments shall hold good "until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's majesty, with the advice of the commissioners appointed and authorised under the Great Seal of England for causes ecclesiastical, or of the metropolitan of this realm." But this does not make the Act, or anything in it, in any sense provisional only, as their Lordships seem to have considered in Hebbert v. Purchas. The Act of Elizabeth is spoken of in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Sp. Rep.) as a compromise. If the view here taken is correct, it becomes in the highest degree improbable that a compromise so effected would be disturbed by subsequent Acts of the Legislature in the same reign, or that the Queen (whose taste for a high order of ritual is matter of history) would have consented to any diminution of that amount of ceremonial observance in the Church services which had been conceded to her. In the same year, viz. 1559, were published the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth. They do not bear directly on the question of vestments, but they do so indirectly, and my contention with regard to them is that they had no legislative authority whatever. They are like the Injunctions of Edward VI., which your Lordships have recently held, in Philpotts v. Boyd (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 435), were not legislative but administrative acts. Their extraordinary character is a strong argument against their validity as laws. It could hardly be maintained that the Queen had power to issue orders of this character having the force of law; she undoubtedly had the power to give them administrative force. I submit that the issuing of these injunctions was one of those high handed acts of authority that Elizabeth so frequently indulged in. The interpretations put upon these injunctions by the archbishops and bishops, and published in 1561, have even less colour of authority. (Strype's Ann. vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 2135, and 1 Strype's Parker, p. 183.) The 14th injunction is as to the proper observance of Sunday. The interpretation put upon it by the bishops is as follows: "That incorrigible Arians, Pelagians, or Freewillmen, be sent into some one castle in North Wales, or Wallingford, and there to live of their own labour and exercise, and none other be suffered to resort unto them but their keepers until they be found to repent their errors;" (1 Strype's Annals of the Reformation, pt. 1, 319.) It never could have been law that the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Ely should interpret an injunction as to the observance of Sunday to mean that Arians and others should be confined in Wallingford Castle or North Wales. From 1559 to 1562 there was a very strong Puritan reaction throughout England: (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 244.) The letter of Elizabeth, written on the 22nd Jan. 1561, shows this reaction to have set in, and the Queen's anxiety that the Church services should be conducted with as much reverence and ceremony as conveniently could be. And this letter further shows that the legal advisers of the Crown prepared any document that was to have the force of law. In 1562 was held a synod, which is one of the turning points in the history of the Church of England, it being at the Synod of 1562 that the Thirty-nine Articles were promulgated. A proposition appears to have been framed to the effect that the use of copes, vestments, and surplices, be taken away; but this appears to have been thought too strong and not to have been proposed. Subsequently, a paper embodying certain resolutions seems to have been drawn up, which also is thought to go too far, and is never submitted to the synod. These resolutions leave kneeling at communion optional, and abolish the cross at baptism, organs, and singing in churches, and the cope and surplice. In the end, the proposition that was put to the synod was, that the surplice alone should be worn; and this was lost by a majority of one: (Styrye's Annals, vol. 1, marginal, pp. 315, 317, 334, 337.) It would be impossible, I submit, under the circumstances of the case, to produce more cogent evidence than in 1502 the cope and chasuble were legal. I now pass to the advertisements of Queen Elizabeth. With regard to these, their Lordships in Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.), say: "In the year 1564 appeared the advertisements of Elizabeth. They make order for the vesture of the minister in these words: 'In the ministration of the Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches, the principal minister shall wear a cope, with gospeller and epistoler agreeably, and at all other prayers to be said at the communion table to use no copes, but surplices. That every minister saying any public prayers, or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the church, shall wear a comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish.'" (1 Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 326.) These advertisements their Lordships thought to have been actively in use very shortly after their publication, and were led to think so by an inventory of the ornaments of 150 parishes in the diocese of Lincoln, 1565, 1566, published by Mr. Edward Peacock. Further on in their judgment (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 648) their Lordships say: "The chasuble, alb, and tunicle were swept away with severe exactness in the time of Queen Elizabeth." They refer again and again to the fact that these advertisements were published in 1564, and that in consequence of that publication the ornaments in question were destroyed throughout Lincolnshire. The sole authority on which they rely for these facts being Peacock's Inventory. Now I shall be able to show your Lordships that these advertisements were not issued till 1566, and that consequently the destruction of ornaments described in Peacock's Inventory could not possibly have taken place under the authority of these advertisements. [Having quoted authorities on this point he proceeded:] The vestments, therefore, were disused, not by reason of the authority of the advertisements, but by reason of their unpopularity and the powerlessness of the Church against the popular will. As to the advertisements, therefore, first, they are not law at all; secondly, if law, they are not inconsistent with the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. According to that Prayer Book, surplices were ordered to be worn; and by the advertisements obedience to this part of the rubric was specially enjoined. In construing the advertisements quoted above, it is important to consider the effect of the words, "To be provided at the charges of the parish." The vestments had been destroyed; it was not likely, therefore, that the bishops would lay stress upon more expensive or a greater number of vestments than were indispensable; the great object was to get the parishes at all events to provide surplices that the services might be decently performed. There was a second Prayer Book published in the reign of Elizabeth, and this retained the ornaments rubric in the same form as in the first. This rubric, therefore, continued to be printed under the Queen's authority for a quarter of a century after, according to the judgment in Hebbert v. Purchas, it had been repealed by the advertisements. The canons which are supposed to have had the effect of repealing the ornaments rubric are the 24th and 58th. The 24th directs the use of the cope in cathedrals and collegiate churches upon principal feast days, "according to the advertisements for this end, anno 7 Elizabeth." The 58th canon is, "Every minister saying the public prayers, or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the Church, shall use a decent and comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish." They order that a surplice should be worn; they do not order that the other vestments should not be worn. It would be more correct to say that the canons were founded on the Prayer Book, than that it was founded on them. It was suggested to their Lordships in Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.), that these canons prescribed a minimum degree of observance, but they held for various reasons that this could not be maintained. The 14th canon does, however, undoubtedly prescribe such a minimum degree. In the Prayer Book of 1604, daily morning and evening prayer is expressly enjoined; the 14th canon puts a distinct obligation upon the clergyman to read it on holydays. The effect of that is, that the minister is bound to read the service on holydays by both the canons and the rubric; to read it every day only by the rubric. So, by the canons and the rubric, the surplice must be worn; by the rubric alone the other vestments. The single obligation does not repeal the double one. In 1641, a committee of the House of Lords was appointed "to take into consideration all innovations in the Church respecting religion": (Cardwell's Conf., pp. 238, 274; 2 Collier's Ecclesiastical Hist., p. 289.) According to the view taken by that committee, the vestments ordered to be used by Edward VI.'s Prayer Book were still ordered to be used by the book of 1604, as they suggest a question, "Whether the rubric should not be mended where all vestments in time of Divine service are now commanded which were used by Edward VI." The Nonconformist ministers objected to the Prayer Book of 1662, because it sanctioned and continued the vestments of Edward VI.'s rubric: (Cardwell's Conf., p. 311.) The answers of the bishops to the ministers show that they considered that the rubric was continued, as they support the ceremonies of Edward VI. The specific things objected to are the surplice and the cross in baptism; but they are objected to on general grounds, and defended on general grounds. And those general grounds are as applicable to the chasuble and alb as to the surplice. The bishops do not suggest that the statement that the rubric of the second year of Edw. VI. is continued unaltered is incorrect.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

The argument that the word "retained" is not applicable to an obsolete state of things is met by the historical fact that the word "retained" would have been no more appropriately used in reference to the state of things immediately antecedent to the use of the term in the time of Elizabeth than in 1662. It is admitted that these vestments had ceased to be generally used, although there are stray instances of their use up to 1770. But concurrently with their disuse, there is a consensus of authorities asserting their legality. The following authorities were then cited:—Bennett's Paraphrase of the Book of Common Prayer, edit. 1709, and Nichols' Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer, both of which are referred to in Dr. Stephens on the Book of Common Prayer, l. 351; Wheatley's Rationale of the Book of Common Prayer, edit. 1710; Johnson's Clergyman's Vade Mecum, edit. 1715; Gibson's Codex, edit. 1713, pp. 226, 362, 472, &c., 2nd edit., pp. 201, 297, 390; Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 9th edit. 760, iii., 437; Baxter's Life, edit. 1696, Lib. ii., Pt. ii., p. 369, Pt. iii., p. 38. The view of the court in Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.), seems to have been that these vestments could not have ceased to have been used in the face of a highly penal enactment, unless there had been legislative authority for doing so; and they alluded to the case of Macdougall v. Purrier (4 Bli. H. of L. Cas. (N. S.), 433), in which the House of Lords presumed the enrolment in Chancery of a decree of commissioners appointed by an Act of Henry VIII. for settling the tithes in London, although no such enrolment could be found, on the principle, Omnia præsumuntur ritè acta. So far from it being improbable that the practice of wearing vestments would have died out, it is the universal experience in history, and especially ecclesiastical history, for customs to fluctuate, and the legal give place to the usual. Secondly, as to the legality of wafer bread at communion. The objection is to the shape of the bread. My short answer is that the Prayer Book prescribes no particular shape. There is no charge of using anything other than bread, the words in the charge being "bread or flour in the form of circular wafers." [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you raise a dispute of fact as to whether it was bread?] It was bread. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do I understand you to say that it really was leavened bread?] The term "bread" does not necessarily imply leavened bread. The charge here is copied verbatim from that in Hebbert v. Purchas. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—You will of course take your own course; but we think it right to point out to you that the gravamen of the charge being the use of the wafer as distinct from the bread, and the use of the wafer being admitted, it may be contended on the other side that there is a substantial charge to be met.] As a proposition of law, supposing the wafer to be ordinary bread, there is nothing illegal in its thinness and circular form; and, as a proposition of fact, the evidence fails to prove that the substance seen by the witnesses or composing the wafer is anything else but common bread. The word "wafer" is not a description of substance but of form. It is used to describe anything that is thin and round, of whatever material. The rubric of the present Prayer Book is as follows: "And to take away all occasion of dissension and superstition which any person hath or might have concerning the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread is such as is usual to be eaten; but the best and purest wheat bread that may conveniently be gotten." The rubrics in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., in that of Elizabeth, and in that of James I. are the same as this, with two exceptions, that after the word "eaten" occur the words "at the table with other meals," and that the words "all occasion of dissension and" are omitted. One of the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, which were issued between the 1st and 24th June 1559, is as follows: "Where, also, it was, in the time of King Edward VI., used to have the sacramental bread of common fine bread, it is ordered for the more reverence to be given to these holy mysteries, being the sacraments of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, that this same sacramental bread be made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, of the same fineness and fashion round, though somewhat bigger in compass and thickness, as the usual bread and wafer heretofore named singing cakes, which served for the use of the private mass:" (Cardwell's Doc. Ann., I. 202, edit. 1839.) Sir R. Phillimore, in Hebbert v. Purchas, treated this injunction as a contemporary exposition of the rubric in the Prayer Book of Elizabeth. But the Privy Council, in the same case, say that the injunction is a superseding of the rubric, and not at all reconcilable with it. All that the injunction says is that the bread is to be made plain, and round, though somewhat thicker than the wafer known as singing cakes. All that the rubric says is that it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually eaten. Bishop Cosin said "this liberty of using wafer bread was continued in divers churches of the kingdom—Westminster for one—until the 17th of King Charles, A.D. 1643" (Works v. 481.) The following authorities also show that wafer bread was commonly used in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Letters from Archbishop Parker to Sir W. Cecil and to the Bishop of Norwich, 17th of May and 14th of June, 1574, Parker Correspondence, pp. 277, 457, the Lords of the Council and others to the Bishop of Chester, 26th July, 1580; Lord Burleigh and Sir Francis Walsingham to the Bishop of Chester, 21st Aug. 1580, 1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. 18 Doc. xx.; the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church to Archbishop Parker, 1564, 1 Strype's Parker, 364; 1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. 356, Doc. lxxiii., No. 4; 2 Burnet's History of the Reformation. Thirdly, as to the legality of the eastward position of the celebrant at the communion. The legality of the practice in question must depend entirely on the construction of the rubric. The rubric before the communion service directs that the table "shall stand in the body of the church or in the chancel, where morning and evening prayer are appointed to be said. . . . And the priest standing at the north side of the table shall say the Lord's Prayer with the collect following." (All the following rubrics in the communion service read down to the prayer of consecration.) That is the whole direction, and the questions are what is meant by "the north side of the table," "before the table," and "before the people." One of the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, regarding tables in churches, orders "that the holy table in every church be decently made, and set in the place where the altar stood, and there commonly covered, as thereto belongeth, and as shall be appointed by the visitors, and so to stand, saving when the communion of the sacrament is to be distributed; at which time the same shall be so placed in good sort within the chancel, as whereby the minister may be more conveniently heard of the communicants in his prayer and ministrations, and the communicants also more conveniently and in more number communicate with the said minister. And after the communion is done, from time to time the same holy table to be placed where it stood before:" (1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. p. 201.) What Mr. Ridsdale did on this occasion is not forbidden directly or indirectly by the rubrics in question, and his way of performing the service was legal. That there may be other legal modes of performing the service, and indeed that there must be other legal modes, does not affect the proposition. The table may be of any shape, it may be in any position, and it may stand anywhere in the body or main chancel of the church. The rubric before the prayer of consecration in the Second Book of King Edward VI. was as follows: "Then the priest standing up shall say as follows." But in the present Prayer Book this has been altered to "When the priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands, he shall say the prayer of consecration." [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—What meaning would you give to the words "before the table?" If a table is pushed against a wall, the wall is at the back of the table; whoever stood opposite the wall would be before the table. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Supposing the table is in the middle of the church?] Then anyone at the table, whatever side of it he is on, will be equally standing before the table. In the coronation service, which is as old as the 12th century, when the Queen takes the coronation oath, she is described as kneeling before the table or altar. In the case of Martin v. Mackonochie (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365), Mr. Mackonochie was prosecuted for kneeling where the Prayer Book does not enjoin it. The view of this rubric taken by the Privy Council in that case is inconsistent with the view taken of it in Hebbert v. Purchas: (Works of St. Augustine, Book II., and Selborne's Ecclesiastical Law, were also cited during the argument on this point.) The fourth and last point is as to the crucifix. It has been agreed by counsel on the other side to waive the question of the necessity of a faculty, and to argue the point on the broad ground of its legality or illegality as a decoration. [The LORD CHANCELLOR intimated that their Lordships could not consent to consider the question without regard to the absence of a faculty.] A faculty was obtained for the screen, and the crucifix was afterwards added to the screen. The question is, whether this figure is a decoration forbidden by law. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you maintain that if it is a decoration, but not forbidden by law, it does not require a faculty?] No; in that case it is covered by the faculty authorising the screen; if any part of the screen was an unlawful ornament, it would not of course be covered by any faculty. Further, this is a proceeding under the Public Worship Regulation Act, and the only words of that Act that affect the question of a faculty are with reference to ornaments forbidden by law. Other proceedings might be possible with reference to the absence of a faculty. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—What is your view of the 14th section of the Public Worship Regulation Act? That section appears to us to assume the possibility of an objection to the want of a faculty being taken in proceedings under the Act, as it provides a mode of meeting the technical objection.] The words of the Public Worship Regulation Act refer only to decorations forbidden by law. A crucifix is a fitting and solemn decoration for a church, and there is not the slightest danger of its becoming the object of superstitious reverence.

A. Charles followed on the same side.

Dr. Stephens, for the respondents.—The meaning of the word "retained" in the Ornaments Rubric of 1662, must be interpreted on the principles laid down by Blackstone on Statutes, p. 66. It would be a misinterpretation of the statute to apply the word "retained" to the chasuble and alb, such vestments having since 1559 not been used in any parish church in this country, and having been publicly destroyed by authority. The statute 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 10, ss. 1, 5, and the preface in the Book of Common Prayer, "Of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some be retained," illustrates the meaning of the word. In the report of the commission that recommended that this rubric should be altered, the word "continued" is used in the same sense as "retained." Ornaments, as described in the first Book of Edward VI., are not lawful when the services and ceremonies to which they belonged no longer form part of the Book of Common Prayer, but become monuments of superstition. The chrism and the crucifer were enjoined by the first Book of Edward VI., but when the services of which they were a part had been repealed by Parliament and disused in the church, they ceased to be lawful: (Liturgies of Edw. 6, p. 112.) Other ornaments became illegal in the same way. The canons of 1603 show what was the opinion as to the state of the law at that time, and were regarded as so doing, in the question what were the prohibited degrees of marriage, which arose in B. v. Chadwick (11 Q. B. 233, 241). So the Act of Uniformity of 1662 is evidence as to what was then in use, and what was not in use could not be "retained." The adverse user, extending over three centuries, is conclusive on this point, particularly when it is remembered that this adverse user is not secret but open; that it is by authority, the prelates in their visitations being expressly charged to see that everything is done rightly, that it is continuous, and that it has existed without any attempt being made, either through malice or on the part of those who desire to restore a high ritual, to enforce this alleged law imposing the chasuble and alb. By the Ornaments Rubric of the present Prayer Book, two conditions are prescribed as the test of the legality of any ornament, one directly the other by the language used. The first is that it must have been authorised by Parliament in 1549, and the second that it must have been in use in 1662. I submit that these vestments do not apply to the second condition. Secondly, as to the position of the priest during the prayer of consecration. That must depend on the legal position of the table. The whole difficulty has arisen from assuming that the present position of the table is the legal one. This is not so by the Prayer Books of 1552, 1559, 1606, 1662. The rubric gives to the ordinary power to appoint where morning and evening prayers are to be said.

PRIV. CO.]

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

The communion table must be either in the body of the church, or, if in the chancel, then in that part of the chancel where morning and evening prayer are to be said, except when there is no communion. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you carry your argument so far as to maintain that it is illegal to place the Lord's table along the east wall?] Certainly. (Rubric at beginning of communion service read.) The first book of Edward VI. contained no directions as to the placing of the table owing to the fact that it was then fixed to the east wall, where it remained until an order was issued to take down all altars, and set up a table in some convenient part of the church for the purpose of the Holy Communion: (1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. A.D. 1550.) The Order in Council of 1550 required the table to be set up in some convenient place in the chancel. In 1550 the use of the vernacular language in divine service was beginning to be appreciated, and therefore care was taken that everything that was done should be seen and heard. In 1661 the table was usually placed tablewise, that is, from east to west. In 1640 there was an Order of Council enjoining that all clergy should take care that the communion table should stand as it had been long accustomed. The accustomed place referred to was in the body of the chancel. The altarwise position of the table was due to the clergy in opposition to the laity; the Laudian party attached great importance to it: (Charge of the Bishop of Ripon on his third triennial visitation in the autumn of 1876; Cardwell's Doc. Ann. 234; Hebbert v. Purchas (ubi sup.); Report of Parliament Nov. 20th 1604; Proceedings in Kent 1640, published by Camden Society 1861.) [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—There is no charge as to the position of the table in this case, and their Lordships have not therefore to consider it. But suppose a clergyman to be proceeded against for placing the table at the east wall, upon what would you found the charge?] Upon the rubric at the beginning of the Communion Service. The table must be in that part of the chancel where morning and evening prayer are appointed to be said. That is not complied with by placing it at the east wall: (Resolutions of Houses of Lords and Commons of August 27th 1643 referred to.) Therefore, from 1559 to the Restoration of Charles II. the table was not placed altarwise. Did the Act of Uniformity of 1662 change this? The use of the surplice was the only thing complained of by the Puritans at the Savoy Conference; no complaint is made of any alteration in the position of the table. On 4th Aug. 1662 the Puritans still held their benefices, so that in those parishes undoubtedly the table was still kept in its place. Is it probable that the attempt to place the table altarwise having in 1640 excited a great commotion, it could be done in 1662, in the face of the Resolutions of the Houses of Parliament without anything being said? (He referred to the preamble of the Act of Uniformity 1662 and to the Fourth Report to the House of Lords of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as to changes in the rubric.) As to the position of the priest with regard to the table, and the distinction between side and end: (Webster's Dict., sub. v. end; Canons of the Laudian Convocation; 2 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. 252; 4 Rushworth's Parl. Ann. 351; Dean and Chapter of Canterbury to Archbishop Parker 1564; 1 Strype's Parker 364; Bloxham's Architecture; Dean Howson's Before the Table; 4 Cobbett's Parliamentary Hist., pp.

415, 417.) Those who were most opposed to the altarwise position of the table, after the Act of Uniformity of 1662, became merged in the body of Nonconformists; and that explains the table so soon resuming the altarwise position. The laity became negligent and indifferent; the doctrine of the Mass having apparently gone for ever, little importance was attached to the table being again in the position of the altar. That doctrine has now resumed its importance. That "before the table" means in front of it on the west side is mere assumption. If the table was in its legal position, the assumption would not have arisen; "before the table" would then mean facing the table. In Martin v. Mackonochie (ubi sup.) the question was as to the posture of the priest, and the words "before the table" had no bearing on the question. The words "before the table" occur in the Rubric to the marriage service, and in 5 Hall's Fragmenta Liturgica, Non-jurors, pp. 10, 32. From this it would appear that to stand before the table means to stand with the face towards it. "Before" does not mean in front of, but facing; properly placed, the table has no special front. It was one of the charges against Laud, Cosin, and others that they said this Prayer of Consecration with their backs to the people. Cosin defends himself against the charge by denying the truth of it. In translating "Before the people," the Welsh Prayer Book, uses the word which means "in sight of." [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Before you pass to the next point we wish to draw the attention of counsel on both sides to one matter. The Act of Uniformity of Charles provides that the prayers may be said at the universities in Latin; perhaps counsel will ascertain whether any translation was made into Latin for this purpose, and inform us.] In 1665, three years only after 1662, there was a translation of the Prayer Book made by the Dean of Peterborough into Greek, printed at Cambridge, and dedicated to Sheldon, then Chancellor of the University of Oxford. In that, the words "Before the table" are translated ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ τραπέζης and the words, "Before the people" ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ λαοῦ [Sir Fitzjames Stephen subsequently read a letter from Mr. Bright, Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, in which he says that in the Latin translation of the Prayer Book, "Before the table" is translated Ante mensam, and "Before the people," Coram populo]. As to the wafer-bread, I submit that "bread such as is used to be eaten" is a matter both of substance and form, and bread is not usually eaten in the form of circular wafers: (Nichols' Prayer Book, supplement, p. 28, edit. 1712, "Puritan offences against Common Prayer answered.") Our reformers removed the wafer for fear of superstition: (Cardwell's Doc. Ann. p. 254, line 30 Order as to sacramental bread.) By the 20th Canon of the Canons of 1603, fine white bread is ordered to be provided and no allusion is made to wafer bread: (Cardwell's Conf., 3rd edit. 1849, 342, W.) Lastly, as to the crucifix. Sir Fitzjames Stephen divides all ornaments of the church into (1) things used in the service, and (2) architectural decorations. But this division is not exhaustive, as there is a third class which consists of objects of ecclesiastical devotion. To this last class belongs the rood: (1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. 206.) In the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, the figure of Our Saviour placed as charged here was called the rood: (Stow's Annals, p. 206.) In the

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[Priv. Co.]

Exeter Beredos case, the crucifix was not one of the figures on the reredos; that case, therefore, gave no sanction to the erection of a crucifix on the reredos, much less on the screen. What was allowed in Philpotts v. Boyd was allowed on the ground that it had been set up for the purpose of decoration only. The rood has for ages been the object of worship and is therefore in danger of receiving superstitious reverence. He cited 1 Rock's Church of our Fathers, 305; Sarum Missal (edit. 1861); 1 Cardwell's Doc. Annals, p. 7; 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 10, ordering all images to be destroyed; and the words of Mr. Justice Keating with reference to that Act in the Exeter Beredos case.

Sir Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., in reply.

May 12.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The appeal of Ridsdale v. Clifton, in which their Lordships have now to state the recommendation which they propose humbly to make to Her Majesty, is an appeal to Her Majesty in Council brought by the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale, clerk, incumbent, or perpetual curate of St. Peter, Folkestone, against an order or decree pronounced by Lord Penzance, as judge or official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, on the 3rd Feb. 1876. This judgment specified various matters as to which it declared that the appellant had offended against the laws ecclesiastical; but the appeal is brought in respect of four only of these matters, and it is to these only that the observations of their Lordships need be directed. The four matters as to which the appeal complains of the judgment are these:—1. The wearing during the service of the Holy Communion of vestments known as an alb and a chasuble. 2. The saying the Prayer of Consecration in the service of the Holy Communion while standing at the middle of the west side of the Communion Table, in such wise that the people could not see the appellant break the bread or take the cup into his hand. 3. The use, in the service of the Holy Communion, of wafer-bread or wafers, to wit, bread or flour made in the form of circular wafers, instead of bread such as is usual to be eaten. 4. The placing and unlawfully retaining a crucifix on the top of the screen separating the chancel of the church from the body or nave. There were eight other charges against the appellant, as to all of which he was admonished by the learned judge, but as to none of which is there any appeal. Of the four charges which are the subject of appeal, the first three were considered by the learned judge to be covered by the decision of this committee in the case of Hebbert v. Purchas, and by the Order of Her Majesty in Council made in that case; and as to them he did not exercise any independent judgment. The fourth charge, as to the crucifix, the learned judge did not consider to be covered by authority otherwise than indirectly and by implication. Their Lordships have had to consider, in the first place, how far, in a case such as the present, a previous decision of this tribunal between other parties, and an Order of the Sovereign in Council founded thereon, should be held to be conclusive in all similar cases subsequently coming before them. If the case of Hebbert v. Purchas is to be taken as absolutely conclusive of every other case, with the same or similar facts, there can be no doubt that the decision of the learned judge on the first three heads, being in accordance with that of Hebbert v. Purchas, was correct. In Hebbert v. Purchas, the defendant did not appear, either before the Dean of Arches or before the Judicial Committee; but, after the decision of the Judicial Committee was pronounced against him, he presented a petition praying for a rehearing. The Judicial Committee to whom that petition was referred were of opinion that, to have granted such an application would have been to violate the spirit of the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 92, which transferred the powers of the Court of Delegates to the Sovereign in Council, and provided that every judgment, order and decree should be final and definitive, and that no commission should thereafter be granted or authorised to review any judgment or decree made under that Act. All that this decided was the finality of that judgment inter partes; and the propriety of its being held final in that case was the more obvious from the fact that a defendant not appearing in the primary court or on the appeal might be supposed to be lying by, taking the chance of a decision in the first instance, and then trying to get rid of it when it turned out to be unfavourable. The present case, however, raises the question of finality not inter partes, but as against strangers. In the case of decisions of final courts of appeal on questions of law affecting civil rights, especially rights of property, there are strong reasons for holding the decisions, as a general rule, to be final as to third parties. The law as to rights of property in this country is to a great extent based upon and formed by such decisions. When once arrived at, these decisions become elements in the composition of the law, and the dealings of mankind are based upon a reliance on such decisions. Even as to such decisions it would, perhaps, be difficult to say that they were, as to third parties, under all circumstances and in all cases absolutely final, but they certainly ought not to be reopened without the very greatest hesitation. Their Lordships are fully sensible of the importance of establishing and maintaining, as far as possible, a clear and unvarying interpretation of rules the stringency and effect of which ought to be easily ascertained and understood by every clerk before his admission to Holy Orders. On the other hand, there are not, in cases of this description, any rights to the possession of property which can be supposed to have arisen by the course of previous decisions; and in proceedings which may come to assume a penal form, a tribunal, even of last resort, ought to be slow to exclude any fresh light which may be brought to bear upon the subject. It is further to be borne in mind that in the case of Hebbert v. Purchas, the Judicial Committee, although they had before them a learned and able judgment of the then Dean of Arches in favour of Mr. Purchas on the points now raised, had not the advantage of an argument by Mr. Purchas's counsel on those points. These considerations have led their Lordships to the conclusion that, although very great weight ought to be given to the decision in Hebbert v. Purchas, yet they ought, in the present case, to hold themselves at liberty to examine the reasons upon which that decision was arrived at, and if they should find themselves forced to dissent from those reasons, to decide upon their own view of the law. Their Lordships will now proceed to consider the first charge against the appellant, namely, that of wearing an alb and chasuble. They will, however, premise that they do not propose to express any opinion upon the vestures proper to be worn by bishops, as to which separate considerations may arise; and in referring to the dress of the parochial clergy, they will, for greater convenience, use the term "vestments" for the purpose of denoting the alb and chasuble or cope, as distinguished from the surplice. The argument of the appellant on this head, which was very clearly and very forcibly stated, may be thus summed up. The Ornaments Rubric, he contends, in the Revised Prayer Book of 1662 is now the only law as to the vesture of the clergy. It contains within its one sentence all that is now enacted upon that subject. It sweeps away all previous law as to the vesture of the clergy, whether that law was to be found in statute, canon, injunction, or otherwise. It authorises the use of all ornaments which had the parliamentary authority of the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. The vestments in question are among the ornaments which had this parliamentary authority; therefore it authorises the use of the vestments in question. To this reasoning, if the first proposition in the series be correct in point of fact and law, no exception could probably be taken. Their Lordships, however, are unable to accept that proposition. They are of opinion that it is a misapprehension to suppose that the rubric note of 1662 as to ornaments was intended to have, or did have, the effect of repealing the law as it previously stood, and of substituting for that previous law another and a different law, formulated in the words of that rubric note, and of thus making the year 1662 a new point of departure in the legislation on this subject. Before, however, proceeding to trace the history of the law, their Lordships must observe upon the expression in the argument which asserts that the Ornaments Rubric "authorises" the use of the vestments in question. In the opinion of their Lordships, if the only law as to the vesture of the clergy is to be found in the Ornaments Rubric, the use of the vestments of the first Edwardian Prayer Book is not merely authorised, it is enjoined. It is not an enactment ordering the accomplishment of a particular result, and suggesting or directing a mode by which the proposed result may be attained. The sole object of the rubric is to define the mode of performing an existing ministration. If the rubric is taken alone the words in it are not optional, they are imperative; and every clergyman who, since 1662, has failed, or who may hereafter fail, to use in the administration of the Holy Communion the vestments of the first Edwardian Prayer Book has been, and will be, guilty of an ecclesiastical offence rendering him liable to heavy penalties. Any interpretation of the rubric which would leave it optional to the minister to wear or not to wear these vestments, not only would be opposed to the ordinary principles of construction, but must also go to the extent of leaving it optional to the minister whether he will wear any official vesture whatever. If the rubric is not imperative as to the alb, and the chasuble or cope, in the communion office, it cannot be imperative as to the surplice in the other services, or any of them. It is necessary now to ascertain the state of the law before the Act of Uniformity and Rubric of 1662; and then to examine whether any and (if any) what alteration was made by that Act and Rubric. In the first Book of Edward VI. (1549), the directions as to the vestures of the ministers officiating in the public services of the Church (omitting all that relates to hoods and the directions as to bishops) were as follows: In the saying and singing of matins and evensong, baptising and burying, the minister was to use a surplice. In the administration of the Holy Communion the celebrant was to "put upon him a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope," and the assistant-ministers (priests or deacons) were to "have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, namely, albes with tunicles." These directions were omitted from the second Book of King Edward (1552); and instead of them a rubric was inserted immediately before the order for morning prayer in these words: "And here it is to be noted that the minister, at the time of the communion, and at all other times in his ministration, shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope; but . . . being a priest or deacon, he shall have and wear a surplice only." This book was "annexed and joined" to the statute 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 1, and was established as law thereby. King Edward died within a few months after the time appointed (for this statute to take effect, and the reaction under Queen Mary followed. Upon the accession of Queen Elizabeth, the Legislature, reverting to the state of matters which had existed when the second Book of Edward was introduced, determined at once to restore the Liturgy and offices of religion contained in that book, with a few specified alterations, but to leave the question of the vestures of the ministers of the Church open for further consideration. The natural course under these circumstances was that adopted, viz., to "retain" the use of the vestures which had been authorised before 1552, until a final settlement of that question could conveniently be made. No new or revised Prayer Book was annexed to Queen Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2); but the second book of King Edward, "with the alterations and additions therein, added and appointed by this statute," (viz., "one alteration or addition of certain lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Litany, altered and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the sacrament to the communicants," as specified in the 3rd section), was directed to stand and be in full force and effect from the 24th June 1559. The enactment, however, that the second Book of King Edward was to be used, with these alterations and additions, "and none other or otherwise," (sect. 3), was further qualified by the provisos contained in the 25th and 26th sections, of which the former is in these words: "Provided always, and be it enacted, that such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, shall be retained and be in use, as was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI., until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of her commissioners, appointed under the great seal of England for causes ecclesiastical, or of the metropolitan of this realm." In this manner, and not by any textual alteration of the rubrics in the second book of King Edward, the directions as to ornaments of the first book were kept in force until other order should be therein taken, in the way provided by the Act. The authorities whose duty it was to issue to the people, in 1559, a printed Book of Common Prayer, made conformable to the statute, prefixed to the book so issued by them a copy, in extenso, of the Statute of Elizabeth itself; and they also of their own authority, not by way of enactment or order, but by way of a memorandum or reference to the statute, substituted a new admonitory note or rubric for the note immediately preceding the order of morning prayer in the second book of King Edward. That note or rubric, as is pointed out by Bishop Gibson (Codex, Ed. 1761, p. 296), was not inserted by any authority of Parliament. It was meant to be a compendious and convenient summary of the enactment on this subject. If it was an accurate summary, it was merely a repetition of the Act. If it was inaccurate or imperfect, the Act, and not the note, would be the governing rule. It is of importance to bear in mind that the Ornaments Rubric, which it is now contended contains the whole enactment or law relating to the vesture of the clergy, was not, when originally introduced in 1559, and was not meant to be, an enactment at all; and it in fact ended with a reference to the statute 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, set out in the beginning of the Prayer Book, in terms which showed that the rubric claimed no intrinsic authority for itself. The statute, by its 25th section, had enacted that the ornaments of 1549 should be retained and be in use, but only until other order should be therein taken, by the authority of the Queen, with the advice therein mentioned. The enactment was therefore in its nature provisional, and prepared the way for the subsequent exercise of a power reserved to the Queen. If that power was not exercised, the enactment in the 25th clause would remain absolute. If the power was exercised, the order made under the power would not be an order in derogation or by way of repeal of the Act; but the order would be in pursuance of and read into the Act as if that which was done by virtue of the reserved power had originally been enacted in the statute. Did, then, Queen Elizabeth ever take other order within the meaning of the 25th section? Their Lordships do not think it necessary to dwell upon the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, and still less upon the interpretation of those injunctions; because they cannot satisfy themselves, either that the injunctions pointed to the vestments now in controversy, or that they were issued with the advice required by the section of the Act of Parliament. But their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the advertisements (a word which in the language of the time was equivalent to "admonitions" or "injunctions") of Elizabeth, issued in 1566, were a "taking of order," within the Act of Parliament, by the Queen, with the advice of the metropolitan. It is not disputed that these advertisements were issued with the advice of the metropolitan, and, indeed, also with the advice of the Commissioners for causes ecclesiastical; but it is said that they were not a taking of order by the Queen. The Queen had in the most formal manner, by her royal letters, commanded the metropolitan and other prelates to prepare these advertisements, directing them "so to proceed by order, injunction, or censure, according to the order and appointment of such laws and ordinances as were provided by Parliament, and the true meaning thereof, so as uniformity of order might be kept in every church, and without variety or contention." There was no particular form required by statute or by law in which the Queen was to take order, and it was competent for her Majesty to do so by means of a royal letter addressed to the metropolitan. The advertisements were issued by the prelates as orders prepared under the Queen's authority. Immediately after their issue, on the 21st May, 1566, Grindal, Bishop of London, writes (MS. from Dom. Eliz., vol. 39, No. 76) to the Dean of St. Paul's, requiring him to put them in force, and stating that they were issued by the Queen's authority, and that he (Grindal) would proceed to deprive any who should disobey them. The Articles of Archbishop Parker (1 Card. Doc. An. 320) speak of them as advertisements set forth "by public authority." In 1583, in articles presented to the Queen (163 State papers, Domestic. No. 31) herself by the archbishop and some of the bishops, they are referred to as the "Book of Advertisements," and in the margin as the "advertisements set out by her Majesty's authority." Against this it is said that there is, nevertheless, other matter in the "Parker Correspondence" (lately for the first time published in a collected form, though it was partially known to some historical writers of the last century, who drew from it similar inferences), from which it ought to be inferred, as a matter of fact, that the Book of Advertisements was published without Queen Elizabeth's sanction. Their Lordships cannot lend any countenance to the suggestion that the legitimate inference to be drawn from the tenor and language of public documents, from the acts done under them, and from the public recognition of their authority, could in any case be controlled by expressions found in a correspondence of this character. As, however, much of the argument against the authority of the advertisements was founded on this correspondence, their Lordships think it right to say that they draw from the correspondence, as a whole, a conclusion opposite to that in support of which it was referred to. The first draft of the Book of Advertisements was prepared by the archbishop and his colleagues very soon after the receipt of the Queen's letter of the 25th Jan. 1564-5, in the form of an order running in the Queen's name; and it appears, from passages in several letters, that they wished the civil power to undertake as much as possible of the formal responsibility of promulgating and enforcing the proposed new order, and that they anticipated very great difficulty if, without that support, the principal share of the burthen should be thrown upon the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. An opposite view, however, prevailed at court, where some of the Queen's Ministers and courtiers were more favourable than she was herself to the views of the puritans, and where it was as well understood as it was by the archbishop that the measure would encounter much unpopularity and opposition, so far as it was contrary to those views. It further appears that in the first draft of the book (which is printed at length in the Appendix to Strype's "Life of Parker," No. 28, p. 84), there were several doctrinal articles, and other articles (about the temporalities of bishops, the employment of schoolmasters, and the dissolution of marriages within the prohibited degrees), which were afterwards omitted, and the legality of all or some of which, under any powers then vested in the Crown, might have been more than doubtful.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[Priv. Co.]

That the archbishop knew that no new "order" could legally be taken by the sole authority of himself and his brother commissioners, is abundantly clear. When, on the 8th March, 1564-5, he sent the first draft to Secretary Cecil to be submitted to the Queen he wrote: "If the Queen's Majesty will not authorise them, the most part be like to lie in the midst for execution of our parts; laws be so much against our private doings." That draft was not approved; he sent it again a year afterwards (12th March 1565-6), with a letter containing this passage: "And where once, this last year, certain of us consulted and agreed upon some particularities in apparel (when the Queen's Majesty's letters were very general), and for that by statute we be inhibited to set out any constitutions without licence obtained of the Queen, I sent them to your honour to be presented. They could not be allowed then, I cannot tell of what meaning; which I now send again, humbly praying that, if not all, yet so many as be thought good may be returned with some authority, at the least way for particular apparel; or else we shall not be able to do so much as the Queen's Majesty expecteth for us to be done." That the Archbishop, both from his communications (in every stage of this business) with the Secretary of State (whose answers to him do not appear in the correspondence), and also from personal interviews with the Queen, must have had the Queen's pleasure distinctly made known to him, is no less certain. In a letter dated the 12th April 1566, he gives an account of an audience which he had on the 10th March preceding (exactly two days before his letter of the 12th March to Cecil), when he had explained to the Queen the difficulty of enforcing the uniformity desired by her Majesty. "I answered, that these precise folk would offer their goods and bodies to prison rather than they would relent, and her Highness willed me to imprison them." In his official letter to Grindal, dated the 28th March 1566, inclosing the book of advertisements, he refers to another interview which they had both then recently had with the Queen by her own command, in which she charged them "to see her laws executed, and good orders decreed and observed." In the letter which he wrote on the same 28th March to the Secretary of State, submitting the advertisements in their final form (together with the draft of the letter to Grindal) for approval, he says: "I pray your honour to peruse this draft of letter and the book of advertisements, with your pen, which I mean to send to my Lord of London. This form is but newly printed, and yet stayed till I may hear your advice. I am now fully bent to prosecute this order and to delay no longer, and I have weeded out of these articles all such of doctrine, &c., which, peradventure, stayed the book from her Majesty's approbation, and have put in but things advantageous, and, as I take them, against no law of the realm." They could only be "against no law of the realm" if they were issued by the Queen's authority. For what purpose were they sent to Cecil, except to obtain that authority for their promulgation, in the form and manner proposed? It is true that the words follow (which were relied upon by the appellant's counsel): "And where the Queen's Majesty will needs have me assay with mine own authority what I can do for order, I trust I shall not be stayed hereafter, saving that I would pray your honour to have your advice to do that more prudently, in this common cause, which must needs be done." Their Lordships understand by this that the Queen had determined that the new order, made with her authority and approbation, should be enforced by the Metropolitan, through the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, without aid from the Privy Council or the secular power; not that the new order itself was to be without warrant, except from the sole authority of the Metropolitan, to whom, without the authorisation of the Crown, the law had given no power to make any such order. The facts that this duty was undertaken by the Archbishop reluctantly and possibly against his own judgment, that his wishes and opinions were on several points overruled, and that the book of advertisements was promulgated, not in the form which he would have preferred, but in that imposed upon it by the Royal will, all tend to prove that it was promulgated in that form with, and not without, the Queen's authority. If, indeed, the legal effect of the advertisements were to be judged of (as their Lordships do not think it ought to be) by the private opinion of Archbishop Parker, there is in the correspondence distinct evidence that Parker, after the advertisements were issued, considered them to be an execution of the statutory power. Writing to the Lord Treasurer, Nov. 15, 1573 (Correspondence, p. 450), seven years after the advertisements were issued, he says: "The world is much given to innovations, never content to stay to live well. In London our fonts must go down. . . . I do but marvel what some men mean . . . with such alteration, when order hath been taken publicly this seven years by commissioners, according to the statute, that fonts should not be removed." The advertisements had ordered (1 Card. Doc. Ann. 326), "that the fonte be not removed," and this circumstance, and the expressions "order taken," "this seven years," and "Commissioners" (the advertisements having been signed by the bishops as commissioners), make it clear that Parker was referring to the advertisements. But the advertisements could not have been a "taking of order publicly" "according to the statute" unless they had the direct authority of the Queen. Their Lordships now turn to the part (Card. Doc. Ann.) of the Book of Advertisements which deals with the vestures of the ministers. It is in these words:—"In the ministration of the Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches, the principal minister shall wear a cope, with gospeller and epistoller agreeably; and, at all other prayers to be said at that Communion Table, to use no copes, but surplices. That the dean and prebendaries wear a surplice with a silk hood in the choir; and, when they preach, to use their hoods. Item, that every minister saying any public prayers, or ministering the sacraments, or other rites of the church, shall wear a comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish." It was not seriously contended that albs or chasubles could, in any reasonable or practical sense, or according to any known usage, be worn, or could be meant to be worn, concurrently with the surplice. If, therefore, the use of the surplice, at the administration of the Holy Communion, was rendered lawful and obligatory by these "Advertisements," the use of albs or chasubles, at that administration, was thereby rendered unlawful. Their Lordships do not forget that the Book of Advertisements also contains orders upon other distinct subjects not within the 25th section of the statute; as to some of which it was suggested in argument that the Queen had no legislative power. But this, whether the suggestion be well or ill-founded, is, for the present purpose, immaterial. The proof of the subsequent reception and enforcement as law of the order established by the Book of Advertisements as to the vestures of the ministers of the church in the administration of the Holy Communion throughout the Church of England from 1566 to the Great Rebellion, and again between the Restoration and St. Bartholomew's Day in 1662, is complete. After 1566, vestments, albs, and tunicles (copes also, in parish and non-collegiate churches) are mentioned in the official acts of the bishops and others, performed in the public exercise of their legal jurisdiction, only as things associated with superstition, and to be defaced and destroyed. They were so treated by a Royal Commission sent to Oxford by Queen Elizabeth in 1573, and by the Visitation Articles of Archbishops Grindal and Sandys (York, 1571 and 1578); and Abbot and Laud (1611 and 1637); of Bishops Aylmer, Bancroft, and King (London, 1577, 1601, and 1612), and others. The surplice, on the other hand, in a long series of Visitation Articles (sometimes accompanied by injunctions) of not less than thirty-two archbishops and bishops, of sixteen dioceses in England, commencing with Archbishop Parker in 1567 (1 Card. Doc. Ann. 320), and ending with Bishop Juxon in 1640 (2 Rep. Rit. Com. 589), besides those of various archdeacons, is consistently treated as the vesture required by law to be used by all ministers of the church, not only in their other ministrations, but expressly in the administration of both Sacraments. Among the most stringent in this respect are the articles of Bishops Andrewes, Overall, and Wren. After the Restoration (if, as seems probable, the visitations of Cosin and other bishops in 1662, whose articles of that year do not expressly refer to the Act 13th and 14th Car. 2, c. 4, were held under the state of the law prior to that Act), we have not only Bishop Cosin (Works, v. 4, 509, 510), but Bishops Ironside of Bristol, Morley of Winchester, and eight others of as many dioceses (whose articles of 1662 are stated in the Appendix to the second Report of the Ritual Commissioners to have been the same on this point with those of Morley), all administering strict inquiries, to the same effect. This, however, is not all. There is direct proof in the same class of documents, and in others of a still more public and authoritative kind, that the advertisements were accepted as law, as having the Queen's Authority. In a visitation held in 1569, Bishop Parkhurst, of Norwich, inquired (not expressly mentioning the surplice), "Whether your Divine service be said or sung in due time and reverently, and the sacraments duly and reverently ministered in such decent apparel as is appointed by the laws, the Queen's Majesty's Injunctions, and other orders set forth by public authority in that behalf." That he was referring to the advertisements, and "by public authority" meant the authority of the Queen, seems clear from one of his "Injunctions to the Clergy" (the fourth), at the same visitation, about perambulations, where he orders the clergy on those occasions not to use surplices or superstitious ceremonies, "but only give good thanks, and use such good order of prayers and homilies as be appointed by the Queen's Majesty's authority in that behalf." The use of homilies at perambulations was prescribed, not by the Injunctions of 1559, but by the advertisements. Bishop Cox, of Ely, in his injunctions issued between 1570 and 1574, directed "that every parson, vicar, and curate shall use in the time of the celebration of Divine service to wear a surplice, prescribed by the Queen's Majesty's Injunctions and the Book of Common Prayer; and shall keep and observe all other rights and orders prescribed in the same Book of Common Prayer, as well about the celebration of the sacraments, as also in their comely and priestly apparel, to be worn according to the precepts set forth in the book called Advertisements. And in his accompanying Articles he inquired, "Whether any, licenced to serve any cure, do not wear at the celebration of the Divine service and sacraments, a comely surplice, and observeth all other rites and orders prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and the Queen's Majesty's Injunctions, and in the Book of Advertisements?" Archbishop Grindal, in his Gloucester Articles of 1576, ordered the clergy "not to oppose the Queen's injunctions, nor the ordinations, nor articles made by some of the Queen's Commissioners" (naming those who subscribed the advertisements), "January 25th, in the seventh year of the Queen's reign." (The date is that of the Queen's letter mentioned in the advertisements, not that of the promulgation of the book itself.) This alone seems to have been thought by Strype (1 Life of Parker, 319), an historian sometimes cited for a contrary purpose, sufficient proof that the Queen must in the end have authorised the publication of the advertisements. Archbishop Whitgift, in his celebrated Articles of 1584 (1 Card. Doc. Ann., 413), enjoined "that all preachers and others in ecclesiastical orders do at all times wear and use such kind of apparel as is provided unto them in the Book of Advertisements and Her Majesty's Injunctions, anno primo." Bishop Thornborough, of Bristol, in 1603, inquired "whether at any time, and during the whole celebration of Divine service and ministration of the sacraments, in every your churches, your parson, vicar, or curate doth wear a surplice, according to the terms and statutes of this realm of England in that behalf provided; and how often default hath been made herein and by whom?" In another article as to perambulations he inquires whether the clergy say "the prayers and suffrages appointed" for that ceremony, "according to the late Queen's Majesty's Injunctions in that behalf provided, and according to the Book of Advertisements?" The Book of Advertisements was referred to as of legal authority in several of the canons of 1571; showing, though these canons were not confirmed by the Crown, nor, apparently, ever put in force, the sense and understanding at that time, while the matter was still recent, of the bishops and clergy of the whole Church of England represented in the convocations of both provinces. The 24th and 25th canons of 1603-4 repeated, with express reference to the advertisements, as already containing the rule to be followed ("according to the advertisements published anno 7 Eliz." Juxta Admonitiones in Septimo Elizabethae promulgatas) the substance of the directions contained in the advertisements, as to the use of surplices, &c., in cathedral and collegiate churches; and the 58th Canon, which relates to the use of surplices at the administration of the Holy Communion in parish churches, followed, with scarcely any variation, the exact words of the advertisements on the same subject. The convocations which passed those canons thought them consistent with others (the 14th, 16th, and 58th), which enjoined the strictest possible conformity with the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, without addition, omission, or alteration; a view quite sound and correct, if the advertisements were a legal exercise of the statutory power given to the Crown by 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25; but, on the contrary supposition, erroneous, and untenable. The Canons of 1603-4 received the Royal Assent; so that on that occasion there was the most formal, solemn, and public concurrence possible, of the Crown and the Convocation of both provinces, in that understanding of the law, which had been acted upon for nearly fifty years by all the executive authorities of the church. The Canons of 1640 (also confirmed by the Crown), which mention "Queen Elizabeth's injunctions and advertisements," carry on the public evidence of the same understanding down to the time of the Great Rebellion; and the divines consulted by the Lords' Committee of 1641 (Card. Conf., 273) alleged that the High Church party "pretended, for their innovations, the injunctions and advertisements of Queen Elizabeth," denying, indeed, that either the injunctions or the advertisements were in force, "but by way of commentary and imposition;" but not disputing that the advertisements had such authority as Queen Elizabeth by law could give them. To this it may be added that Hooker, the greatest ecclesiastical writer between 1566 and the protectorate, describes the advertisements as "agreed upon by the bishops, and confirmed by the Queen's Majesty." (3 Hooker's Works, by Keble, 6th edit., p. 587.) Cosein (although, in a passage which will afterwards be referred to, he appears to have at one time supposed that the conditions of the statute had not been duly complied with), speaks of them (5 Works, p. 90) as made under the Queen's reserved authority and Wren (Parentalia, p. 75) as "Advertisements; authorised by law (1 Eliz. c. 2, sect. penult.*)" From all these facts, the conclusion drawn by this committee in Hebbert v. Purchas, that the advertisements of Queen Elizabeth on this subject had the force of law under 1 Elizabeth c. 2, s. 25, appears to their Lordships to be not only warranted, but irresistible. Nor is the weight of these facts diminished by the circumstance (which was, in the opinion of their Lordships, established by the appellant's counsel), that the extensive destruction of albs, vestments, and copes, mentioned in Mr. Peacock's book, and spoken of in the judgment of Hebbert v. Purchas as if it had been later than the promulgation of the advertisements, really preceded that event. The same causes which had led to the destruction, irregularly and without law, of a particular kind of ornaments, as to which the law, in its then provisional state, was at variance with the sentiment of the moderate, as well as of the extreme, section of the clergy of the Reformed Church, would naturally suggest the expediency of taking such order, upon the first convenient opportunity, as would give legal sanction to the disuse of those ornaments. Reading, then, as their Lordships consider they are bound to do, the order as to vestures in the book of advertisements, into the 95th section of the 1 Eliz. c. 2, and omitting (for the sake of brevity) all reference to hoods, it will appear that that section, from the year 1566 to 1662, had the same operation in law as if it had been expressed in these words: "Provided always that such ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI., except that the surplice shall be used by the ministers of the church at all times of their public ministrations, and the alb, vestment, or tunicle shall not be used, nor shall a cope be used except at the administration of the Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches." It is clear that, during the whole of this period, except during the interregnum of the Civil War and the Protectorate, when the episcopal government of the church and the use of the liturgy were interrupted, this state of the law was generally understood, acted upon, and enforced by authority. It is also clear that throughout this long period the Ornaments Rubric, as originally printed in the Prayer Book of Queen Elizabeth, was allowed to remain unaltered. This, then, being the state of the law up to and in 1662, and the Ornaments Rubric, up to and at that time, not being in any sense a complete and independent enactment, but being merely a reference to an external law, namely, the statute of 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, the question has now to be asked, was it the intention and was it the effect of the alteration in the Ornaments Rubric in 1662, to repeal the 25th section of the statute of Elizabeth, and all that had been done under it, and to set up a new and self-contained law on the subject of ornaments? The history of the revision of the Prayer Book is strongly opposed to such a conclusion. The Puritans, in their 18th General Exception at the Savoy Conference, stated various objections of principle to ceremonies in the church, especially as to three matters: (1), the surplice; (2), the sign of the cross in baptism; and (3) kneeling at the Holy Communion. Following up their general "exceptions" with objections in detail to particular parts of the Book of Common Prayer, they said, commenting on the Ornaments Rubric, as it stood before the revision of 1662: "Forasmuch as this rubric seemeth to bring back the cope, albs, &c., and other vestments forbidden by the Common Prayer Book, 5th and 6th Edw. VI., and for our reasons alleged against ceremonies under our 18th General Exception, we desire it may be wholly left out." Baxter (History of Life and Times, cap. 8, p. 155) seems to treat the objection as having been founded on the words in the rubric "at the time of the communion." "They excepted," he says, "against that part of the rubric which, speaking of the sacraments to be used in the church, left room to bring back the cope, albe, and other vestments." The words, "seemeth to bring back," assumed that those vestures of the first Book of King Edward were not practically in use under that rubric. The words did not suggest—and they would have been erroneous if they had suggested—more than that the rubric had the appearance of giving them some legal authority. The real substance of the objection was in the reference to the 18th General Exception, and in the request that the whole rubric might be omitted, with the object, manifestly, of getting rid of the surplice. The bishops do not appear to have considered the suggestion about "seeming to bring back," &c., worthy of particular notice. It would have been easy to answer it by showing that, under the statute to which that rubric referred, the surplice had been legally substituted for the alb, &c. But knowing that the surplice itself was the only thing really in controversy, they contented themselves with saying: "For the reasons given in our answer" (in which they had defended ceremonies generally, and the surplice particularly, but had said nothing about copes, albs, or vestments) "to the 18th General Exception to which you refer us, we think it fit that the rubric continue as it is." Although the bishops would not yield on this point, it could not have been their intention, when they "thought it fit that the rubric should continue as it was," to abolish the use of the surplice, and restore the ancient vestures, in any office in which, as the law then stood, the surplice was the vesture proper to be used. No one who holds in respect the memory of the Ecclesiastical Legislature of that day (whose revision of the Prayer Book was accepted by Parliament, almost sub silentio) could impute to them a deliberate intention covertly to alter the substance of the law as to the vestures of the clergy (which they had in the conference declared their intention to leave unchanged), by changes apparently verbal and trivial, in a rubric possessing down to that time no legislative authority, and on which they themselves, as will be seen in the sequel, never meant to act, and never did act, in any such sense. The declarations of the Legislature which bear upon this question are, (1), the recitals in the preamble of the Act of 1662, and in the second section of that Act; and (2) the preface to the Prayer Book. The preamble of the Act of 1662 recites that the commission on which the annexed book was founded had been ordered "for settling the peace of the church, and for allaying the present distempers, which the indisposition of the time had contracted." The restoration of vestures which had not been in use for nearly a hundred years, and had become associated, not in the popular mind only, with the idea of superstition, cannot well be supposed to have been contemplated by the Legislature as a change conducive to the peace of the church, or to agreement within its pale, even when that pale might have been contracted by the secession of those from whom conformity was not to be looked for. And if it had been intended not merely to continue an existing and well-known state of things, but to revive usages long obsolete, and to prohibit all things previously in legal use, which were not prescribed by the first book of King Edward, it can hardly have been expected that the desired certainty of rule, and agreement in practice, would have been attained by a vague reference to a Prayer Book not generally accessible. Of the "preface" to the book of 1662 it is to be observed (1) that it disallows, as without warrant in law, the practical interruption, during the Rebellion and the Protectorate, of the use of the Liturgy, "though enjoined by the laws of the land, and those laws never yet repealed;" (2) that none of the general reasons thereby assigned for the revision, and for the alterations then made, are such as to make it at all probable that for any of those reasons the old vestures would be restored; and (3) that a comparison of the new language with the old is thereby expressly invited, for the purpose of arriving at a just view of the reasons for particular changes: "If any man, who shall desire a more particular account of the several alterations in any part of the Liturgy, shall take the pains to compare the present book with the former, we doubt not but the reason for the change may easily appear." Entering then upon the comparison so invited, the first material observation is that, on the one hand, the statute 1 Eliz., c. 2, is reprinted at the beginning of the book as an unrepealed and effective law, and, indeed, is transcribed in the manuscript book approved and signed by the two convocations; and, on the other hand, the Ornaments Rubric of 1662 occupies the same place, and prima facie retains the same general office and character which it had in the former book, in which, as has been already said, it was a note of reference to an external law, namely, that contained in the 25th section of the statute, still printed at the beginning of the book. Their Lordships cannot look upon this rubric as being otherwise than what it was before, a memorandum or note of reference to that law. Except for its new Parliamentary authority (which is a matter scarcely entering into the comparison of the old with the new language), it would certainly be so. It is true that the former express reference to the Act of Elizabeth at the end of the rubric is omitted. But, on the other hand, the Act itself is exhibited as a law still in force, and the effect and the obvious purpose of all the changes in the wording of the rubric (with a single exception) is to make it, as far as it goes, a mere extract from, and a simple repetition of the words of, that Act. The important words of the Act, "until other order shall be therein taken," &c., are not now for the first time left out; the former rubric had also stopped short of them when it could not possibly control their legal effect. If the manuscript alterations in the handwriting of Sancroft acting as Cosin's secretary (much dwelt upon by the appellant's counsel), could for this purpose be accepted as evidence, they would prove, as a matter of fact, that the change was made because (in the language of the manuscript) "these are the words of the Act itself." Their Lordships do not think that such evidence is admissible; but the same reason is legitimately to be inferred from the comparison suggested by the preface to the Prayer Book. It is easy to understand why the words of the Act should be as closely as possible adhered to, if those words, as found in that Act, were still the law authoritatively governing the matter. The words "shall be retained and be in use" were not in the former rubric, but they were in the statute. If intended as a mere extract from the statute, or to continue and carry forward in 1662 the use of those things which were then actually, or in contemplation of law, in use under that statute, they are apt and appropriate; but if it was meant to bring back an old and long-disused state of things, by making the Rubric of 1662, for that purpose, a new point of departure, which repealing the 25th section of 1 Eliz. c. 2, and all that had been done under it, the substitution of this particular language for the words of the former rubric, "the minister shall use," &c., and the recurrence to the exact phraseology of the enactment about to be superseded, would seem to be the most inappropriate way conceivable of accomplishing that object. The only other alteration (which is also the single deviation in the Rubric of 1662, as far as it goes, from the language of the 25th section of 1 Eliz. c. 2) is this. In that section the words were, "such ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as was in this church," &c. The rubric in use before 1662 was that of 1559, as reprinted in the book of 1603-4, which said: "The minister, at the time of the communion, and at all other times in his ministration, shall use such ornaments in the church as were in use," &c. In the Rubric of 1662 they are, "such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained and be in use as were in this church," &c.; the words, "at all times of their ministration," being interpolated into the context, of which the rest is extracted from the Act of Elizabeth. What is the reason for this change, discoverable (according to the rule of the preface to the Prayer Book) from a comparison of the new language with the old? The old language (i.e., that of the former rubric) seemed to imply a distinction which really existed when it was used in 1559, between the ornaments of the minister at the time of the communion and his ornaments at other times in his ministration, and the objection at the Savoy Conference as understood by Baxter (than whom no one was better acquainted with all that passed) seems to have been to an apparent recognition or admission of this distinction. That distinction, in all parish and non-collegiate churches, had been abolished by the advertisements and the practice under them. The new words (though not incapable of being read distributively, if and so far as such a distinction might still continue in law), ceased to imply, or to seem to imply, any such distinction. If the words of the statute had been in this place simply followed, there would have been less force in the alteration; but these words, "at all times of their ministration," are put in as if to give emphasis to the change, and to direct attention to the fact that, in the then state of the law, the use of the same vestures by the minister, at all times of his ministration, was the ordinary and the general rule. Such a change of language here would have been most extraordinary if it had been intended to recur in all the churches of the kingdom to those distinctions to which the advertisements had put an end, but which the terms of the former rubric seemed to recognise. On the other hand, it was a natural change of language, if the object was to remove some part, at least, of the ground for the Puritan objection, that the former rubric "seemed to bring back" the abolished vestures. This explanation of the change is, in fact, the only one which is in harmony with or which could justify the note or list of alterations in the book now deposited in the Library of the House of Lords, "out of which was fairly written (Lords' Journal, April 10, 1662) the Book of Common Prayer subscribed on the 20th Dec. 1661, by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and which book, so subscribed, was by those Convocations "exhibited and presented" to the King, and sent by the King to the House of Lords on the 25th Feb. 1661-2. This original book, from which the transcript was thus made, contains the actual record of all alterations and additions made by the Convocations, clearly written in manuscript into a printed Prayer Book of 1636, and at the beginning a tabular list of the material alterations. It was delivered by the House of Lords to the House of Commons as the authority for the book "fairly written" which was to be referred to in the Act (Lords' Journal, April 10, 1662); and it is impossible to doubt that the tabular list of alterations contained in it was inserted for the purpose of enabling the changes which Parliament was asked to sanction to be well understood. This tabular list sets out in parallel columns all the material changes which had been made from the old form, among which no mention of the rubric in question occurs, and there is then a note added in these words: "These words are all ye materiall alterations, ye rest are only verbal, or ye changing of some rubricks for ye better performing of ye service, or ye new moulding some of ye collects." To repeal in 1662 the 25th section of the statute of 1 Eliz., and the order taken under its authority, would have required either a clear and distinct repealing enactment, or an enactment inconsistent and irreconcilable with the former law. It was admitted in the argument, and indeed could not be denied, that the statute of Elizabeth was not repealed in terms; and it is in fact, as has been already observed, set forth as the first enactment in the new Prayer Book. The statute is also beyond question one of those "good laws and statutes for the uniformity of prayer and administration of the Sacrament," which by the 24th section of the Act of 1662 are declared to "stand in full force and strength, to all intents and purposes whatsoever for the establishing and confirming" of the new book, and which are thereby directed to be "applied, practised, and put in use for the punishing of all offences contrary to the said laws, with relation to the book aforesaid, and no other." In order to judge whether there is anything inconsistent and irreconcilable between the Ornaments Rubric in the new Prayer Book and the 25th section of the older statute, that section must be read as if the order taken under the section had been inserted in it. And, as so read, their Lordships see nothing inconsistent between the rubric and the section. The rubric served, as it had long previously served, as a note to remind the Church that the general standard of ornaments, both of the church and the ministers, was to be that established by the authority of Parliament in 1549; but that this standard was set up under a law still unrepealed, which engrafted on the standard a qualification that, as to the vestures of parish ministers, the surplice, and not the alb, vestment, or tunicle, should be used. No doubt can be entertained that for nearly two centuries succeeding 1662 the public and official acts of the bishops and clergy of the Church, and of all other persons, were inconsistent with the supposition that the Rubric of 1662 had made any change in the law. During the twenty-five years immediately succeeding the legislation of 1662, we have a series of visitation articles (those of fifteen bishops and one archbishop, of thirteen dioceses, printed either at length or by collation with Bishop Morley's form, in the appendix to the second report of the Ritual Commissioners, pp. 609, 611, 615, 632, 639, 642, 645, 649, 653-4), which prove conclusively that those whose official duty it was to see the law observed, and of whose strictness in the performance of that duty the same articles supply abundant evidence, understood the law still to be that the surplice was always to be used by the clergy officiating in the administration of the Holy Communion. This list does not include any articles of the year 1662 except those of Bishops Hacket, of Lichfield, and Henchman, of Salisbury, who both expressly refer to the Act of Uniformity of that year. Upon the point in question Bishop Hacket inquires in 1662 thus: "Have you a decent surplice, one or more, for your parson, vicar, curate, or lecturer to wear in the time of all public ministrations? Hath he read the Book of Common Prayer as it is enjoined by the late Act of Uniformity for public prayer, administration of the Sacrament, &c., on some Sunday before the 24th Aug. last past, and did and doth he wear the surplice while he performed that office and other offices mentioned in that Common Prayer Book?" (Ibid. p. 609.) Bishop Henchman (Ibid. p. 611) inquires: "Doth your minister, reading Divine Service, and administering the Sacraments, and other rites of the Church, wear the surplice according to the canons?" Subsequently, in 1663, 1664, 1666, 1671, 1672, 1674, 1676, 1677, 1679, 1683, and 1686, articles to the same effect, in different forms, but all equally cogent, were administered by the other prelates, whose visitations have been referred to. Bishop Morley's form, adopted by nine other prelates in those years, and used by himself in 1674 (as he and nine others had also used it in 1662, when the form of the revised Rubric had been settled by the two Convocations, but before it became law), is this: Art. 5 (concerning churches, &c.), "Have you a comely, large surplice for the minister to wear at all times of his public ministration in the Church?" Art. 7 (concerning ministers): "Doth your minister, at the reading or celebrating any Divine Office in your church or chapel, wear the surplice, together with such other scholastical habit, as is suitable to his degree?" (Ibid. p. 615.) Bishop Henchman, in 1664 (then translated to London), and Bishop Pearson, of Chester, in 1674, used this form: Art. 7 (concerning churches, &c.): The same as Bishop Morley's. Art. 4 (concerning ministers): "Doth your minister, in the morning and evening service, in the administration of the Sacraments, and in performing other religious offices appointed by the Church of England, use the respective forms in the Book of Common Prayer, together with all those rites and ceremonies which are enjoined in this Church; and doth he make use of the surplice when he reads Divine Service or administers the Sacraments?" (Ibid., pp. 632-642.) Bishops Morley and Henchman were two of the three prelates (Archbishop Sheldon being the third), who are stated by Baxter (Life and Times, 171-2), to have "managed all things" at the Savoy Conference. Archbishop Sheldon, in his circular letter to the official of his diocese in 1670 (2 Card. Doc. An. 276-9), directs them to require that all parsons, vicars, and curates, "in the time of their officiating, ever make use of and wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood." Archbishop Sancroft, in 1686, also used Bishop Morley's form under the head "Concerning churches;" and under that "Concerning the clergy," his 7th article runs thus: "Doth your parson, vicar, or curate read Divine Service on all Sunday, and publicly administer the Holy Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, and perform all other ministerial offices and duties, in such manner and form as is directed by the Book of Common Prayer lately established, and the Act of Uniformity therewith published... without addition, diminution, or alteration? And doth he in those his ministrations wear the surplice, with a hood or tippet befitting his degree?" (Ibid., p. 654). It was not disputed at the Bar that the subsequent practice in parish and non-collegiate churches till about 1840 or later was uniformly consistent with this view of the law. As public declarations of what was understood to be the state of the law shortly after the completion of the Revision in 1662, their Lordships may refer, in the first place, to the statement of Bishop Sparrow. Sparrow was Bishop of Exeter in 1684. He had been one of the Commissioners at the Savoy Conference. In 1665 he published his "Rationale" of the Book of Common Prayer, which then contained nothing as to the Ornaments Rubric or the ornaments of the minister. In 1684, after the revision, he published a new edition, and thus (p. 377) states the law as then understood. "The minister in time of his ministration shall use such ornaments as were in use in the 2nd Edward VI., Rubric 2, viz., a surplice in the ordinary ministration of the Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches—Queen Elizabeth's Articles, set forth in the seventh year of her reign." Their Lordships may further refer to the alterations proposed by the commissioners of 1689 appointed to revise the Prayer Book, with a view to the relief of Dissenters (H. of Com. Papers, vol. 36, 1854). The Rubric proposed by them to be substituted for the Ornaments Rubric may be taken to be a statement of what, at that time, was understood to be the state of the law: "Whereas the surplice is appointed to be used by all ministers in performing Divine offices, it is hereby declared that it is continued only as being an antient and decent habit. But if any minister shall declare to his bishop that he cannot satisfy his conscience in the use of the surplice, in that case the bishop shall dispense with his not using it," &c. And the "Bill of Comprehension" introduced into Parliament by the king's authority about the same time contained a clause (M.S. in Burnet Papers, Cardw. Conf. p. 457), framed on the same principle. It is abundantly clear that, if any person had imagined that the Prayer Book of 1662 introduced a change on this subject, there were very many who would gladly have acted on it. No instance has been given of any person having acted on it. On the other hand, every one continued to act according to the old law, although, if the argument of the appellant is correct, every one in so doing was acting illegally. The practice,—consistent with the old law, inconsistent with the argument of the appellant,—has been uniform, open, continuous, and under authoritative sanction. What, then, in a question of this nature, is the weight in law of such contemporaneous and continual usage? Their Lordships may take the answer to the question from the words, either of Lord Campbell, in Gorham v. Bishop of Exeter (15 Q. B., 73, 74); or of Chief Baron Pollock in Pochin v. Duncombe (1 H. & N. 856); or of Dr. Lushington in Westerton v. Liddell (Moore, separate Report, 79). Lord Campbell, referring to a statute of 25 Hen. 8, c. 19, said: "Were the language of the statute obscure, instead of being clear, we should not be justified in differing from the construction put upon it by contemporaneous and long-continued usage. There would be no safety for property or liberty, if it could be successfully contended that all lawyers and statesmen have been mistaken for centuries as to the true meaning of an old Act of Parliament." Chief Baron Pollock, with reference to the maxim, "Contemporanea expositio fortissima est in lege," said: "The rule amounts to no more than this, that if the Act be susceptible of the interpretation which has thus been put upon it by long usage, the court will not disturb that construction." Dr. Lushington said: "Usage, for a long series of years, in ecclesiastical customs especially, is entitled to the greatest respect; it has every presumption in its favour; but it cannot contravene or prevail against positive law; though, where doubt exists, it might turn the balance." A Church Rubric, taking the form of directions to be acted on by large numbers of persons from week to week, and from day to day, is a subject above all others for exposition by contemporaneous and continual usage, and the principles laid down in the cases to which their Lordships have referred, fortified as they easily might be by many other authorities, seem to their Lordships to be decisive of the present question. What their Lordships have already said is sufficient to show that, in their opinion, according to the ordinary principles of legal construction and interpretation, the Ornaments Rubric of 1662, on the subject of the vestures of ministers, cannot, any more than the Rubric on the same subject which preceded it, be looked at otherwise than in connection with the Statute of 1 Eliz. c. 2. They may, however, also point out a singular incongruity which might arise from looking at it unconnected with the statute. The Rubric states that such ornaments of the ministers, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained and be in use as were in the Church by authority of Parliament in 1549, that is, under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. But under the Book of 1549, the Rubric as to the vestures in the Communion Service is confined to that office, and the general Rubric at the end of the Book is confined to the saying, or singing, of Matins and Evensong, baptizing, and burying. There does not, therefore, appear in the Book of 1549 to be any imperative direction as to the use of the surplice or any other vesture in the marriage service, in the churching of women, or by ministers assisting the bishop in the office of Confirmation, in the Communion Service, or in the saying of the Litany, which in that book was not connected with Matins or Evensong. These omissions, however, were filled up by the advertisements issued under the statute which provided that every minister saying any public prayers, or ministering the Sacraments, or other rites of the Church, should wear a comely surplice. If, therefore, the Act and the advertisements are read in connection with the Rubric, the use in the latter of the words "at all times of their ministration" may be justified: whereas those words would be inaccurate if applied merely to the Prayer Book of 1549. The learned counsel for the appellant, in the course of their argument, placed considerable reliance on passages in certain books published during the eighteenth, and in the present centuries by writers who, however learned, were not entitled to speak with any legal authority, and some of whom appear to have expressed opinions adverse to the legality of the usage as to the vestures of clergymen, which they admit prevailed up to and at the time at which they wrote. It would, in the opinions of their Lordships, be contrary to well-settled principles of law to admit private opinions to control the legal interpretations of public documents, or the legal inferences from public acts or usage; but it may be not without advantage to point out the circumstances under which the opinion of these writers appear to have been expressed. One of the books referred to by the appellant's counsel was Dr. Thomas Bennett's Paraphrase, with Annotations upon the Book of Common Prayer. The second edition of this book was published in 1709, and the earlier edition (the date of which their Lordships have not observed) must have been still nearer the year 1662. Both editions were published before Cosin's Notes on the Prayer Book were printed, and their Lordship's will, in the first place, refer to those notes, and to the writers who followed. Three sets of Notes on the Prayer Book, as it stood before 1662, by Cosin, were published by Nicholl's in 1710, the first set being supposed to have been written by Cosin some time before, and the two others at different times after, 1630, but all before the revision of 1662. In the first Notes (Cosin's Works, v. 5, p. 42) he had originally suggested that the clergy, as the law then stood, were "all still bound to wear albs and vestments, howsoever it was neglected;" and that the 14th and 58th Canons of 1603-4 were inconsistent with each other. But perceiving, some time afterwards (at what time afterwards is uncertain) that he had, in making that note, overlooked the terms of the statute (1 Eliz., c. 2, s. 25), he added: "But the Act of Parliament, I see, refers to the canon, and until such time as other order shall be taken." In another passage of the same set of notes (Ibid., p. 90), he had distinctly recognised the authority of those articles of the advertisements which relate to this matter, as a due exercise of the powers given to the Crown by that statute, with reference to a point which might depend on sect. 26 rather than on sect. 25. "For cathedral churches," he there says, "it was ordained by the advertisements in Queen Elizabeth's time (that authority being reserved, notwithstanding this book, by Act of Parliament), that there should be an epistoller and gospeller, besides the priest, &c." And, in the execution of his official duty as Archdeacon of the East Riding of York, in 1627, he administered to the churchwardens then under his jurisdiction very stringent articles (not adopted without change from forms previously in use, but revised and altered under his own hand), in which the use of the surplice by the parochial clergy, when administering the Sacraments, was treated as legally necessary, and never to be omitted. (See his Correspondence, published by the Surtees Society, v. 1, p. 106; and Preface; also Works, v. 2, p. 9). In his later notes, and also in his suggested corrections of the Prayer Book, he repeated the view which had been expressed in the uncorrected form of his first note, giving, however, no reason for that opinion, except such as may be inferred from a passage at p. 233 of v. 5 of his works, where, after quoting the words of 1 Eliz., c. 2, s. 25, he says, "which other order, so qualified as is here appointed to be, was never yet made." From this it may be concluded that Cosin's opinion at that time was founded either on some technical view of the informality of the advertisements, or on some conclusions as to matters of fact, with respect to which, as they involved no question of peculiar ecclesiastical learning, his authority was certainly not greater than that of any other man. After the Restoration, Cosin was made Bishop of Durham; and in his Visitation Articles of 1662, already mentioned (which may be assumed, according to the appellant's argument, to have been anterior to St. Bartholomew's Day in that year), he still considered it to be his duty to treat the use of the surplice in the administration of both Sacraments as matter of legal obligation on all the parochial clergy. The result appears to be that the opinions recorded in the private notes of this divine, at different periods of his life, are not consistent with each other; while those of them which are adverse to the validity of the advertisements are inconsistent with his official acts done in the exercise of a legal jurisdiction, and in the discharge of his public duty, both before and afterwards. The private notes of Cosin, however, originally written before 1662, and made known to the public half a century or more after they were written, appear to have been adopted without much examination by writers who followed. Bishop Gibson, in the "Codex" published in 1713, apparently echoing Cosin's words, says: "Which other order (at least in the method prescribed by this Act) was never yet made; and, therefore, legally, the ornaments of ministers, in performing Divine Service, are the same now as they were in 2 Edw. 6." Burn, in his ecclesiastical law, follows Gibson, as Gibson had followed Cosin. Dr. Cardwell, the last author cited, erroneously supposed that there was a judicial decision which had established that an instrument under the great seal was necessary for a due execution of the Parliamentary power, and, for that reason only, he concluded that the book of advertisements had not the force of law. (Cardwell, Confer., p. 38, note). Their Lordships will now refer to the opinion expressed by the other author, Bennett, already mentioned, whose work was published before Cosin's notes were made public. He states (Paraphrases with Annotations upon the Book of Common Prayer, 2nd edit. pp. 4, 5) the Rubrics of 1549, 1559, and 1662, and then proceeds thus: "From hence it seems to follow that the present Rubric, and that of Queen Elizabeth, which are in effect the very same, do restore those ornaments which were abolished by King Edward 6's second book, and which, indeed, have been disused ever since that time. But it must be considered that in the latter part of the Act of Uniformity, 1 Eliz., there is this clause, "until other order," &c.; this clause explains Queen Elizabeth's Rubric, and, consequently, the present one, which is, in reality, the same. So that those ornaments of the church and its ministry which were required in the second year of King Edward were to be retained till the Queen (and, consequently, any of her successors), with the advice before specified, should take other order. Now, such other order was accordingly taken by the Queen in the year 1564, which was the seventh of her reign. For she did then, with the advice of her Ecclesiastical Commissioners, particularly the then Metropolitan, Dr. Matthew Parker, publish certain advertisements, wherein are the following directions: " [He then quotes the advertisements, and afterwards states the canons.]

"From hence it is plain that the parish priests (and I take no notice of the case of others) are obliged to use no other ornaments but surplices and hoods. For these are authentic limitations of the Rubric, which seems to require all such ornaments as were in use in the second year of King Edward's reign. Besides, since from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign down to our own times, the disuse of them has most notoriously been allowed; therefore, though it were not strictly reconcilable with the letter of the Rubric, yet we cannot be supposed to be under any obligation to restore the use of them, and, indeed, if that practice which our governors do openly and constantly permit and approve be not admitted for a good interpretation of laws, whether ecclesiastical or civil, I fear it will be impossible to clear our hands of many repugnances of different kinds besides this under debate." It only remains to consider the bearing on this part of the present case of the former decisions of the judicial committee in Liddell v. Westerton and Martin v. Mackonochie. As to Liddell v. Westerton, everything said and done in that case to which the Rubric of 1662 was material, had reference exclusively to ornaments of the church. The court had "nothing to do with the ornaments of the minister or anything appertaining thereto."—(Moore's separate Rep. p. 31). The questions whether the power of the Crown, under the 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25, had ever been duly exercised, and (if so) with what effect; whether the Rubric of 1662 was to be read with that section, as a law still in force, or not; what would be the effect of so reading it, and whether any aid towards the solution of those questions might be derivable from usage, either before or after 1662, and what such usage had been, were none of them before Dr. Lushington, or the Court of Arches, or the Judicial Committee. It was not suggested that anything had ever been done under the 1st Eliz., c. 2, sect. 25, as to any "Ornaments of the Church." Under these circumstances it was sufficient, as well as most convenient, to refer to the rubric, and to that alone; the effect of which was, as to that matter, simply coincident and identical with that of the section in the Act of Elizabeth, assuming it to be then in force. It is perfectly consistent that the rubric should speak with the authority of the statute, so far as the language and effect of both are identical, and yet should not supersede or control the operation of that part of the statute which it does not in terms repeat. It is true that Dr. Lushington did, in more than one passage of his judgment, signify his assent to what he described as the "irresistible argument that the last Statute of Uniformity, by referring to the First Book of Common Prayer of Edward VI., excluded not only the Second Book but everything else effected in the interval between 1549 and 1662, whether by Act of Parliament or by canon, which could or might have altered what existed in 1549; and, consequently, that nothing done from 1549 to 1662, however lawful during that period, had in itself force or binding authority after the statute of 1662 came into operation." Everything which fell from that very learned judge is entitled to most respectful consideration; but he had not been (as their Lordships now have been) upon the path of inquiry which was really necessary to support or to disprove that proposition. Nothing to the same effect is to be found in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, which overruled that part of Dr. Lushington's judgment in which these dicta occur, reversing his decision and that of the Court of Arches as to the crosses not connected with the Communion Table; and also rejecting as erroneous his view of the meaning of the words "ornaments of the church" as used in the rubric; which view had nevertheless been held in both the courts below to be clear and indisputable. There is, however, in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, delivered by Mr. Pemberton Leigh, the following passage, which has been much relied on by the appellant:—"It will be observed that this rubric (that of 1559) does not adopt precisely the language of the statute, but expresses the same thing in other words. The Statute says: 'such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, shall be retained and be in use;' the rubric 'that the minister shall use such ornaments in the church.' The Rubric to the Prayer Book of Jan. 1, 1604, adopts the language of the Rubric of Elizabeth. The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth. But they all obviously mean the same thing; that the same dresses, and the same utensils, or articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., may still be used. None of them, therefore, can have any reference to articles not used in the services, but set up in churches as ornaments in the sense of decorations." This passage has been the subject, as it appears to their Lordships, of remarkable misconception. It was sufficient for the purpose of the question as to crosses then before the Judicial Committee, to consider only the meaning of the exact words of the rubric itself, standing alone, and the words corresponding to them which were found in the statute of Elizabeth and the Rubric of 1559; and to do this with a view only to the interpretation of the two particular phrases, "ornaments of the church," and "by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." For that purpose of verbal exposition the statement in this passage of the judgment (with the exception of a somewhat inaccurate expression as to the Rubric of 1604) was unexceptionally correct. The words of the Rubric of 1662, standing alone, and the corresponding words in the statute of Elizabeth and the Rubric of 1559 and 1604, do mean what is there stated, neither more nor less. In the Act of Elizabeth there are other and further words, the effect of which, if still in force, is in the present case very important; but in that part of the judgment of Liddell v. Westerton any examination of the effect of those words, or of the questions arising out of them with reference to any ornaments of the ministers of the church, would have been absolutely irrelevant. Judges weigh their words with reference to the questions which they have to consider, and not with reference to questions which are not before them. If what was then said could properly be applied to a purpose not then in contemplation, the statement that the words of the 25th section of the Act of Elizabeth, the Rubric of 1559 and 1604, and the Rubric of 1662, "all obviously mean the same thing," might more reasonably be alleged in proof that the Judicial Committee thought the words "according to the Act of Parliament set forth in the beginning of this book," or the words

"until other order taken therein," &c., were still implied at the end of the Rubric of 1662, then the succeeding words can be relied on to show that they held all the vestures of the clergy prescribed by the first Book of King Edward to be lawful at all the three epochs referred to—1559, 1604, and 1662. With respect to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Martin v. Mackonochie, little need be said. There, too, it was sufficient to consider the effect of the mere words of the Rubric of 1662, repeating (as it did) in 1662 the language of the Act of the first year of Elizabeth, on a point unaffected by anything done in the meantime. The points determined in Liddell v. Westerton are succinctly stated, approved, and followed. There is no reference to the particular passage in the judgment of Liddell v. Westerton on which the appellant's counsel rely; though, if there had been, their Lordships would have been of opinion, for the reasons already stated, that the present question would be in no way affected by it. Their Lordships, for these reasons, which, out of respect for the elaborate arguments so earnestly addressed to them, and not from any hesitation as to the decision at which they should arrive, they have expressed at a length greater than is usual, are of opinion that the decision of the learned judge of the Arches Court as to the vestments worn by the appellant, following that of this committee in Hebbert v. Purchas, is correct, and ought to be affirmed. Their Lordships will now proceed to consider the charge against the appellant with reference to his position during the Prayer of Consecration. The allegation upon that head is that the appellant, when officiating in the service of the Holy Communion, unlawfully stood, while saying the Prayer of Consecration in the said service, at the middle of the west side of the communion table, such communion table then standing against the east wall, with its shorter sides towards the north and south, in such wise that during the whole time of his saying the said prayer he was between the people and the communion table with his back to the people, so that the people could not see him break the bread or take the cup in his hand. The rule by which the position of the minister during the celebration of the Holy Communion is to be determined, must be found in the rubrical directions of the communion office in the Prayer Book, there being, as to this matter, nothing in any statute to control or supplement those directions. In examining these directions, their Lordships propose to put aside the argument, very much pressed upon them, that the proper and only proper position for the communion table is in the body of the church, or in the middle of the chancel, and that it is in a wrong position when placed, at the time of the Communion Service, along the east wall. They think this argument has no sufficient foundation. No charge is made that in the church of the appellant the communion table stood where it ought not to have stood, and, in the opinion of their Lordships, no such charge could have been sustained. The rubric, indeed, contemplates that the table may be removed at the time of the Holy Communion; but it does not, in terms, require it to be removed. Morning and evening prayer are, according to one of the early rubrics of the Prayer Book, to be used in the accustomed place of the church, chapel, or chancel. In churches, where it is customary to use both the chancel and body of the church, or the chancel alone, for morning and evening prayer, the direction that the table shall stand "where morning and evening prayer are appointed to be said," is satisfied without moving it. That direction cannot be supposed to mean that the position of the table is to be determined by that of the minister's reading desk or stall only, the service being "used" and "said" by the congregation as to the part in it assigned to them, as well as by the minister. The practice as to moving or not moving the table has varied at different times. It was generally, if not always, moved, in the earlier part of the post-Reformation period. When the revision of 1662 took place, and when the present rubric before the prayer of consecration was for the first time introduced, it had come to be the case that the table was very seldom removed. The instances in which it has been removed may be supposed from that time to have become still more rare; and there are now few churches in the kingdom in which, without a structural rearrangement, the table could be conveniently removed into the body of the church. The utmost that can be said is, that the rubrics are to be construed so as to meet either hypothesis. Their Lordships have further to observe that the rubrics assume that, before the prayer of consecration is reached, those who intend to communicate will have drawn near to the communion table, wherever it may be placed, so as to concentrate the communicants near it or round it, and thus enable them to witness the ministration more easily than if they had remained in their places throughout the church. It is proper also to point out that the term "east" or "eastward" nowhere occurs in the rubrics. From the mention that is made of the north side, it seems to be supposed that in all churches that expression would represent a uniform position, and there is no doubt that from the almost universal eastward position of churches in England this would be the case; but the north is the only point of the compass which is actually referred to. During several portions of the communion office the minister is directed, either expressly or by reference or implication, to stand at the north side of the table. Where this is the case their Lordships have no hesitation in saying that whether the table is placed altar-wise along the east wall, or standing detached in the chancel or church, it is the duty of the minister to stand at the side of the table which, supposing the church to be built in the ordinary eastward position, would be next the north, whether that side be a longer or shorter side of the table. No doubt in a certain context the word "side" might be so used as to be shown by that context to be contradistinguished from the top, or bottom, or end of a subject of quadrilateral or any other figure. But for this purpose a determining context is necessary. In the absence of such a context it is accurate, both in scientific and in ordinary language, to say that a quadrilateral table has four sides. In the rubrics not only is there no context to exclude the application of that term to the shorter as well as the longer sides; but the effect of the context is, as it appears to their Lordships, just the reverse. The direction is absolute, and has reference to one of the points of the compass, which are fixed by nature; the figure and the position of the table are not fixed either by nature or by law; and the purpose of the direction is to regulate, not one part or another of the table, but the position of the minister with reference thereto. Under these circumstances, it seems extravagant to put on the word "side" a sense more limited than its strict and primary one, for the purpose of suggesting difficulties in acting upon the rule, which for nearly two centuries were never felt in practice, and which would not arise if the strict and primary sense were adhered to. If it were necessary that there should be extracted from the rubrics a rule governing the position of the minister throughout the whole communion office, where no contrary direction is given or necessarily implied, the rule could not, in their Lordships' opinion, be any other than that laid down in Hebbert v. Purchas, and they entertain no doubt that the position which would be required by that rule—a position, namely, in which the minister would stand at the north side of the table, looking to the south—is not only lawful, but is that which would, under ordinary circumstances, enable the minister, with the greatest certainty and convenience, to fulfil the requirements of all the rubrics. The case, however, with which their Lordships have to deal is one which may assume the character of a penal charge. It might be a penal charge against the present appellant that he has stood, during the prayer of consecration, on the west side of the table; and on the other hand, on a construction of the rubric the opposite of that contended for by the respondents, a penal charge might be maintained against a priest who stood at the north side. It is therefore necessary to be well assured, both that there is a direction free from ambiguity that the priest should stand, during this particular prayer, either at the north or at the west side, and also that no other test is supplied by the Rubric in question which would be a sufficient and intelligible rule for the position, at that part of the service, of the priest. Their Lordships have therefore to consider the precise wording of the Rubric preceding the Prayer of Consecration taken in connection with the prayer itself. It is to be observed that the revision in 1662 introduced for the first time the breaking of the bread as one of the manual acts to be done during the Prayer of Consecration, and that, although some of the other manual acts, namely, the taking the bread and the cup into the priest's hands, had been mentioned in the Rubric of the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., they had not been contained in the Second Prayer Book of that Sovereign, or in the Prayer Books of Elizabeth or James I. The Rubric "That he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people," &c., was also new; and it is not impossible that one of the reasons for its introduction may have been to meet one of the demands or suggestions of the Puritan party, who had proposed a form of service in which the priest was to be ordered to break the bread "in the sight of the people" (4 Hall. Reliq. Liturg.) Their Lordships are of opinion that the words "before the people," coupled with the direction as to the manual acts, are meant to be equivalent to "in the sight of the people." They have no doubt that the Rubric requires the manual acts to be so done, that, in a reasonable and practical sense, the communicants, especially if they are conveniently placed for receiving of the Holy Sacrament, as is presupposed in the office, may be witnesses of, that is, may see them. What is ordered to be done before the people, when it is the subject of the sense, not of hearing, but of sight, cannot be done before them unless those of them who are properly placed for that purpose can see it. It was contended that "before the people" meant nothing more than "in the church;" to guard against an anterior and secret consecration of the elements. But if the words "before the people" were absent, the manual acts, and the rest of the service, could not be performed elsewhere than in the church, and in that sense coram populo, nor could the sacrament be distributed except in the place and at the time of its consecration: and this argument would, therefore, reduce to silence the words "before the people," which are an emphatic part of the declaration of the purpose for which the preparatory acts are to be done. That declaration applies not to the services as a whole, nor to the consecration of the elements as a whole, but to the manual acts, separately and specifically. There is, therefore, in the opinion of their Lordships, a rule sufficiently intelligible to be derived from the directions which are contained in the Rubric as to the acts which are to be performed. The minister is to order the elements "standing before the table:" words which, whether the table stands "altarwise" along the east wall, or in the body of the church or chancel, would be fully satisfied by his standing on the north side and looking towards the south; but which also, in the opinion of their Lordships, as the tables are now usually, and in their opinion lawfully, placed, authorise him to do those acts standing on the west side and looking towards the east. Beyond this and after this there is no specific direction that, during this prayer, he is to stand on the west side, or that he is to stand on the north side. He must, in the opinion of their Lordships, stand so that he may, in good faith, enable the communicants present, or the bulk of them, being properly placed, to see, if they wish it, the breaking of the bread, and the performance of the other manual acts mentioned. He must not interpose his body so as intentionally to defeat the object of the Rubric and to prevent this result. It may be difficult in particular cases to say exactly whether this rule has been complied with; but where there is good faith the difficulty ought not to be a serious one; and it is, in the opinion of their Lordships, clear that a protection was in this respect intended to be thrown around the body of the communicants, which ought to be secured to them by an observance of the plain intent of the Rubric. In applying these principles to the present case, their Lordships find that some difficulty has arisen from the circumstances under which the evidence was taken. The charge against the appellant was a twofold one; both that he had stood at the middle of the west side with his back to the people, and that the people could not see him break the bread or take the cup in his hand. The witness Nicholson undoubtedly states that, at the service of which he speaks, while sitting in the nave, he could not see the appellant perform the manual acts; and the witness Bevan gives evidence to the same effect. But with regard to Nicholson, he explains, as their Lordships understand his evidence, that, whether persons could see what the appellant was doing would depend on whether they were sitting immediately behind him or were sitting on one side or the other; and with regard to Bevan, he states that, what would have prevented a man who sat at the side from seeing what the appellant did, was, that he had on a chasuble, "which is a sort of cloak which spreads his body out." When the appellant himself was examined, he does not appear to have been asked any question on the subject; and the inference which their Lordships draw from the whole examination is, that inasmuch as at that time it was understood to be the law, founded on the decision in Helbert v. Purchas, that the standing on the west side of the table was, of itself and without more, unlawful, neither party thought it important to carry the evidence with any precision beyond this point, the respondents thinking they had established their case, and the appellant not being prepared to dispute the fact of the position in which he stood. Their Lordships are not prepared to hold that a penal charge is established against the appellant merely by the proof that he stood while saying the Prayer of Consecration at the west side of the Communion Table, without further evidence that the people could not, in the sense in which their Lordships have used the words, see him break the bread or take the cup into his hand, and they will therefore recommend that an alteration should be made in the decree in this respect. Their Lordships, before leaving this part of the case, think it right to observe that they do not consider the judgment in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie to have any material bearing on the question now before them. The decision in that case was that the priest must stand during the Prayer of Consecration, and not kneel during a part of it. The correctness of that decision has not been, and, as their Lordships think, cannot be, questioned. Nothing is more clear throughout the Rubrics of the Communion office than that when the priest is intended to kneel, an express provision is made on the subject. The conclusion, however, in Martin v. Mackonochie, is expressed, perhaps, more broadly than was necessary for the decision. What was obviously meant was that the posture of standing was to be continued throughout the whole of the prayer. Nothing was or could be decided as to the place in which the priest was to stand, for that question was not raised, and was not in any manner argued, in the case. Their Lordships will now proceed to the charge as to wafer or wafer-bread. The charge as to this is "that the appellant used in the Communion Service and administration wafer-bread or wafers, to wit, bread or flour made in the form of circular wafers instead of bread such as is usual to be eaten." And this is traversed by the appellant. It appears that the allegation is in the same form as that used in the Purchas case; but in that case the defendant did not appear, and no criticism seems to have taken place as to the form of the allegation or its sufficiency. It is probable that the allegation was meant to raise the question as to the legality of the wafer, as distinguished from bread of the kind "usual to be eaten," and there are certainly some indications that the appellant and his counsel so understood, and meant to meet, the charge. A different view has, however, been taken by the counsel for the appellant on this appeal, and they have maintained that there is no averment that the wafer, as distinguished from bread ordinarily eaten, was used. They contend that the charge goes to the shape, and not to the composition, of the substance. Their Lordships are of opinion that this objection must prevail. The charge, in their opinion, is consistent with the possibility of it having been the fact that bread "such as is usual to be eaten," but circular, and having such a degree of thinness as might justify its being termed wafers, was what was used. And if this is what was used, their Lordships do not think it could be pronounced illegal. As, however, the question of the construction of the rubric has been raised on this appeal, as it was in the Purchas case, their Lordships think it right to express their opinion upon it, at the same time that they give the appellant the benefit of the ambiguity which exists in the form of the charge. It is to be observed that the rubric does not in any part of it use the term "wafer." The words are "bread"—"bread such as is usual to be eaten," and "the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten." Their Lordships have no doubt that a wafer, in the sense in which the word is usually employed, that is, as denoting a composition of flour and water rolled very thin and unleavened, is not "bread such as is usual to be eaten," or "the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten." The only question on the construction of the rubric is that raised upon the words "it shall suffice." There is no doubt that in many cases these words, standing alone, and unexplained by a context, would be quite consistent with something different from, larger or smaller, more or less numerous, more or less costly, than what is mentioned, being supplied. Here, however, the sentence commences with the introduction: "To take away all occasion of dissension and superstition, which any person hath or might have concerning the bread, it shall suffice," &c. These words seem to their Lordships to make it necessary that that which is to take away the occasion of dissension and superstition should be something definite, exact, and different from what had caused the dissension and superstition. If not, the occasion of dissension remains, and the superstition may recur. "To suffice," it must be as here described. What is substantially different will not "suffice." The rubric, which orders that the bread and wine shall be provided by the curate and churchwardens at the charges of the parish, seems to contemplate ordinary bread as the only material to be used, and the 20th canon is still more precise in the same direction. The former rubric (of 1552, 1559, and 1604) had said, "It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually to be eaten at the table with other meats, but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten." Queen Elizabeth's injunction of 1559 on the same subject (in its form mandatory, and acted upon for many years afterwards), was issued when this rubric had the force of law, and must be understood in a sense consistent with, and not contradictory to it. That injunction distinguishes between (1 Card. Doc. Ann. 202) "the sacramental bread" and "the usual bread and water, heretofore named singing cakes, which served for the use of the private mass;" directing the former to be "made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, and of the same fineness and fashion round" as the latter, but "to be somewhat bigger in compass and thickness." The form, and not the substance, is here regulated. To order the use of the substance properly called "wafer," which was not "bread such as is usual to be eaten at the table" would have been directly contradictory to the rubric; and this cannot be supposed to have been intended. There was evidently "dissension" on this subject, and some diversity of practice, in the reign of Elizabeth. It appears from passages in the fourth book of the "Ecclesiastical Polity" (1 Hooker's Works by Keble, 6th edition, pp. 449-451,) published in 1594, that Hooker considered the use, either of leavened or of unleavened bread, to be at that time lawful. But the point was one as to which controversy then existed, and had given occasion to strife. In 1580, Chaderton, bishop of Chester, acting as commissioner in Lancashire, under the Crown, applied to the Privy Council for instructions as to "two special points worthy of reformation;" one of which was "for the Lord's Supper, with wafers, or with common bread?" The Lords of the Council replied (26th July, 1580) that they thought both points ought to be referred to the consideration of Parliament; adding, "In the meantime, for the appeasing of such division and bitterness as doth and may arise of the use of both these kinds of bread, we think it meet, that in such parishes as do use the common bread, and in others that embrace the wafer, they be severally continued as they are at this present. Until which time, also, your Lordship is to be careful, according to your good discretion, to persuade and procure a quietness amongst such as shall strive for the public maintaining either of the one or the other." (Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, p. 91). In a later letter, the Bishop recurred to the same question, and was thus answered (21st Aug. 1580), by Lord Burghley and Sir Francis Walsingham: "Concerning the last point of your letter, contained in a postscript, whereby appeareth that some are troubled about the substance of the communion bread, it were good to teach them that are weak in conscience, in esteeming of the wafer bread, not to make difference. But, if their weakness continue, it were not amiss, in our opinions, charitable to tolerate them, as children with milk. Which we refer to your Lordship's better consideration." (Ibid., p. 94). In 1584, Bishop Overton, of Lichfield, issued an injunction to the clergy of his diocese: "That the ordinance of the Book of Common Prayer be from henceforth observed in this, that the bread delivered to the communicants be such as is usual to be eaten at the table with other meats, yet of the purest and finest wheat; and no other bread to be used by the minister, nor to be provided for by the churchwardens and parishioners, than such finest common bread." (Appendix to 2nd Report of Rit. Comm., p. 430.) The 20th Canon of 1603-4, already mentioned, seems to have proceeded on the same view of the law; and, after the passing of that canon, the usual form of inquiry in the Visitation Articles of Bishops and Archdeacons (e.g., Archbishop Bancroft in 1605, Bishop Babington, of Worcester, in 1607; and Bishop Andrewes in 1619), was whether the churchwardens always supplied, for the Holy Communion, "fine white bread." The same form of inquiry continued to be generally used after the rubric had been altered, upon the Revision of 1662, so as to express its purpose to be, "to take away all occasion of dissension," as well as of "superstition" (which alone had been previously mentioned). The same motive had been expressed in the rubric of King

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON.

[Priv. Co.]

RIDSDALE v. OLIFTON.

[PRIV. CO.]

Edward's first Prayer Book, "for avoiding all matters and occasion of dissension" ("superstition" not being then added); when the opposite course was taken, of requiring unleavened bread, of a certain form and fashion, to be everywhere and always used. The practice of using fine wheat bread such as is usual to be eaten, and not cake or wafer, appears to have been universal throughout the Church of England from the alteration of the rubric in 1662, till 1840, or later. Their Lordships think that if it had been averred and proved that the wafer, properly so called, had been used by the appellant, it would have been illegal, but as the averment and proof is insufficient, they will advise an alteration of the decree in this respect. There remains to be considered the charge as to the crucifix. As to this the allegation is, that the appellant unlawfully set up and placed upon the top of the screen separating the chancel from the body or nave of the church, a crucifix and twenty-four metal candlesticks, with candles which were lighted on either side of the crucifix. This charge was accompanied by two other charges, in respect of which the appellant has been admonished to abstain from the acts complained of, and to this part of the monition he has submitted. One of these charges was for having formed and accompanied a procession from the chancel, down the north aisle and up the nave back to the chancel again, on the occasion of public service, those taking part in the procession at one time falling upon their knees, and remaining kneeling for some time. The other charge was the setting up, attached to the walls of the church, representations of figures, in coloured relief of plastic material, purporting to represent scenes of our Lord's passion, and forming what are commonly called stations of the cross and passion, such as are often used in Roman Catholic churches. The learned judge, whose decision is under appeal, thus describes the screen and crucifix: "There is a screen of open ironwork some 9ft. high stretching across the church at the entrance to the chancel; the middle portion of this screen rises to a peak, and is surmounted by a crucifix or figure of our Saviour on the Cross in full relief and about 18in. long—this is the crucifix complained of. The screen of course, from its position, directly faces the congregation, and the sculptured or moulded figure of our Lord is turned towards them. There is, further, a row of candles at distances of nearly a foot apart all along the top of the screen, which is continued up the central and rising portion of it, the last candles coming close up to the crucifix on either side, so that when the candles are lighted for the evening service, I should presume that the crucifix would stand in a full light." For the erection of this screen at the entrance of the chancel, in the form in which it is now found there, and surmounted by the crucifix in question, their Lordships think it clear that no faculty has been obtained. There is, indeed, a faculty, dated the 23rd of Aug. 1870, authorising the building of "a dwarf wall with screen thereon of light ironwork between the chancel and the nave;" and this faculty appears to have been granted with reference to a ground plan annexed to the petition for the faculty; which ground plan specifies the place where this screen of light ironwork was to be erected. But no further information was given to the ordinary of the character of the structure, much less of the crucifix by which it was to be surmounted. Technically, therefore, it must be held that, in the absence of a proper faculty, the crucifix was unlawfully set up and retained. If, however, their Lordships were of opinion that the case was one in which, under all the circumstances, the ordinary, on the application for a faculty, ought to grant, or might properly grant, a faculty, they might probably have thought it right, before pronouncing any judgment, to have given an opportunity to the appellant to apply for a faculty. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the ordinary ought not to grant a faculty for the crucifix. The learned judge refers to two cases, decided by this tribunal, which have a material bearing upon the present question. The first of these was the case of Liddell v. Westerton (Moore's Special Report). In this case, as the learned judge states, the court had to pronounce upon the legality of a cross set up in the appellant's church. And it was decided that, although before the reformation the symbol of the cross had no doubt been put to superstitious uses, "yet that crosses, when used as mere emblems of the Christian faith, and not as objects of superstitious reverence, may still lawfully be erected as architectural decorations," and that the wooden cross erected in that particular case "was to be considered a mere architectural ornament." The court determined nothing directly as to the legality of a crucifix, but was at great pains throughout the judgment to point out that crosses were to be distinguished from crucifixes, saying that "there was a wide difference between the cross and images of saints, and even, though in a less degree, between a cross and a crucifix," the former of which, they said, had been "used as a symbol of Christianity two or three centuries before either crucifixes or images were introduced." The other case is that of Philpott v. Boyd (L. Rep. 6 P. C. 435). As to this case, the learned judge states that this tribunal, in justifying the erection of the Exeter rood, adhered entirely and very distinctly to the position taken up in the previous case, and pronounced that erection lawful, though it included many sculptured images, on the express ground "that it had been set up for the purpose of decoration only," declaring that it was "not in danger of being abused," and that "it was not suggested that any superstitious reverence has been, or is likely to be, paid to any of the figures upon it." The learned judge then proceeds to consider whether it would be right to conclude that the crucifix in the present case was set up for the purposes of decoration only; whether it is in danger of being abused, and whether it could be suggested that superstitious reverence had been, or was likely to be, paid to it. The learned judge states that the crucifix, as formerly set up in our churches, had a special history of its own. He refers to the rood ordinarily found before the reformation in the parish churches of this country, which was, in fact, a crucifix with images at the base, erected on a structure called the rood loft, traversing the church at the entrance to the chancel, and occupying a position not otherwise than analogous to that which the iron screen does in the present case. He refers to the evidence as to the preservation of the crucifixes or roods during the reign of Queen Mary, and of their destruction, as monuments of idolatry and superstition, in the reign of Elizabeth. He takes notice of a letter of Bishop Sandys in 1561 in the Zurich Letters, first series, p. 73, in which he states: "We had not long since a controversy respecting images. The Queen's Majesty considered it not contrary to the Word of God, nay, rather for the advantage of the Church, that the image of Christ crucified, together with Mary and John, should be placed, as heretofore, in some conspicuous part of the church, where they might more readily be seen by the people. Some of us thought far otherwise, and more especially as all images of every kind were at our last visitation not only taken down, but also burnt, and that too, by public authority, and because the ignorant and superstitious multitude are in the habit of paying adoration to this idol above all others." The learned judge arrives at the conclusion that the crucifix so placed formed an ordinary feature in the parish churches before the Reformation, and that it cannot be doubted that it did so, not as a mere architectural ornament, but as an object of reverence and adoration. He further points out that the worship of it was enjoined in the Sarum Missal, in which the order of service for Palm Sunday ends with the adoration of the rood by the celebrant and choir before passing into the chancel. And to this reference might be added one to the order for the Communion according to the Hereford use, in which there is a prayer with this introduction, "Postea sacerdos adorans crucifixum dicat." Proceeding then on these considerations, and dealing with a Church in which was found not merely an illuminated crucifix, but also those stations of the cross and other acts in the conduct of the services, the illegality of which the appellant does not challenge in his appeal, the judge continues thus:—"It is no doubt easy to say, what proof is there of danger of idolatry now? What facts are there to point to a probability of 'abuse'? But when the Court is dealing with a well-known sacred object—an object enjoined and put up by authority in all churches of England before the Reformation, in a particular part of the church and for the particular purpose of 'adoration'—when the Court finds that the same object, both in the church and out of it, is still worshipped by those who adhere to the unreformed Romish faith, and when it is told that, now, after a lapse of 300 years, it is suddenly proposed to set up again this same object in the same part of the church as an architectural ornament only, it is hard not to distrust the uses to which it may come to be put, or escape the apprehension that what begins in 'decoration' may end in 'idolatry.' If this apprehension is a just and reasonable one, then there exists that likelihood and danger of 'superstitious reverence' which the Privy Council in Philpotts v. Boyd pronounced to be fatal to the lawfulness of all images and figures set up in a church." In these observations of the learned judge their Lordships concur; and they select them as the grounds of his decision which commend themselves to their judgment. They are prepared, under the circumstances of this case, to affirm the decision directing the removal of the crucifix, while at the same time they desire to say that they think it important to maintain, as to representations of sacred persons and objects in a church, the liberty established in Philpotts v. Boyd subject to the power and duty of the ordinary so to exercise his judicial discretion in granting or refusing faculties, as to guard against things likely to be abused for purposes of superstition. On the whole, therefore, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the decree of the Court of Arches, except as regards the position of the minister and the use of wafer-bread or wafers; and as to these excepted matters they will humbly advise Her Majesty that inasmuch as it is not established to their satisfaction that the appellant, while saying the Prayer of Consecration, so stood that the people could not see him break the bread or take the cup into his hand, as alleged in the representation; and, inasmuch as it is not alleged or proved that what was used by him in the administration of the Holy Communion was other than bread such as is usual to be eaten, the decree of the Court of Arches should be in these respects reversed. And they will further humbly advise her Majesty that in respect of the charges as to which the decree is reversed, the costs in the Court of Arches should be paid by the respondents to the appellant; and further that there should be no costs of this Appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, May 7, 1877.

RUMSEY v. NICHOLL. (a)

Pleading—Ejectment from rectory house and glebe—Demurrer.

A statement of claim alleged that in 1864 the plaintiff was presented, instituted, and inducted to the rectory and living of L., and in Jan. 1867 he obtained leave from the patron to exchange livings with some clergyman to be approved by the patron; that the patron approved of one P., incumbent of the living of O. (with whom the plaintiff was negotiating), and promised to do all things necessary to carry out the proposed exchange with P.; and to carry out the exchange the plaintiff executed a deed of resignation of his living of L., and delivered it to the registrar of the Bishop of the Diocese; that before delivering the deed the plaintiff, with the knowledge and assent of the patron, had obtained the permission of the bishop to exchange livings with P., and that at the time of delivering the deed the plaintiff explained fully to the registrar his object and intention in executing and delivering it, and the registrar, on behalf of the bishop, accepted it for that purpose only; and that at the time of the execution and delivery the bishop, the registrar, and the patron well knew that the deed was executed and delivered by the plaintiff in reliance on and in consideration of the promise made by the patron, and with full intention on the part of the plaintiff that if the exchange should not be carried out the deed of resignation was to be void to all intents, &c.

The statement also alleged that the patron did not fulfil his promise, &c., or do what was necessary to carry out the exchange of livings, &c., but falsely claimed the right to present, and did present the defendant to the plaintiff's living of L., and that the defendant, with full knowledge of all the premises, accepted the presentation and ejected the plaintiff, and has since kept possession of the glebe lands, rectory, and living of L., and received the profits thereof, &c.

The plaintiff claimed possession of the rectory, glebe, and meane profits during the defendant's possession.

The defendant demurred.

Held (affirming, but on different grounds, the judgment of Denman, J. in the Common Pleas Division), that the statement of claim was bad, as it did not sufficiently allege that the registrar accepted the plaintiff's deed of resignation subject to the condition that the deed was to be void if the exchange of livings was not effected.

In an action of ejectment the plaintiff's statement of claim was as follows:

1. In the year 1864 the plaintiff was presented, instituted, and inducted to the rectory and living of Llandough, in the county of Glamorgan, and entered into possession of the rectory house, glebe lands, and profits of the said rectory and living, and continued therein until dispossessed as hereinafter mentioned.

2. In or about the month of January 1867, the plaintiff requested permission from C. R. Mansel Talbot, the patron of the said living of Llandough aforesaid, to exchange livings with some clergymen to be approved by the said patron.

3. The said patron granted the permission requested as aforesaid, and the plaintiff thereupon entered into negotiations with one Robert Pinckney, who was then the incumbent of the living of Chilfrome, in the county of Dorset, and the plaintiff subsequently submitted the name of Pinckney to the patron in terms of the arrangements aforesaid. The said patron, after making personal inquiries and satisfying himself by the said inquiries of the suitability of Pinckney, approved of the proposed exchange of livings and promised that he would do all things necessary on his part to enable the plaintiff and Pinckney to carry out an exchange of their living as aforesaid.

4. Relying on the said promise, and for the purpose of carrying out the said exchange, the plaintiff executed a deed of resignation of the living of Llandough, and delivered the same into the hands of the registrar of the Bishop of Llandaff. Before executing and delivering the said deed of resignation, the plaintiff had, with the sanction and to the knowledge of C. R. Mansel Talbot, the patron aforesaid, requested and obtained from the bishop permission to exchange livings with Pinckney; and at the time of executing and delivering the deed, the plaintiff explained fully and explicitly to the registrar aforesaid his intention and the object which he had in view in executing and delivering the said deed, and the registrar on behalf of the bishop aforesaid accepted the said deed to hold for that purpose only. And at the time of executing and delivering the said deed, and before and after such execution and delivery, the said bishop, and the said registrar, and the said patron, knew well that the deed was executed and delivered as aforesaid, by the plaintiff in reliance on and in consideration of the promise made by the patron in paragraph 3 mentioned, and with full intention on the part of the plaintiff that if the said exchange as aforesaid should happen not to be carried out, the said deed of resignation was to be held and become null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever, and the plaintiff should have full liberty to remain in, or, if need were, re-enter on the possession and enjoyment of his living aforesaid.

5. Notwithstanding the premises the said C. R. Mansel Talbot, the patron aforesaid, would not and did not fulfil his part of the agreement in paragraph 3 mentioned, and did not and would not present Pinckney, or do what was necessary on his part to carry out and effectuate the exchange of livings proposed between the plaintiff and Pinckney, but falsely claiming and pretending to have obtained an absolute legal right to dispose of the plaintiff's said living by the resignation executed and delivered as aforesaid, and in violation of his promise and agreement aforesaid, and not regarding the plaintiff's remonstrance claimed right to present, and did upon such false claim present his nephew, the defendant, to the plaintiff's said living at Llandough.

6. The defendant, in full knowledge of all the premises, and despite the remonstrances of the plaintiff, accepted the said presentation, and pretending right therefrom, broke and entered the rectory house and glebe lands and living of Llandough aforesaid, and expelled the plaintiff from his possession thereof, and took and received to his own use all the issues and profits, and the beneficial use and occupation of the said rectory house, glebe lands, and rectory and living of Llandough aforesaid, and has continued ever since to keep the plaintiff ejected as aforesaid; whereby the plaintiff during all that time has lost and been deprived of the beneficial use and occupation of the said rectory house, glebe lands, and rectory, and living as aforesaid, and of all the issues and profits thereof. And, though the defendant has been repeatedly desired and required to vacate and yield up possession of the rectory house, glebe land, rectory, and living aforesaid, and the issues and profits thereof, he still continues to keep possession of the said rectory house, glebe lands, rectory, and living aforesaid, and to keep the plaintiff ejected therefrom, and to convert to his own use the issues and profits thereof, to the plaintiff's great loss and injury. The plaintiff claims possession of the rectory house and glebe lands aforesaid, and 4000*l.* for meane profits from November, 1867, until such possession shall be given.

Demurrer on the ground that the statement of claim shows that the plaintiff is not entitled to the living, and that the defendant is.

The demurrer was argued before Denman, J. in the Common Pleas Division, and judgment was given for the defendant with costs.

The case in the Common Pleas Division is reported ante, Vol. X., p. 524; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 252.

The plaintiff appealed.

McClymont, for plaintiff.—The deed of registration was delivered as an escrow, and the statement of claim sufficiently alleges that it was. Until an exchange is effected by the presentation, institution, and induction of both parties to it, the whole proceeding is void. Here the deed is void, and the defendant a wrongdoer in entering upon the plaintiff's rectory and living. He cited

W. G. Harrison, Q.C. and Moulton, for the defendant.—This is an attempt to attach a parol condition to a deed. The allegations in the statement of claim do not support a delivery of the deed as an escrow. They only state the intention of the plaintiff at the time of the delivery. Ejectment cannot be brought in respect of a "living;" if the statement means that the plaintiff is in possession of the spiritualities, and therefore entitled to have possession of the rectory house, glebe and profits, it has not stated it. A rector cannot be dispossessed of his living except by the spiritual court.

McClymont replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that judgment must be given in favour of the demurrer. I own to having had considerable doubt in the course of the discussion whether the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim does not contain allegations sufficient to show that the bishop, or his registrar, accepted the deed of resignation subject to the condition that it was to be of no effect, if the exchange of livings was not carried out. But on the whole I agree with the rest of the court in thinking that the 4th paragraph is insufficient to show that. The deed of resignation may either be absolute or conditional. Here it is in terms absolute, and I think the plaintiff cannot be heard to say now that, although by the terms of the instrument his resignation was absolute, he intended it only to take effect upon certain conditions being fulfilled. It has occurred to my mind that something more than a mere resignation is requisite in order to constitute a valid resignation. There must be also an acceptance of the resignation by the bishop. Now I think that if the bishop insisted on accepting the resignation absolutely according to the terms of the deed, the plaintiff cannot afterwards rely on the condition, and if he were to have accepted it subject to such a condition expressed in the deed, as the plaintiff now insists upon, the object being an exchange of livings, and the condition being assumed, the deed would be void. The statement of claim asserts that at the time of executing the deed the plaintiff explained fully and explicitly to the registrar his object and intention in executing and delivering the deed, and the registrar accepted the deed to hold for that purpose only, and the bishop, and the registrar, and the patron knew of the plaintiff's object and intention in delivering the deed. Now, if the bishop had accepted the deed on these terms, and had explained that he accepted subject to the condition that the deed was to be void if the exchange was not perfected, I think it then would have been a conditional acceptance of the resignation, notwithstanding the deed in terms was absolute; but when the statement of claim is looked at, it amounts to no more than this, that, whereas the plaintiff did explain to the registrar that the resignation was intended to be subject to the exchange being affected, and the registrar did accept the deed, it is not sufficiently stated that the deed was accepted on the terms that it was to be void on the condition not being fulfilled. I think that is a most material part of what ought to have been stated, and unless it is explicitly stated, the statement of claim is bad, and our judgment must be for the defendant.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I concur in the doubts expressed by the Lord Chief Justice. I think the statement of claim would have been good if words had been interpolated to the effect that the deed was delivered as an escrow, or that the bishop agreed to accept the resignation only on the event of an exchange being effected, but I think that is not the meaning of the words as they stand. I never thought to regret the days of special demurrers, but a special demurrer in this case would have saved the necessity of long arguments.

BRETT, L.J.—There is no allegation in this statement of claim that the deed was delivered as an escrow, or that the deed of resignation was accepted subject to the condition. Assuming, what I think is extremely doubtful, that evidence as against these defendants might be given in support of both these assertions, I am very strongly of opinion that the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim does not sufficiently allege that the deed was offered to or accepted by the registrar, subject to any such condition as has been suggested. It seems to me that it not only fails in that respect, but it is drawn in a form which shows that whoever drew it doubted whether he could prove his case to that extent. The 4th paragraph states what took place at the time of the delivery of the deed to the registrar, and merely states that the plaintiff then made a statement that his intention was that if the exchange was not carried out, the deed of resignation was to be void. It is obvious that his intention is, in delivering the deed, that it might be the first step towards effecting an exchange of livings. Then the statement goes on to state something in the mind of the plaintiff, and made known to the registrar, but it carefully abstains from stating what the intention or desire in the mind of the registrar was, or that he accepted the deed subject to the condition. It is well known that the mode, and the only mode, of effecting an exchange with conditions now, is that an absolute deed of resignation should be delivered. I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant.

COOK v. WARD. (a)

Local drainage board—Powers delegated to committee—Land Drainage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133), Sch. part ii., clause 6.

Plaintiff owned lands in a separate drainage district, constituted under a provisional order made in pursuance of the Land Drainage Act 1861. The drainage board of the district, of whom defendant was one, duly appointed, under part ii., clause 6, of the Act, a committee, consisting of defendant and two others, to exercise the powers conferred by the Act. An excessive rainfall occurred, and the committee agreed among themselves that each one of them should watch over a separate allotted position of a long dyke running through the district, and in case of emergency should exercise, with respect to that portion, the powers delegated by the board to the committee. Defendant accordingly cut through some gateways leading through some closes of the plaintiff, in order to prevent the plaintiff's land and that of other persons from being flooded. The defendant, in so doing, acted reasonably and properly, and the committee approved of his acts.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for injury to his lands in consequence of the defendant's so cutting the gateways, it was Held, affirming the decision of the Common Pleas Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Lindley, J.), that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his action, as the powers delegated to the committee by the board could not be sub-delegated by the committee to the defendant, and he was therefore not justified by the statute in acting independently.

APPEAL from the Common Pleas Division.

Statement of claim:

1. The plaintiff was possessed of two closes of land situate in that portion of Deeping St. Nicholas, in the county of Lincoln, known as the Counter Drain Washes, and bounded by lands of B. Everard towards the east, by the Counter Drain towards the south, and by lands of B. Parr's devisees towards the west, and of a ditch and of two gateways or passages forming the entrance from the road on the bank of the river Glen over said ditch into the said respective closes, and of certain other lands near to the said ditch, all situate in the parish of Deeping St. Nicholas, in the county of Lincoln.

2. The water passing along the said ditch lawfully passed and was carried by means of culverts or tunnels under the said gateways or passages forming such entrance as aforesaid.

3. At divers times in July 1875, the defendant wrongfully broke and entered the said closes and the said ditch and passages and gateways respectively, and broke down and dug up and destroyed the said passages and gateways, and the said culverts and tunnels under the same respectively, and dug holes in the said closes and passages, and gateways respectively, and removed large quantities of earth and soil therefrom, and damaged and destroyed the same.

4. By means of the premises, large quantities of water were wrongfully caused and permitted to flow and did flow from off certain lands of the defendant, and other lands through and along the said ditch into and along the said closes and the said other lands of the plaintiff, and remained thereon for a long time, and damaged the crops and seeds of the plaintiff then growing thereon, and the plaintiff was deprived of means of access for himself and his cattle to and from the said closes and the said road, and lost the use of the said closes and other lands, and was otherwise damaged. The plaintiff claimed 220*l.* damages, and such further or other relief, by injunction or otherwise, as the nature of the case might require.

The material parts of the statement of defence were as follow:

5. The Counter Drain Washes is a drainage

District, duly constituted under the Land Drainage Act 1861, and the Land Drainage Supplemental Act 1873.

6. Before the happening of the alleged grievances, or any of them, the defendant had been duly appointed a member of the Drainage Board of the said district.

7. Such of the acts in the statement of claim complained of as were done by or under the authority of the defendant, were so done by him in his capacity of member of the board, and under and by virtue of the authority of the board and of a committee thereof duly constituted, and were within the powers conferred upon the defendant as and being a member of such drainage board and upon the said drainage board, and the said committee thereof, by the Land Drainage Act 1861, and the Land Drainage Supplemental Act 1873, and the defendant has not done anything in excess of such powers, nor did he in doing the said acts cause to the plaintiff any unnecessary damage.

8. Immediately before the happening of the events in the statement of claim complained of, a large quantity of rain had fallen, and a certain dyke called the Soah Dyke was full of water, and there was not sufficient outfall for the water therein; thereupon the defendant, as such member of the drainage board as aforesaid, and acting under the authority of the said board and of a committee thereof duly constituted, caused certain culverts or tunnels which had been previously constructed by the said drainage board in order to carry off the water from the said Soah Dyke to be cut, and otherwise cleaned out and enlarged the said tunnels. Averment, that the acts in this paragraph mentioned were the alleged grievances in the statement of claim complained of, and that the said acts were done by the defendant in such capacity and under such authority as in the last preceding paragraph mentioned, and were deemed by the defendant to be, and were in fact, reasonable and proper to be done in order to carry off the floodwater which had accumulated within the said drainage district. Issue taken.

The plaintiff's land was situated in a district which, by a provisional order of the Inclosure Commissioners, made on the 6th Feb. 1873, in pursuance of the Land Drainage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133), was constituted a separate drainage district by the name of The Deeping Fen Separate Drainage District. The provisional order was confirmed by the Land Drainage Act 1873 (36 Vict. c. 24), and by the order it was provided that the drainage board of the district should consist of nine members, one of them being the defendant.

The Land Drainage Act 1861, provides, in Part II., for the formation of drainage districts. By sect. 66, "The superintendence of matters relating to drainage within a drainage district shall be vested in a board hereinafter called a drainage board, and such board shall be a body corporate," &c. By sect. 67, the drainage board are to exercise all powers by that or any other Act of Parliament, law, or custom, vested in or exercisable by commissioners of sewers within their jurisdiction, &c. By sect. 70, "Subject to any provisions to the contrary that may be made by the provisional order constituting the district, the mode of electing members of drainage boards, and the proceedings of drainage boards shall be conducted in manner directed by the schedule annexed hereto."

Part II. of the schedule deals with the proceedings of drainage boards. By clause 6, "The board may delegate any of their powers to committees consisting of such member or members of their body as they think fit. Any committee so formed shall, in the exercise of the powers delegated conform to any regulations that may be imposed upon them by the board."

By clause 8, "A committee may meet and adjourn as they think proper. Questions at any meeting shall be determined by a majority of votes of the members present, and in case of an equal division of votes the chairman shall have a second or casting vote."

The Deeping Fen Drainage Board duly held a meeting on the 27th April 1875, when the following resolution was passed:—"Resolved, that Mr. R. Ward, Mr. S. Andrews, and Mr. Charles Plowright be appointed a committee to act in any case of emergency, with all the powers conferred by the provisional order 15th May 1873, on such committee." Acting under that resolution, the three members of the committee agreed among themselves that, with respect to the South Dyke, a drain about five miles long, which received the soakage and the overflow of the river Glen, and which passed in front of lands of the plaintiff and of other persons, a separate part of the dyke should be allotted to each of them, over which he was to watch, and, in case of emergency, to execute the power delegated to the committee by the board. The defendant, in execution of the power so delegated to him by his fellow committeemen, cut through some gateways leading to the plaintiff's closes, in order to let off the water which had accumulated in the dyke through the excessive rainfall, the culverts under the gateways being too small to allow the water to pass away quickly enough. This course was necessary in order to prevent the flooding of the plaintiff's or the other persons' lands, and it was approved by the committee.

At the trial before Mellor, J., and a special jury at the last Lincoln Spring Assizes, the learned judge left the following questions to the jury:—

1. Was the damage done to the plaintiff's land occasioned by the excessive rainfall, combined with the soakage and overflow of the Glen and Counter Drain and the shutting of the staunch at the outfall of the tunnel? Answer, Yes.

2. Was any damage done to the plaintiff's land by the act of cutting the gateways, which could be estimated as the result of that act? No.

3. Was the cutting of the gateways a reasonable and proper act under the circumstances, and was it done with ordinary and reasonable care? Yes.

4. Did the defendant act in the reasonable belief that he was doing that which was for the best under the provisions of the Land Drainage Act and the powers conferred on the committee? Yes.

5. Was the act of cutting the gateways authorised by the two other members of the committee? Yes.

MELLOR, J. thereupon entered a verdict for the defendant, but directed the jury to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff contingently. The jury assessed the damages at 1s., and leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict, and judgment for 1s. without costs, if the court should be of opinion that the defendant was not justified under the Act.

Graham, for the plaintiff, moved accordingly, and on cause being shown, the Common Pleas Division ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that, neither by the provisional order, the Act, nor the resolution appointing the committee, had they any power to act otherwise than jointly and in concert.

The defendant appealed.

Mellor, Q.C. and Busard, Q.C. for defendant.—If the board had delegated their powers to any one member of the board, he would have been authorised to exercise those powers. From the nature of the case, the committee, to be of any service, could not be together in one place. They were bound to be in different places as the emergency arose. They accordingly must settle in concert a principle of action, and leave the details to be carried out by each singly. The Act contemplates this course, and the defendant was authorised by it, to act as he did.

Lawrance, Q.C. and Graham, for the plaintiff were not called on to argue.

JAMES, L.J.—I do not see any reason to differ from the judgment of the Common Pleas Division. It is difficult to controvert the principle upon which Lord Coleridge decided, that where powers are delegated to a body, they cannot sub-delegate them. It is said for the defendant that the principle upon which each member was to act was settled by the committee in concert, and that they left it to each member to look after the details only, but it is difficult to see what the principle was. If all three had agreed that the gateways must be cut and the other two had ordered the defendant to cut them, he might have been justified, but it does not appear that the question of the gateway ever entered into the mind of the committee at all. That being so, I think we must say that the defendant was not acting under the orders of the committee, and was not justified by the Act.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

BRETT, L.J.—I am sorry that I must agree that our judgment must be for the plaintiff. The defendant could only justify his acts by showing that he was acting under the orders of the committee, and this he has not done.

pipes into, through, or against any building without the owner's and occupier's consent.

Defendants laid down their pipes so as to break into plaintiffs' cellar, which was formed by an underground arch which supported the street.

Held, reversing the judgment of Lopes, J., that the cellar was a building within sect. 7, and therefore defendants were not acting within their powers, and plaintiff could recover for the damage done.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Lopes, J.

The defendants were laying down gas pipes in a street under the powers of an Act of Parliament incorporating the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15)(a), and in the course of their works they broke into and damaged a cellar belonging to the plaintiffs. The street was supported on brick arches, and the plaintiffs' cellar, which was used for keeping stores in, was under one of these arches, and was formed by the arch.

The damage sued for, which was done to the plaintiffs by the defendants' breaking through the arch, was assessed by the jury at 25*l.*; the jury found that the defendants had not been guilty of negligence. The learned judge directed judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

McClymont for the plaintiffs.—The defendants were not acting within the powers conferred upon them by the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15), s. 6, in breaking the arch, and were therefore trespassers, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the damage which has been done. This archway was a building, the property of the plaintiffs, and therefore the defendants were absolutely prohibited by sect. 7 from interfering with it without the plaintiffs' consent. He cited

Sect. 6. The undertakers, under such superintendence as is hereinafter specified, may open and break up the soil and pavement of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the special Act, and may open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets and bridges, and lay down and place within the same limits pipes, conduits, service pipes, and other works, and from time to time repair, alter, or remove the same, and also make any sewers that may be necessary for carrying off the washings and waste liquids which may arise in the making of the gas, and for the purposes aforesaid may remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges, and they may in such streets erect any pillars, lamps, and other works, and also all other acts which the undertakers shall from time to time deem necessary for supplying gas to the inhabitants of the district included within the said limits, doing as little damage as may be in the execution of the powers whereby or by the special Act granted, and making compensation for any damage which may be done in the execution of such powers.

Sect. 7. Provided always that nothing herein shall authorise or empower the undertakers to lay down or place any pipe or other works into, through, or against any building, or in any land not dedicated to public use, without the consent of the owners and occupiers thereof . . ."

were justified under sect. 6. Sect. 7 refers only to buildings above the soil of the street, and not to underground arches such as this.

(Other questions were discussed in the course of the argument, but it is unnecessary to refer to them, as the court did not give judgment on them.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case raises a simple question on the construction of the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15), and there is no other question in the case. The company were exercising, as they thought, the powers conferred upon them by the Act, when they did what is complained of, and the jury have found that there was no negligence; if they had parliamentary power therefore to do what they have done, there is an end of the case, and they are right; if not the plaintiffs are entitled to damages, and the amount is 25*l.* The gas company laid down pipes under the road, and the road was supported by brick arches; the company opened the soil of the road and came down on the arches. They broke in and did damage to an arch belonging to the plaintiffs to the amount of 25*l.* Sect. 6 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, gives power as to streets and bridges, and no doubt very large powers are conferred on the undertakers by that section, when it provides that they "may remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges." The assumption of the Legislature seems to have been that the company might take a street (as defined in the interpretation clause of the Act (sect. 3), or a bridge, as something dedicated to the public, and having nothing under it which may not be taken, and the Gas Company might be trusted to go down under the streets and bridges and execute their works as they think fit. If the matter stood here, and the company came upon an archway under a street, and broke it up or removed it, on the construction of sect. 6, possibly a question might arise whether an archway came under the words, "all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges." It is not necessary to decide this question, but my own opinion is, that if it depended on sect. 6 alone, the company would have an absolute right to lay down their pipes under streets or bridges whenever they thought fit. But sect. 7 puts the matter beyond all doubt, for it provides that the company shall not lay pipes "into, through, or against any building." Assuming that an arch is a building within the meaning of sect. 7, Mr. Shield says that a building in that section means a building above and not under the soil of the road. Sect. 6 empowers the gas company to do their works in and under streets and bridges, and sect. 7 is added by way of proviso to prevent their interfering with buildings, and on what principle is it not to include a building which is under the road? It seems to me that it must include such a building. Both reason and common sense agree with that construction, for this legislation would have been very wrong and unjust if Parliament had given power to the Gas Company to lay down their mains and pipes in a building simply because it was under the road. We know that there are many houses in London which have cellars and other extensive premises attached to them extending under the street, and it cannot have been intended that such premises as these should be interfered with in this way. Then, was it a building within the meaning of sect. 7, which the company interfered with in this case? The arches stood under the street, and their history is not clear; it may be that they were erected to support the road, or they may have been made for the owner of the land to use as cellars, or for some similar purpose. Certainly they were supporting the road, and they had been used by the landowners, for they were occupied as store cellars. They were not a natural formation, but were artificial, and they were useful to the owners of the land for purposes for which buildings are commonly used. I am at a loss to conceive why they should be considered not to be buildings; in my opinion they are buildings clearly within the meaning of the 7th section. The result is, that the defendants have not Parliamentary powers to interfere with the buildings which they have interfered with, and having exceeded their powers, they have become trespassers, and are liable in damages to the plaintiffs. The decision of the learned judge must therefore be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for 25l.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I agree in the result, but not exactly on the same grounds, for on the construction of sect. 6, I think that the defendants were acting beyond their powers, which appear to me to be limited by that section to laying down pipes within the soil. I cannot think that, the power being thus limited to the right of laying down pipes within the soil, anything which is not the soil can come within the power. It may be a question to what depth the soil of the street will extend, but I think that the power to lay down pipes under the street is co-extensive and commensurate with what is the soil of the street. I agree with the Lord Chancellor as to the meaning of sect. 7, and I reject the contention of Mr. Shield that it applies to buildings which are above ground only. For the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chancellor, I think it cannot be so limited. Houses which are built partly below the surface of the street, are buildings under ground, and I think the Legislature meant to compel the companies to divert the course of their pipes so as to avoid all buildings either under or on the street. If the arches were constructed solely to support the street, it might be a question whether they would be buildings within the meaning of the 7th section or not, but here, having been apparently used as long as the street was there by the owners of the land, and having been used as subsidiary to the occupation of the adjoining houses, they are buildings distinguishable from a mere construction for the purpose of supporting the road. There ought to be judgment for the plaintiff for 25l.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is a building within the meaning of sect. 7. It cannot be denied that if the surface of the road were taken away and the arch left standing, it would be a building and a building only. Mr. Shield's construction is impossible, because he argues that sect. 7 is meant to apply to buildings above ground only, but sect. 6 only gives authority to place pipes under ground. The two sections, therefore, according to the construction contended for, would mean that the company might lay down pipes under ground, provided that they should not be authorised to lay them down in buildings above ground; but that cannot be the meaning. As to the other point I agree with the Lord Chief Justice. It seems to me that the company have power to acquire an easement or right of occupancy, and this is to be acquired gratuitously. It is evident, therefore, that beneficial occupation is not to be interfered with. The soil of a road, generally speaking, is of no use to the owner of the land, and therefore the Legislature intended that this comparatively worthless ownership should be disregarded. Mr. Herschell says that it might be the subject of compensation, but I think that cannot be. Compensation is not given for a right, but for the exercise of the right. I think the judgment ought to be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for 25l.

Judgment reversed.

(Before JESSEL, M.R., JAMES, and BAGGALLAY, L.JJ.)
FLOWER v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF LOW LEYTON. (a) Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 264
—Action against local board—Notice—Nuisance—Damages.

The object of the 264th section of the Public Health Act 1875, which provides that a writ or process shall not be sued out against any local authority for anything done or intended to be done under the provisions of the Act until the expiration of one calendar month after notice, is to give the local authority an opportunity of making compensation for damages which they may have wrongfully occasioned, without the expenses of an action, but that provision does not apply to an action in the Chancery Division for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to restrain a nuisance. Decision of Malins V.C., reversed, the Court of Appeal taking a different view of the object of the action.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C. The hearing in the court below is reported Vol. X., p. 511, where the facts of the case are sufficiently stated.

The Vice-Chancellor being of opinion that the real object of the action was to obtain damages, held that notice was requisite, under the 264th section of the Public Health Act 1875.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

J. Pearson, Q.C. Cracknall, and Shebbeare, for the appellant.—Our main object is to obtain an injunction to restrain the nuisance, though we also pray for damages for the injury already sustained by us. It has been held that the 264th section of the Act does not apply to a Chancery suit for an injunction, to which an action in the Chancery Division is now equivalent:

The Attorney-General v. The Hackney Local Board, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 244; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 626;

Baker v. Corporation of Wisbeach, L. Rep. W. N. 1877, p. 56.

[They were stopped by the court.]

H. A. Giffard (with him Glasse, Q.C.), for the respondents.—This is really an action for damages, as is clear from the form of the prayer, and the 264th section of the Act evidently applies to such an action. The prayer for an injunction is merely subsidiary. The whole statement of claim is a money demand. The Attorney-General v. The Hackney Local Board (ubi sup.) does not govern this case. There the decision proceeded upon the ground that if the plaintiff had waited for a month the wrong of which he complained might be irreparable.

No reply was called for.

JAMES, M.R.—I think it is impossible to hold that the 264th section of the Public Health Act 1875, applies to what is really equivalent to a bill in the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain a serious or irreparable injury requiring the intervention of that court. I think the plain object of the section, which was, moreover, explained in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Hackney Local Board (ubi sup.), was to give an opportunity to the local authority to make compensation for damages which they might have wrongfully occasioned, without necessitating all the expense of an action. The object was to enable the local authority, if it chose, to satisfy its liability by payment or tender of the amount claimed. But I do not think that the section was intended to apply to cases of nuisance, as if, for instance, the local authority was improperly pulling down a house or stopping up a sewer. Otherwise, the section would amount to a licence to every local board to do any injury it pleased, without the injured party being able to interfere till the expiration of a month, when the damage might have become quite irreparable. It is not contended by the defendants that that is the meaning of the provision in question; they only say that the present action, though brought in the Chancery Division, is really an old common law action for damages, and therefore comes within the 264th section of the Act. Although the Court of Chancery has ceased to exist, and a statement of claim has taken the place of a bill of complaint, still the judges of the High Court have all the jurisdiction and all the powers which the Court of Chancery formerly had, and can grant injunctions in the same way as that court used to do, and the only question we have to determine is whether this is merely an action for damages or an action in which the court should grant an injunction. Now, on the statement of claim I am satisfied that the acts complained of do create an intolerable nuisance, and that the main object of the action is to restrain the continuance of that nuisance, although the prayer also asks for damages for the past injury. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs' demurrer to the statement of defence ought to be allowed.

JAMES, L.J.—I take the same view of the case.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

Appeal accordingly allowed, with costs.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS v. NEW RIVER COMPANY. (a)

Water for domestic purposes—Public purposes—Fixed rates—Agreement—Watering roads—10 Vict. c. 17, s. 37—15 & 16 Vict. c. clx. ss. 35, 38, and 41.

By the New River Company's Act 1852, sect. 35, the company must supply houses within their limits with sufficient water for domestic purposes at certain fixed rates.

By sect. 38, domestic purposes are not to include engines or railway purposes, or baths, cattle, or fountains, or flushing sewers or drains, or any trade or business requiring an extra supply of water.

By sect. 41, the company shall, at the request of any consumer of water for purposes other than the purposes for or in respect of which the rates or charges are thereinbefore provided or limited, or at their own instance, afford a supply of water by means of a meter, and charge for the same at certain limited rates, according to the quarterly consumption.

By sect. 37 of the Waterworks' Clauses Act 1847 (incorporated in the said Act of 1852), the undertakers shall provide a sufficient supply of water for cleansing sewers and drains, for cleansing and watering streets, and for other public purposes, at rates and upon conditions to be agreed to by the undertakers or to be settled by justices or by an inspector.

The plaintiffs demanded from the defendants a supply of water by meter, under the said 41st section, for watering the roads and gardens on the Victoria Embankment, such supply being required only during one-third of the year and the driest weather:

Held, that the defendants were not bound to afford this supply at the limited rates fixed by sect. 41; but that they were entitled to claim rates for such supply, to be fixed by agreement or settlement, under sect. 37 of the Waterworks' Clauses Act 1847.

THIS was a special case stated by order upon the application of the plaintiffs without any pleadings.

1. This is an action brought to try the right of the plaintiffs, the Metropolitan Board of Works, to have afforded to them by the defendants a supply of water by meter, under the provisions of the 41st section of the New River Company's Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clx.), for watering the roads and gardens upon the Victoria Embankment; the defendants deny their obligation to supply water for such purposes under that section.

2. The defendants are a company originally constituted under a charter granted in the reign of King James the First in 1620, by the name of "The Governor and Company of the New River brought from Chadwell and Amwell, to London, for bringing water from certain springs at Chadwell and Amwell, in the county of Hertford, into the city of London, for the supply of water."

3. The defendants were not restricted by the charter to any price or terms for the supply of their water, but were authorised by the charter to lay down their pipes and acquire property.

4. The defendants continued to act solely under their charter down to the year 1852, in which year the said New River Company's Act 1852, was passed.

5. In that year also was passed the Metropolis Water Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), since amended by the Metropolis Water Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113).

6. By the 35th section of the New River Company's Act 1852, it is enacted as follows:

35. That the company shall, at the request of the owner or occupier of any house or part of a house in any street within their limits in which any pipe of the company shall be laid, or of any person who, under the provisions of this Act or any Act incorporated therewith, shall be entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic purposes, furnish to such owner or occupier or other person a sufficient supply of water for domestic purposes at the rates hereinafter specified; (that is to say) for water supplied to any dwelling house; where the annual value of the dwelling house shall not exceed 200*l.*, at a rate per cent. per annum on such value not exceeding 4*l.*; where such annual value shall exceed 200*l.*, at a rate per cent. per annum on such value not exceeding 3*l.* If there be a water closet or water closets, or fixed bath or baths, or any high service in such dwelling house or place, then in addition to the rates above specified, the following rates shall be payable; (that is to say) where the annual value of such house shall exceed 30*l.*, but shall not exceed 50*l.*, a rate not exceeding 4*s.* per annum for each single water closet, fixed bath, or high service, and a further sum of 2*s.* for each additional water closet, fixed bath, or high service; where such annual value shall exceed 50*l.* but shall not exceed 100*l.*, a rate not exceeding 6*s.* per annum for each single water closet, fixed bath, or high service; and a further sum of 3*s.* for each additional water closet, fixed bath, or high service; where such annual value shall exceed 100*l.*, but shall not exceed 200*l.*, a rate not exceeding 8*s.* for each single water closet, fixed bath, or high service, and a further sum of 4*s.* for each additional water closet, fixed bath, or high service; where such annual value shall exceed 200*l.*, but shall not exceed 300*l.*, a rate not exceeding 10*s.* for each single water closet, fixed bath, or high service, and a further sum of 5*s.* for each additional water closet, fixed bath, or high service; and where such annual value shall exceed 300*l.*, a rate not exceeding 12*s.* for each single water closet, fixed bath, or high service, and a further sum of 6*s.* for each additional water closet, fixed bath, or high service.

7. By the 38th section of the said last-mentioned Act of 1852 it is provided:

That a supply of water for domestic purposes shall not include a supply of water for steam engines or railway purposes, or for warming or ventilating purposes, or for working any machine or apparatus, or for baths, horses, cattle, or for washing carriages, or for gardens, fountains, or ornamental purposes, or for flushing sewers or drains, or any trade or manufacture or business requiring any extra supply of water.

8. By the 41st section of the said last-mentioned Act it is provided:

That the company shall, at the request of any consumer of water, for purposes other than the purposes for or in respect of which the rates or charges are hereinbefore provided or limited, or at their own instance afford a supply of water by means of a meter or other instrument or mode for measuring and ascertaining the quantity of water so supplied, and may charge for such supply, not exceeding the following rates, per 1000 gallons; (that is to say) when the quarterly consumption of water shall not exceed 50,000 gallons, 7*d.* When exceeding 50,000 gallons and not exceeding 100,000 gallons, 7*d.*; when exceeding 100,000 gallons, and not exceeding 200,000 gallons, 6*d.*; when exceeding 200,000 gallons, 6*d.*; and a further rate not exceeding 25*l.* per cent., in respect of water so supplied at an elevation of more than sixty feet above Trinity high water mark.

9. By the 3rd section of the said last-mentioned

Act the Water Works Clauses Act 1847 (with the exception of certain sections not material to this case) is incorporated.

10. By the 37th section of the said Water Works Clauses Act it is enacted as follows:

In all the pipes to which any fire-plug shall be fixed the undertakers shall provide and keep constantly laid on, unless prevented by frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable accident, or during necessary repairs, a sufficient supply of water for the following purposes; (that is to say) for cleansing the sewers and drains, for cleansing and watering the streets, and for supplying any public pumps, baths, or wash houses that may be established for the free use of the inhabitants, or paid for out of any poor rates or borough rates levied within the limits of the special Act; and such supply shall be provided at such rates, in such quantities, and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the town commissioners and the undertakers or in case of disagreement, as shall be settled in England or Ireland by two justices, and in Scotland by the sheriff, until in either case an inspector shall have been appointed, and after the appointment of such inspector, by the inspector so appointed.

11. A supply of water for watering streets is only required on certain occasions and at certain seasons, so that upon an average of years a supply for this purpose has taken by the authorities for little more than 120 days out of the 365.

12. These days almost entirely fall within the dry weather of the summer season, when the demand for domestic supply is at the highest point.

13. To supply water for the purpose of street watering, the defendants are compelled specially to provide additional permanent works and apparatus, and of greater dimensions than would be required for domestic or other purposes for which a continuous supply of water is required for the roads.

14. The defendants now supply a third of the whole of London.

15. The Victoria Embankment is within the limits of supply of the defendants, and the plaintiffs are charged with the duty of watering the roads thereon.

16. Until the present year, the plaintiffs have always received the supply of water from the New River Company under special agreements similar to that of which the following is a copy:—

No. 22. (Meter.)

Memorandum of agreement made this day of August, 1870, between the Metropolitan Board of Works of the first part, and the Governor and Company of the New River, brought from Chadwell and Amwell to London, hereinafter called the Company of the other part. Whereas by the New River Company's Act 1852, the company are authorised to supply any person or body within their limits with water, to be used within such limits for other than domestic purposes, at such rate, and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person or body requiring such supply. Now these presents witness, that in consideration that the company will supply the said Board of Works with water for watering the Thames Embankment according to the annexed schedule of general conditions from the day of to the day of next; the said parties hereto of the first part, agree to pay to the company after the rate of 1*s.* for each 1000 gallons for the water so to be supplied for the purpose aforesaid; the quantity of water to be ascertained by a meter to be attached to each of the watering posts, and also to abide by and perform the said general conditions in all other respects; which said schedule shall form part of this memorandum.

As witness to our hands.

JOHN POLLARD, Clerk of the Board.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS v. NEW RIVER COMPANY.

[Q.B. Div.]

SCHEDULE.

General conditions on which the company will supply water by meter for watering the streets, commencing at Lady Day and ending at Michaelmas, for supplying water by meter during the season, the charge will be at the rate of 1s. per 1000 gallons.

If the quantity of water used during the season exceeds one million of gallons, a discount of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for every complete million will be allowed up to 30 million gallons.

The watering is to be done by a cart supplied by the contractor with a proper metallic tube to the satisfaction of the company.

Iron stand posts are to be erected, and leather hose to be provided by the contractor or by the inhabitants of the district to be watered at their expense, and at all times to be kept in proper repair by them.

The company will not be responsible if such posts and hose are not so provided, but will, if desired, inform the contractors where these articles may be obtained.

The required meters will be furnished, fixed, and kept in repair by the company at a charge of 2l. 2s. each for the period of the contract, and will be removed by the company at the expiration of the contract.

All posts not supplied with a meter will be kept locked. The water posts in the different localities are to be used only at the undermentioned times.

Situation of Post.	Morning before the hour of	Afternoon after the hour of
Seven posts fixed in the Victoria Embankment.	Any time.

17. Under the agreement the plaintiffs would have to pay for water for the roads at the rate of 1s. per 1000 gallons, less a trifling discount, but under the 41st section they would have to pay 6d. per 1000 gallons.

18. The plaintiffs have required the defendants to supply them with water for watering the roads on the Victoria Embankment according to the provisions of the said 41st section; but the defendants have refused to supply water under that section for the said purpose, and deny their obligation to do so.

19. They contend that the 41st section only applies to cases of regular quarterly consumption, and not to the case of street watering, the requirements for which purpose are not only not regular, but for which purpose during two-thirds of the year no supply whatever is taken. That the standard of charges fixed by such section does not apply to any case where the irregularity of demand is such, that for two-thirds of the year there is no quarterly supply whatever; that the quarterly supply means continuous supply quarter by quarter throughout the year; that the 41st section only applies to the matters excepted in the 38th section, and does not apply to the watering of streets; that the supply of water for street purposes is regulated by the provisions of the 37th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, hereinbefore cited.

20. The questions for the opinion of the court are:—Whether the defendants are bound to supply the plaintiffs with water for the purpose of watering the said roads by meter in accordance with the provisions of the 41st section of the New River Company's Act 1852, and to charge for such supply according to the rates specified in the said section; if the court shall be of opinion that the defendants are so bound, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs with costs; but if the court shall be of opinion that they are not so bound, judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs. And the court is in that case humbly solicited to direct upon what principle the defendants are entitled to charge for such supply of water as aforesaid.

Brown, Q.C. (with him Biron) argued for the plaintiffs.—There are no rates or charges provided or limited in any section of the New River Company's Act 1852 before the 41st for the purpose of watering streets. This, therefore, being another purpose than those for which provision was made, must be subject to the 41st section of that Act. The powers given to the defendants by their Act of 1852 create a monopoly, and if there be any doubt in the construction of these powers, the public, whom the plaintiffs represent, ought to have the benefit of it.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), Thesiger, Q.C., and Hardy appeared for the defendants, but were not heard.

MELLOR, J.—I do not think we can give Mr. Brown's clients the benefit to which he has urged their claims. We are satisfied that the Act of 1852 was intended to enforce a supply of water for domestic purposes, and other purposes of the kind, at a fixed rate, but subject to the provisions for different purposes of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847. The first section which applies to these matters is the 35th, by which domestic purposes, strictly so called, are provided for. The 38th section points out what are not to be considered domestic purposes, and for these exceptions sect. 41 provides. The 38th section applies only to purposes of a private nature, although not strictly domestic, and they were, I think, intended to be distinguished from the public purposes for which the Waterworks Clauses Act, incorporated into the private Act, expressly provides.

LUSH, J.—I think this is a plain case. The 3rd section of the New River Company's Act 1852, incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, with exceptions not here applicable. The first section of the Act of 1847 enacts that it shall extend to waterworks which incorporate it into their private Act, "and all the clauses of this Act, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by any such Act, shall apply to the undertaking authorised thereby, so far as the same shall be applicable to such undertaking." There is nothing expressly varying or excepting sect. 37 of the general Act in the private Act 1852; and that section may well stand without doing violence to any words in the New River Company's Act. Sect. 41 of the Act of 1852 relates only to purposes of the same kind as those previously provided for, although not to those expressly mentioned. Looking back, we find sect. 35 treats of domestic or private purposes only; and sect. 38 treats of private purposes too, although they are not to be included under the head of domestic purposes for which sect. 35 provides. The only words which appear in sect. 38 which are to be found also in the 37th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act are Sewers or Drains; the context in each case shows that they are not intended to be the same things; in the Act of 1852 the sewers and drains are those of individuals; in the Act of 1847 they are public. This distinction is still more clear with respect to the other purposes treated in the two statutes. The defendants are not bound to supply the plaintiffs for this purpose at all under their own Act of Parliament; and if it comes under sect. 37 of the Act of 1847,

WILLING (app.) v. ST. PANCRAS ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (resps.) (a)

Poor rate—Hoardings for advertisements—Rateability of advertising agent.

A large hoarding, the property of the owner of the premises, was placed upright on the ground in front of a wall surrounding the garden of an empty house, which had been occupied for years only by a caretaker. The hoarding was bolted to the wall and propped up by struts in the garden ground; it was used for advertisements by the appellant, who had entered into an agreement with the owner to rent it for this purpose at an annual payment, and to give up possession at twenty-four hours' notice. The premises were assessed to the poor rate in the name of the owner, but were stated in the list to be unoccupied.

At other premises, besides a similar hoarding, boards were placed on the ground leaning against the walls of the garden, the house in which had been pulled down, and rebuilding had been commenced, but had been stopped by the bankruptcy of the builder. Here the hoarding and boards were the property of the appellant, had been erected by him, and were used by him for advertisements, a similar rent being paid to the owner, as in the former case. So also no occupier appeared in the assessment list, and it was proved that by the practice of the parish land upon which buildings were in course of erection was not rated. The appellant was rated in respect of both these premises:

Held, upon a case reserved by the General Assessment Sessions, that the appellant's use of these boards was not under the circumstances of either case such an actual exclusive and permanent occupation as to justify his being rated for the premises, and that the assessment was wrong.

The following was a case stated by the General Assessment Sessions holden under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, on an appeal by James Willing, against the Supplemental Valuation List of the parish of St. Pancras, made under the provisions of the said Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. lxxvii.), in which the appellant's name was inserted as the occupier of several advertising stations, and as such assessed to the relief of the poor.

1. The appellant appealed in one appeal against the whole of his assessment in the parish.

2. The Court of Assessment Sessions decided that the appeal should be allowed in all cases, except 291a, as numbered in the Assessment List, as to which they ordered that the assessment should stand. But they made this order subject to a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in respect to their decision upon 221a and 291a, before mentioned. The respondents moved for a certiorari, and brought up the order of sessions.

3. The general ground of the decision of the Assessment Sessions was that the appellant was not the occupier of a rateable hereditament so as to justify the respondents in inserting his name as they did as the occupier of rateable hereditaments, as appearing by the list.

4. The appellant carries on the trade of an advertising agent, and in pursuance of such trade he affixes his bills and posters to existing walls, fences, and hoardings, and in some cases he merely rests his advertising boards on the ground, leaning them against walls or fences, steadying them by cord or nails or other attachments, if necessary; in some cases writing the advertisements on the surface of the wall, and in others erecting hoarding expressly for the purpose of advertisements; and for the right to do this he pays rent or money to the owners of the fences, walls, hoardings, or lands on which his advertisements are placed or written. The value of an advertising station to the appellant depends upon its situation and the opportunities it possesses for displaying the appellant's bills and posters to the public. The following facts are stated as bearing on the two cases as to which a case was granted.

As to No. 221a.

5. Pulvis Cottage is the name of an old dilapidated suburban villa (No. 221a in the Supplemental Valuation List), not in the occupation of Mr. Willing, and only inhabited by a person for the purpose of taking care of the premises, and has been so since 1865, although continuously advertised to be let or sold. In front of the house there is a dwarf wall, with a pier at each end, and with a break in the centre, in which the upper gate of the premises is placed. Above the dwarf wall are iron railings. Behind the wall and railings stands a row of trees; in front of the wall and railings a hoarding or framework of wood was fixed in July 1874 by the appellant, expressly for the purpose of advertisements. This hoarding rests on the ground outside the wall, and it is about 15ft. high and 50ft. long, so that it darkens the house inside and otherwise interferes with the occupation of the premises for living purposes. The fastenings are necessary to prevent the hoarding from being blown over and from being removed. The hoarding is fixed in its place partly by being bolted to the wall and tied to the railings with wire fastenings, and partly by pieces of wood from the top of the hoarding nailed in some places to the trees inside, and in some places struts run to the garden ground behind.

6. Pulvis Cottage was assessed in the Valuation List of the parish in 1870, and this assessment still remains there, not having been removed from it. It is therein stated to be unoccupied, and no name of an owner is given.

7. The villa stands on a considerable portion of ground, having a garden back and front, but its front is brought up to within a short distance of the wall above mentioned. Between the front and the wall stands the row of clipped lime trees above mentioned. The owner had placed the house for letting in the hands of his solicitors, Messrs. Palmer, Eland, and Nettleship, of 4, Trafalgar-square, whose name appears in the correspondence copied below. They had let the house at one time to a Mr. Tyreman, whose name also appears in the correspondence, who intended to pull it down and build on the site; but he was unable to carry out the agreement, and he gave it up, and the premises remained in Messrs. Palmer's hands for letting.

8. They placed in the house a caretaker, to take charge of the house and give information, who resided there with her family, and who had the control of the outer gate of the front garden (above mentioned) next the road, and of the front door of the house. The outer gate was kept closed, and communication kept with the house by means of a bell, the handle of which was outside the outer wall of the front garden. The appellant had no key or right of access to the premises, or any other right inside this outer wall. The advertisements were changed or attended to by the appellant's agents from outside the walls. The hoarding was originally put up when Mr. Tyreman was in occupation; there was no evidence as to what passed between Mr. Tyreman and the appellant, but the following letters were put in evidence:

Gentlemen,—Referring to our interview with you, we beg to say our clients will accept a rent of 25*l.* a year for liberty to affix your advertising boards, such rent to run from 1st July last, and the letting in other respects to be subject to the terms mentioned in our letter of the 31st ult.—Yours obediently,

To the boards or hoardings above described was fixed, among other advertisements, the board advertising the house for letting or sale. This board was the property of Messrs. Palmer and Co., or the owner. As to these premises, the court removed the name of the appellant from the Valuation List.

As to No. 291*a*.

9. Upon the ground upon which the hoarding hereinafter mentioned stood at the time of the Supplemental List being made out there stood, in 1870, when the Valuation List was made out, a house and shop, and which were assessed in that valuation list. In the assessment Richard Wood appeared as the name of the occupier, and T. K. Armitage as the name of the owner. The house and shop stood back from the road in a small garden, and in front towards the road there was a low wall bounding the premises. Since 1870 the owner determined to let the site for building, and the house and shop were let for building to a person who shortly after became bankrupt, having first pulled down the house and shop and commenced to dig the foundations of the new buildings. Upon the premises being pulled down the assessment was taken out of the valuation list, and remained so struck out until the appellant's name was inserted as occupier.

10. During the time during which this person held the premises the appellant obtained permission from him to use the house for advertising purposes to the extent hereafter mentioned, but under what precise circumstances there was no direct evidence. It was in evidence, however, that this person was succeeded by a person named West, by whose permission the appellant still continued to use the premises as hereinafter mentioned. A receipt was put in evidence, which was as follows:

1, Powis-place, Haverstock Hill, Oct. 10, 1874.

Received of Messrs. Willing and Co. the sum of 3*l.* 15*s.*, one quarter's rent for use of hoarding for advertising purposes, due Michaelmas day last.

ARTHUR WEST.

11. The appellant placed advertising boards outside the walls upon the ground in the street leaning against the outside face of the wall which ran in front of the premises as before-mentioned. These boards were placed along the whole length of the wall except at a gap which had been pulled down by the builders to admit the carts used for conveying the building materials to the houses, and otherwise used in the course of the building. Inside the wall between the wall and the site of the old buildings and between the wall and the new buildings which were in course of erection at the time when the supplemental list was made out, and at the time of the appeal the appellant let into the earth some ordinary scaffold poles to which at such a height as to be seen from the street above the board above-mentioned was fastened a horizontal framework upon which the advertisements were exhibited. To further support this hoarding struts were carried back at an angle resting on the ground behind. These hoardings were originally erected by and remained the property of the appellant.

12. During all the time during which these advertisements were thus exhibited, West carried on his building operations on the land, and the houses were nearly at their full height when the appeal was heard.

13. It is not the practice of the parish authorities to put any assessment upon land on which buildings are being erected, and new buildings are not assessed in the ordinary way until they are occupied, when they are brought into rating. As to these premises the court affirmed the valuation list.

14. The appellant admits the amount of the assessment to be correct provided he is liable to be assessed at all; but he contends with reference to the order of sessions that confirms the valuation list as to the advertising station at Powis-place, No. 291*a*, that he is not an occupier or at any rate not exclusively the occupier of a rateable hereditament, so as to make him rateable; that West, if any person, is the occupier; that the true legal inference from the facts above stated is that all he had was, at the most, what is described in one of the cases as an easement of occupation or a mere licence to erect the hoarding and display his advertisements in the mode above described; and that the appellant's name as such should be removed from the valuation list, and the order of the sessions dismissing his appeal should be quashed.

The respondents contend as to the order of the sessions removing the name of the appellant from

Q.B. Div.]

WILLING (app.) v. ST. PANCRAZ ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

the valuation list on the ground that he is not the occupier of a rateable hereditament at the advertising station in front of Pulvis Cottage, 221a. That the appellant is such an occupier, and that the order of the sessions, in so far that it confirms the appeal, should be quashed.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, whether looking to all the facts and circumstances above stated the court of assessment sessions were right in removing the appellant's name from the valuation list in respect of the premises No. 221a.; secondly, whether the said court of assessment sessions were right in retaining the name of the appellant in the valuation list, in respect of the premises No. 291a.

The order of sessions is to be varied or confirmed in accordance with the judgment of the court.

F. M. White, Q.C. and Paine argued for the appellant;

Poland and Castle for the rating authorities.—The arguments on each side sufficiently appear from the judgments of the court.

MELLOR, J.—I consider we must look at the facts for the determination of each question of this kind. As was said by the judges in the case of Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge (3 E. & B. 383, 390), "We think that we must look not so much at the words as the substance of the agreement." The best test to apply to these facts is that of Lord Hatherley in Cory v. Bristow (L. Rep. 2 App. Cas. 262, 275), "As Lord Campbell expresses it in one of the cases last cited (Forrest v. Overseers of Greenwich (8 E. & B. at p. 900) as regards the nature of the occupation the question is whether it be a permanent and profitable occupation of land within the parish which seeks to assess the person in respect of such occupation. As regards the interest of the person who is so to be rated, it must be an interest in himself exclusively." It seems to me that there is no distinction between the two cases which the court below has decided differently. Pulvis Cottage is held not to be rateable in the appellant's name. It is a house in the hands of a caretaker, but advertised to be let. In fact, it may be said to be unoccupied by any person but the owner until some one may rent it. The arrangement between the owner and the appellant was this: the appellant said, Allow me to put up a hoarding upon which I may affix advertisements, my payment to be so much a year, possession to be surrendered by me at twenty-four hours' notice. The owner agreed. Now the first letter contained the word rent, and referred to payment per annum; but looking at the whole arrangement in the light which Hill and Blackburn, J.J. applied to Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge, I think we ought not to be bound by those words. Was there ever an intention on the owner's part to deprive himself of occupation of the premises? Looking at all the circumstances the case seems to me entirely distinguishable from Cory v. Bristow. No exclusive occupation was permanently vested in the appellant. I do not see that the other case differs materially. The owner was building houses close to the hoarding. It is clear he only intended to allow the advertisements during the time he was building. The compensation agreed was in similar terms and for the same purpose. It was, I think, a mere licence in the nature of an easement. Blackburn, J.

said, in a case with respect to the rateability of moorings in the Thames which were used by the appellant to moor his hulk as a floating coal depot, under an agreement with the conservators, who were owners of the soil and the moorings, "There is no doubt that the conservators might retain the possession in themselves so as to be the occupiers, and for a sum of money, or gratuitously if they pleased, grant to another person the privilege or easement of attaching his barges to these moorings; in which case the conservators would themselves still continue to be the occupiers; and unless there be something in their Act to relieve them from being rated, they would be rateable; the value of their occupation being measured by the amount paid to them for their licence." (Watkins v. Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350, 355). That case is somewhat different from the present, but the appellant's occupation does not seem to me to be more than the privilege or easement which is there described. It may increase the rateable value upon the owner, for the practice of the parish cannot regulate the law, nor alter the character of an occupation. Lord O'Hagan said of rateability in Cory v. Bristow (p. 279), "The occupation to which it is attached must be an actual, an exclusive, and a profitable occupation." There are other cases on this subject, but there is no ground for saying they conflict when we properly understand the principles laid down by the House of Lords. After carefully considering those principles we conclude that there is no occupation here by way of demise which can be said to be actual or exclusive. The right which the appellant enjoyed was a mere permissive licence in the nature of an easement; the owner did not part with possession; on the contrary, he seems to have fully intended to resume possession himself. These advertising boards cannot, in my opinion, be the subject of rating, unless they are in the hands of the real owner of the soil; about that we are not asked, and although I cannot help thinking it may be so, my brother Lush is doubtful, and we need say nothing about it. We are clear that the appellant Willing is not rateable in either of the cases reserved.

LUSH, J.—As the only question necessary to be determined is, whether Willing, the advertising agent, is rateable, I have not addressed my mind to the question, whether these boards ought to increase the rateable value of the land upon the owner. I say nothing on that point. As to the other I have written my views. [Reads following judgment.]—The question we have to decide is, whether the appellant was an occupier of land within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth. It is not easy to give an accurate and exhaustive definition of the word "occupier." Occupation includes possession as its primary element, but it also includes something more. Legal possession does not of itself constitute an occupation. The owner of a vacant house is in possession, and may maintain trespass against any one who invades it, but so long as he leaves it vacant, he is not rateable for it as an occupier. It, however, he furnishes it and keeps it ready for habitation whenever he pleases to go to it, he is an occupier, though he may not reside in it one day in a year. On the other hand a person who, without having any title, takes actual possession of a house or piece of land, whether by leave of the owner or against his will, is the occupier of it. Another element, however, besides actual possession of the land is necessary to constitute the kind of occupation which the Act contemplates, and that is permanence. An itinerant showman who erects a temporary structure for his performances may be in exclusive actual possession, and may with strict grammatical propriety be said to occupy the ground on which his structure is placed, but it is clear that he is not such an occupier as the statute intends. As the poor rate is not made day by day, or week by week, but for months in advance, it would be absurd to hold that a person who comes into a parish with intention to remain there a few days, or a week only, incurs a liability to maintain the poor for the next six months. Thus a transient temporary holding of land is not enough to make the holding rateable. It must be an occupation which has in it the character of permanency; a holding as a settler and not as a wayfarer. These I take to be the essential elements of what is called a beneficial or rateable occupation, and to these tests we must resort, in cases like the present, which seem to be on the border land, and to present at first sight considerable difficulty. Where the subject of occupation is not a surface area, which is the idea primarily suggested by the phrase "occupier of land," but only a small portion of the soil, so much of it as contains a post, a pipe, or a rail, the element of permanence or its absence is shown by the way in which the post, &c., is connected with the soil. I do not agree with Mr. Castle, that the word permanence is used in this class of cases in the sense of being continuous as to its use, but in the sense of being permanently attached to the soil as a fixture. It would be an abuse of language to say that the owner of a post lying upon the ground is thereby occupier of the ground upon which the post rests, however long it may be there; but if the post is inserted into the ground, or otherwise so attached to it that it cannot be severed from the land without breaking up the soil, it has become one with the soil, and the owner of the post is thereby the occupier of the soil to which it is annexed. This element pervades the cases of water mains, gas mains, telegraph posts, tramways, mooring posts, and other like cases, in all of which, where the rateable quality has been affirmed, the ruling idea is, that by the mode of attachment the chattel has been merged in the soil; so that, by means of that which has been imbedded in or fixed to the land, the owner of it occupied the land itself. Tried by this test which explains and reconciles the cases cited in the argument, the appellant is not occupier of any land by means of the hoarding in the first case, or the poles in the other. It is impossible to hold that any land was demised to Mr. Willing in either. What he paid for was merely a licence to use the premises as he did. The distinction which the justices have made between the two cases cannot be maintained. In neither case has anything been so annexed to the soil as to become a fixture. In the second case, which is the stronger of the two, the poles are merely let into the ground in holes dug for the purpose; but they are not in any way attached to the soil, and may be removed without disturbing it. They are as much chattels as if they lay upon the ground instead of standing on it. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of sessions in the first case must be affirmed, and in the second quashed.

SERJEANT v. DALE.

SERJEANT v. DALE. (a)

Prohibition—Arches Court—Interest of bishop—Patron—Delay in application—37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, ss. 8, 9, 12, 16.

The respondent, the rector of two united parishes in the City of London, was represented by three parishioners to the Bishop of London under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, s. 8, for breach of the provisions of that section. Proceedings were duly taken under sect. 9 against the respondent, who neither appeared nor answered throughout, and the respondent was adjudged guilty and condemned in costs. Afterwards an inhibition from the Arches Court issued against the respondent, in consequence of which he was prevented from ministering in his church; and the livings were subsequently sequestrated for the stipend of the curate appointed by the bishop, and notice to tax the costs was served upon the respondent.

After the adjudication, but before the inhibition and sequestration, the respondent discovered, as the fact was, that the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's who had instituted him, the presentation at that time alternately belonging to them and to the Archbishop of Canterbury, had been since transferred by order in Council to the Bishop of London; so that the right to present to the joint living would fall to the archbishop on the next vacancy and to the bishop on the vacancy after.

About ten months after the adjudication, and about six months after the respondent's discovery concerning the patronage, the respondent applied to the court for a prohibition from further proceedings to the Arches Court on the ground of no jurisdiction.

Held, that the Bishop of London was patron of the respondent's benefice within the meaning of sect. 16 of the Act, and was thereby disqualified from acting in relation to the representation under sect. 9.

Held, also, that the initiatory proceedings essential to give jurisdiction to the Court of Arches were, under the circumstances, contrary to the statute, and void; and that the court had no jurisdiction to hear or adjudicate on the representation.

Held, also that the respondent was entitled to have the rule for prohibition made absolute.

On the 30th May 1877, a rule nisi was obtained on behalf of the Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale, clerk, calling upon the Right Hon. James Plaistead Baron Penzance, the official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, upon notice to be given to him or his registrar; and John Clifford Serjeant, Robert George Morley, and James Horwood, complainants in a cause or matter in the said court, entitled Serjeant and others v. Dale, upon notice to be given to them or their solicitors; James Horwood as sequestrator of the United Benefices of St. Vedast with St. Michael-le-Querne, upon notice to be given to him or his solicitor; to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to the Arches Court of Canterbury to prohibit the said court from further proceedings in relation to the said cause or matter, or in relation to the said sequestration, the said cause or matter being one over which there was no jurisdiction.

The following is the material part of the affidavit of the Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale, the respondent in the ecclesiastical suit, and the applicant for the rule:

1. I am rector and incumbent of the united parishes of St. Vedast, otherwise Foster, and St. Michael-le-Querne, in the City and Diocese of London, having been instituted and inducted thereto in the year 1847.

2. The parish of St. Vedast, otherwise Foster, was originally a peculiar of the Archbishop of Canterbury. From about the year 1421, the patronage thereof has been in the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being. The patronage of St. Michael-le-Querne had, at the time of my institution, long been and was till the year 1866, as I believe, in the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral.

3. Many years before my institution, the two benefices were united, and thereupon the alternate rights of presentation to the united benefice became vested in the patrons of the two benefices, that is to say the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being, and the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's. I was instituted on the presentation of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

4. On or about the 24th April 1876, I received in a registered letter several documents, viz.: one purporting to be a copy of a representation under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, under the hands of John Clifford Serjeant, Robert George Morley, and James Horwood, three of the churchwardens of the parishes of St. Vedast and St. Michael-le-Querne; another being a copy of a statutory declaration by the same persons; another headed "The Diocesan Registry of London," and purporting to be a requisition from the Lord Bishop of London requiring me to state, within twenty-one days from the date thereof, whether I was willing to submit to his Lordship's direction therein without appeal. This last document was, however, unsigned and was only dated "April 1876." Another document was a form of consent to submit to the bishop's directions for me to sign and return. Another document was a form of acknowledgment of the receipt of the said copy representation and copy statutory declaration for me to sign and return. With these documents was a letter purporting to be signed by John Shephard, registrar, and dated from the Bishop of London's registry the 24th April 1876, which referred to these documents.

5. On or about the 3rd May 1876, I was served with another copy of the said representation with the said copy statutory declaration annexed thereto, and stamped on the back with the stamp of the "Bishop of London's Registry."

6. I received, on or about the 30th May 1876, a notice purporting to come from the deputy registrar of the Arches Court of Canterbury, stating that His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury had signed a requisition to the judge of the said court to hear and determine the matter of the said representation, and appointing a time and place to consider what security for costs should be given by the complainants in the said representation.

7. On or about the 14th June 1876, I received a notice that the judge of the Arches Court had appointed the 18th July ensuing, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, in the public library at Lambeth Palace, to hear and determine the matter of the said representation.

8. Lambeth Palace is, I believe, in the county of Surrey, and in the diocese of Canterbury, and is not within the diocese of London.

9. I did not appear either in person or by counsel, at the hearing. I have never entered, or caused, or allowed to be entered any appearance for me in the registry of the Arches Court. On the 12th of July 1876, having at that time a belief that the proceedings against me were irregular by reason of the notice before referred to being unsigned and not sufficiently dated, though not at that time aware of any other ground of irregularity, I served a notice stating in general terms that the proceedings against me were irregular, and that I should hold the complainants liable for any damage that might result therefrom, upon Messrs. Moore and Currey the solicitors and proctors for the complainants.

10. On the 18th July 1876, as I am informed and believe, the said representation was heard; and previous thereto a conversation took place in open court between the learned judge and the complainants' counsel concerning the notice received by the complainants that the proceedings were irregular. The result was, that the learned judge declined to express any opinion concerning informalities in the preliminary proceedings, but offered an adjournment to correct them if necessary.

11. On or about the 2nd Aug. 1876, I was served with a document purporting to be a monition from the judge of the Arches Court pronounced in pursuance of the hearing already referred to, and reciting that the judge had pronounced at the said hearing that the complainants had sufficiently proved the practices, acts, matters, and things alleged in their representation, and that I had offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England in respect of the matters therein set forth, and further reciting that the said judge had admonished me to abstain for the future from such practices, acts, matters, and things, and had condemned me in costs; and proceeding to admonish me accordingly.

12. I applied for and obtained a copy of the special case required by the statute to be stated by the judge of the Arches Court, and of the judgment pronounced by the learned judge. I gave notice of appeal in Aug. 1876, against the judgment, but have not further proceeded therein.

13. On or about the 27th of Oct. 1876, I was served with a summons to show cause why an inhibition should not issue to enforce obedience to the said monition; and about the same time I was served with copies of three affidavits, one by the said John Clifford Serjeant, one by the said Robert George Morley, in support of the said summons, and a further affidavit of the said John Clifford Serjeant.

14. On or about the 12th Nov. 1876, I was served with a document purporting to be an inhibition from the Arches Court.

15. In consequence of the said inhibition, I have been prevented from conducting Divine Service or ministering in my church and the Rev. Charles T. Ackland, a priest licensed thereto, as I have been informed and believe, by the Bishop of London, has since officiated therein.

16. At some time about the end of Oct. or beginning of Nov. 1876, but when I cannot exactly say from memory, I first had reason to suspect, but had no certain knowledge, that the alternate turn or right of patronage in the united benefice of which I am rector, to which the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's had been entitled, had been in the year 1866 transferred from such Dean and Chapter and vested in the Bishop of London and his successors; and that the Bishop of London for the time being had thereby become, as I am advised, entitled to the advowson in the former benefice of St. Michael le Querne, formerly held by the said Dean and Chapter, and to the alternative turn or right of patronage in the united benefice. The occasion of my obtaining the information which led me to investigate the matter was in the sitting of a commission preparatory to the union of my said united benefice with the benefice of St. Matthew, Friday-street. I attended the sitting as being interested therein, and then for the first time heard it stated that the fact of the transfer of patronage had taken place. I thereupon made inquiries and learnt, as the fact is, that this transfer had been effected by an Order of Her Majesty in Council, dated the 18th Nov. 1866, and published in the London Gazette on the 13th Nov. 1876. I am informed and believe that the said Gazette is out of print.

17. Shortly after Sunday, the 25th March 1877, I learnt, as the fact was, that a sequestration of my united benefice for the purpose of raising the quarter's stipend of the said Rev. Charles T. Ackland had been affixed to the door of my church on that day; and shortly afterwards, the 28th March 1877, Mr. James Ellis (who had acted for me as the collector of my tithes for twelve or fourteen years) called upon me and stated that he had paid 28*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* for the stipend of the said Rev. Charles T. Ackland and the costs of the sequestration to the said James Horwood, one of the complainants, who had, I believe, been appointed sequestrator of my benefice, demanding payment from him of the said sum. I immediately dismissed him from the office of collector on the ground that I had given him previous specific directions not to pay any sum out of my tithes to any person whatsoever, and I confirmed his dismissal by a letter.

18. I believe that in the month of June there will be a further sequestration issued and further demands made by the said James Horwood as sequestrator.

19. On or about the 12th April 1877, I received a bill of costs purporting to be the costs incurred by the complainants in the matter of the said representation, with a notice that the 17th April had been appointed for the taxation of the said costs. I believe that I shall shortly be required to pay the said costs, and that the payment of them will be forced by process out of the Court of Arches.

June 21, 25, and 26.—The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), and Jeune, showed cause for the complainants.—The two objections to the jurisdiction are (1) that the judge heard the matter of the representation at Lambeth which, although in the province containing the respondent's parish, is not in the diocese, nor in London or Westminster, as required for the place of hearing by the Archbishop. [The arguments on this point were not considered, and need not therefore be reported.] (2.) That the Bishop of London who acted in the matters arising in relation to the representation was the patron of the benefice within the 16th section. The ordinary meaning of the word "patron" is the person who has the immediate right to appoint upon a vacancy; here the Bishop has only the second turn. In Reynoldson v. Blake (1 Ld. Raym. 192), the court, after citing some year books proceeded to say, at page 197, "which last books prove that though in case of united churches there is but one advowson in right, yet every patron has the whole advowson to his turn." This judgment is cited with approval in Robinson v. Marquis of Bristol (11 C.B. 208, 251). This limited meaning of the word was adopted by the court in Edwards v. Bishop of Exeter (5 Bing. N.C. 652), where a question arose as to the right of presentation when a Protestant and a Papist were co-patrons of an advowson. By 3 Jac. 1, c. 5, ss. 18 & 19, a Popish recusant convict, afterwards interpreted to mean any Roman Catholic, was disabled from presenting to any living; and the Universities were to have such presentation, "when it shall happen to be void during such time as the patron thereof shall be and remain a recusant convict as aforesaid." The court considered full force and effect was given to this transferring or vesting clause, if it extended no further than to that case where the patron, if a sole patron, or all the patrons were Roman Catholic. The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43), defined the word "patron" in section 3 as "the person or persons or corporation, who in case such benefice were vacant, would be entitled to present thereto;" and the Legislature seems to have considered it necessary to expressly extend that ordinary meaning for the purpose of including cases of joint or alternate presentation. But even if the Bishop of London be a patron within the meaning of this 16th sect., it is now too late for a writ of prohibition. There is no error on the face of these proceedings, and there was a remedy upon this ground of objection to the proceedings by way of appeal. The respondent, even after his admitted knowledge of the existence of this objection, allowed the inhibition and sequestration to go without appeal; and came to this court six months after his discovery to set aside proceedings in which sentence was given ten months before. "It is agreed by all," said Brett, J. in delivering the judgment of the court in Worthington v. Jeffries (L. Rep. 10 C.P. 379, 380), "that upon an application to any of the Superior Courts for a prohibition the court has a discretion in some cases to refuse to prohibit." In Blacquiere v. Hawkins (1 Doug. 378), it was laid down that a prohibition does not lie after sentence, unless the want of jurisdiction appear on the face of the proceedings. This rule was followed in Gould v. Gapper (5 East 345), although it was there held to be sufficient if the objection could be collected from the whole of the proceedings below; also in

Ex parte Cowan, 3 B. & Ald. 123;
Ricketts v. Bodenham, 4 A. & E. 433;
Chickham v. Dickson, 12 Mod. 132;
Pool v. Gardner, 12 Mod. 207;
Marsden v. Wardle 3 E. & B. 695.

In the last case, however, the recognised rule

SERJEANT v. DALE.

concerning Ecclesiastical causes was held inapplicable to cases in the County Courts. In none of these cases was the point of knowledge of the objection raised, and the only authority for making it of importance is the dictum, by way of exception to the above recognised rule, of Willes, J. in Mayor of London v. Cox (L. Rep. 2 E. & I. App. 239, 283), where he says with reference to a defect not apparent upon the record, "considering the conduct of the applicant, the importance of making an end of litigation, and that the writ, though of right, is not of course, the court would decline to interpose, except perhaps upon an irresistible case, and an excuse for the delay, such as disability, malpractice, or matter newly come to the knowledge of the applicant." Here by his own showing the applicant need not have delayed so long, and moreover his remedy still exists by appeal.

Charles, Q.C. and Phillimore supported the rule, the court requesting them to limit their arguments to the point raised concerning the period of the application, with regard to the circumstance that there was no appearance of the objection on the face of the proceedings. The principal laid down by Rogers in his Ecclesiastical Law, p. 748 (title Prohibition): "If the spiritual court has not jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit, it is never too late to apply for a writ of prohibition, nor is it necessary that the defect of jurisdiction should appear on the pleadings, if it can be collected from the whole of the proceedings, for if it be brought to the knowledge of the temporal court by suggestion that the spiritual court has passed sentence in a case altogether out of their jurisdiction, it is the duty of the temporal court to restrain and stay the encroachment," is supported by various authorities:

Gould v. Gapper, 5 East, 345;

Ex parte Williams, 4 B. & C. 318;

In the matter of the Dean of York, 2 Q. B. 1.

The only limitation of the general right is where the applicant, with knowledge of the objection, has acquiesced in the jurisdiction of the inferior court. It has been held in some cases that he cannot, upon his failure to succeed under such circumstances, turn upon the tribunal he has accepted, and obtain a prohibition after sentence, if the objection does not appear on the proceedings,

Full v. Hutchins, Cowper 422;

Newman and Uz. v. Moore, Freeman 298;

Lord Camden v. Horne, 4 L. T. Rep. 382;

Hart v. Marsh, 5 A. & E. 591.

This is not a point which could be raised upon appeal, for by sect. 12 of the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, no fresh evidence is admissible. That interest in a judge is ground for prohibition appears from

Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal, 3 H. of L. Cas. 759;

Brookes v. Lord Rivers, Hardress, 508;

Company of Mercers and Ironmongers of Chester v. Bowker, 1 Strange 639.

Here the applicant is the party aggrieved, and he is therefore entitled to relief ex debito justitiæ: if he suffers from the usurpation of jurisdiction of another court. There is a distinction in that case from an application by a stranger, wherein the court may exercise discretion (Re Forster v. Forster and Berridge, 4 B. & S. 187, 199); but even that distinction was doubted in Worthington v. Jeffries (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 379, 384), and it was held that "if the superior court is clear in fact and in law, that the inferior court is acting in excess of its jurisdiction or without jurisdiction, it cannot rightly refuse to enforce public order in the administration of the law by refusing either to issue a writ of prohibition, or put the plaintiff in prohibition to declare in prohibition." This also is the conclusion of Willes, J., upon the authorities in Mayor of London v. Cox (L. Rep. 2 E. & I. App. 239, 278).

June 29.—LUSH, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Mallor and Lush, J.J.).—We have received the greatest assistance from the learned counsel on both sides; and the full examination and discussion which the authorities bearing upon the main question underwent during the argument—viz., the question whether the applicant is too late in applying for a prohibition—have enabled us to come to a satisfactory conclusion upon a point which, upon a cursory view of the cases, appears to be left in some obscurity. We have called this the main question because we have never entertained any serious doubt that the action of the Court of Arches was from the first invalid, and that had its jurisdiction been questioned at an earlier stage a prohibition must have been awarded. The statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, confers upon the judge created by the 7th section a new and special jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is not enlarged by the judge having become official Principal, and the proceedings being in the Arches Court of Canterbury. The jurisdiction which he exercises under this Act is still a special jurisdiction, conferred and limited by statute, and if the conditions precedent to its exercise do not exist, the whole proceeding in the court is coram non judice. The course of proceeding is prescribed by the Act, sects. 8 and 9. A representation is to be made to the bishop, who is in the first instance to determine whether the proceedings ought or ought not to be taken against the incumbent complained of. If he thinks they ought not the matter rests there, if he thinks they ought, the parties have the option of submitting to his final decision upon the matter of the complaint. If they decline to do so, then, and then only, are the functions of the judge called into exercise. The court is not set in motion by the parties, but by the bishop after he has "considered the whole circumstances of the case," and he has come to the conclusion that further proceedings ought to be taken. His act in invoking the jurisdiction of the court is emphatically a judicial act. This consideration gives force and substance to the 16th section. By the Common law a judge who has an interest in the result of a suit is disqualified from acting, except in cases of necessity, where no other judge has jurisdiction. The 16th section contemplates and provides for this contingency by giving jurisdiction in such case to the archbishop, and requiring him to act in the place of the bishop so disqualified. Whether the party could have waived the objection by consenting to the bishop acting, as a party can waive the common law objection of interest in the judge, we need not determine. It is certain that Mr. Dale did not know the fact that the patronage of the living had been transferred from the Dean and Chapter to the Bishop until after sentence had been given against him and monition issued. We cannot yield to the argument which was much pressed by Mr. Jenne that because the Bishop of London has not the next presentation, he is not a patron of the benefice within the meaning of the statute. That which accelerates the turn of one of two patrons who present alternately, accelerates the turn of the other. The law does not measure the amount of interest which a judge possesses. If he has any legal interest in the decision of the question one way, he is disqualified, no matter how small the interest may be. The law in laying down this strict rule has regard, not so much, perhaps, to the motives which might be supposed to bias the judge, as to the susceptibilities of the litigant parties. One important object, at all events, is to clear away everything which might engender suspicion and distrust of the tribunal, and so to promote the feeling of confidence in the administration of justice, which is essential to social order and security. This is the principle which underlies this branch of the 16th section, and we cannot doubt that the word "patron" was meant to include as well a bishop who has the second turn, as one who has the next presentation, each being interested in avoiding the benefice. We are anxious not to be misunderstood in using this language. No right-minded person does or can for a moment entertain the thought that the Right Rev. Prelate, who was called upon to act in this case, was or could be influenced by any consideration of personal interest in the proceeding. The probability is, the fact was not present to his mind. Such an idea was emphatically (though unnecessarily) repudiated in the course of the argument. The applicant stands upon his legal right, and calls upon us to give effect to it, and we feel constrained to hold that the initiatory proceedings which are made essential to give jurisdiction to the Court of Arches were, by reason of the bishop being patron of the benefice, contrary to the statute and void, and that the Court had no jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry. Is the applicant, then, too late to apply for a remedy which the common law gives him, and which he undoubtedly would have been entitled to had he made the application before sentence? None of the authorities brought before us, when analysed and examined, appear to us to support the proposition; and seeing that the sentence is still in operation, and that if not stayed, it will, or may, end in deprivation, we can see no reason for limiting the right to a prohibition to that stage of the cause. The applicant has neither acquiesced in the jurisdiction assumed by the court, nor done anything to estop himself from complaining of it. He did not even know of the fact which creates the disqualification until after sentence had been given. We should require strong and explicit authority to justify us in assenting to a proposition so repugnant to common sense and justice, as that a person should be shut out from the benefit of an objection because he did not make it before he became aware of the existence of the facts which raise it. We can find none. We need not go through the cases: They are classified and explained in the elaborate opinion of the judgment delivered by the late Mr. Justice Willes in the House of Lords in The Mayor of London v. Cox and others (L. Rep. 2 E. & I. App. 239) and so much of that opinion as bears upon the present question justifies us in the view we have taken. This being our opinion upon the first ground of objection, it is unnecessary to decide the second ground, viz., whether the place of trial being neither in the diocese nor in London or Westminster, the proceedings are on that account void. We need say no more than that we consider it to be an objection deserving of serious consideration. We should, before the Judicature Acts, have required the applicant to declare in prohibition in order that our judgment might be reviewed in a Court of Appeal. But that proceeding is now unnecessary, as an appeal lies against this judgment, with the same advantage to all parties, and without the delay and expense of pleadings. We therefore make the rule absolute for a prohibition.

EVANS v. MOSTYN AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), sects. 13 and 41—Fencing of abandoned mine—Liability of lessor.

By sect. 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, the owner and every person interested in the minerals of a mine shall cause the top of the shaft of such mine when abandoned to be securely fenced, provided that as between the owner and a person interested in the minerals the former shall be liable.

By sect. 41 the term "owner" is defined to be the immediate proprietor, lessee, or occupier, and not a person receiving rent, or a mere proprietor subject to a working lease, or a mere owner of the surface.

The lords of Mold were freeholders of a mine, an old unused shaft of which was unfenced, and they had certain rights over the surface. They leased the mine to a company, reserving a lien on the minerals gotten for their rent and dues, with powers of distress and re-entry. The company went into liquidation.

Held, that the lords were "persons interested" in the minerals of the mine within the meaning of the Act, and therefore liable to fence.

CASE stated by two Justices of the Peace for the county of Flint, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 23rd Dec. 1875 an information was preferred by the appellant, who is Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the county of Flint, against the respondents, under the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (b), charging them

(a) Reported by S. HARR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) Sect. 13.—Where any mine to which this Act applies is abandoned, or the working thereof discontinued, at whatever time such abandonment or discontinuance occurred, the owner thereof, and every other person interested in the minerals of the mine, shall cause the top of the shaft, and any side entrance from the surface, to be and to be kept, securely fenced for the prevention of accidents.

Provided that

(1.) Subject to any contract to the contrary, the owner of the mine shall, as between him and any other person interested in the minerals of the mine, be liable to carry into effect this section, and to pay any costs incurred by any other person interested in the minerals of the mine in carrying this section into effect.

(2.) Where such abandonment or discontinuance has occurred in the case of a mine before the passing of this Act, this section shall apply only to such shaft or side entrance of the mine as is situated with leaving a certain shaft in the parish of Mold unfenced, and in a dangerous state and condition. The information was dismissed.

The respondents, as the lords of Mold, are the owners in fee of the mines and minerals under the place where the shaft is sunk; and they have also surface rights for the purpose of working, getting, and carrying away such minerals. The shaft, and the minerals under it, were demised to the Mold Mines Company (Limited) for a term of twenty-one years from the 29th Sept. 1864. The demise contained a power of re-entry and distress for rent and dues, and reserved to the lessors a lien upon the minerals gotten. The shaft has not been in actual use for more than twenty years. The company are in liquidation, and are not working the mines; but the respondents have not re-entered under the power reserved to them in the said lease. The appellant, in May 1875, gave the respondents notice in writing to fence the shaft, as being specially dangerous, which they neglected to do, alleging that it was the duty of the lessees to do so. The shaft was about five to eight yards from a wall adjoining a turnpike road.

The Attorney-General (Sir John Holker), Gorst, Q.C., and Bowen (the Solicitor-General Sir H. Giffard with them), for the appellant.—The inspector of mines may call upon either the lessee or lessor to fence. Surely the lessor is interested in the minerals. He may make shafts, adits, &c., to work the adjoining mines.

McIntyre, Q.C. and Coxon, for the respondents.—The lessors have no interest in the minerals, but only easements over the mine. The interest in the minerals which is to make an owner liable under sect. 41 must be immediate and direct, and not a mere rent or royalty. If it was intended to make lessors liable, why were they not mentioned? They are mentioned in other cases. If a reversionary interest is enough, then an interest in remainder is enough also. The lessor is much more likely to be absent from the neighbourhood than the lessee. [LINDLEY, J.—Then do you think that a cestui que trust and trustee may both be liable? or that the cestui que trust only satisfies the words "persons interested."] It is not necessary in all cases to have several persons interested. The lessee only is enough.

Gorst, Q.C. in reply.—The lessors have, by the lease, a lien on the minerals; therefore, they have an interest in them. They have also a power to distrain the minerals, and a power to re-enter for breach of covenant. Sect. 13 applies only to abandoned mines. That may be the reason why within fifty yards of any highway, road, footpath, or place of public resort, or in open or uninclosed land, or not being situate as aforesaid, is required by an inspector, in writing, to be fenced, on the ground that it is specially dangerous.

- (3) If any person failed to act in conformity with this section he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, &c.

Sect. 41.—In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . . The term "owner," when used in relation to any mine, means any person or body corporate who is the immediate proprietor, or lessee, or occupier of any mine, or of any part thereof; and does not include a person, or body corporate who merely receives a royalty, rent, or fine from the mine, or is merely the proprietor of a mine subject to any lease, grant, or licence for the working thereof, or is merely the owner of the soil and not interested in the minerals of the mines, &c.

an obligation is imposed on the lessor; for the lessees could not be got at.

GROVE, J.—This case is not free from difficulty. On the whole, I am of opinion that upon the true construction of the Act the respondents are liable to fence the mine, and may be subject to a penalty for having previously neglected to do so. Our decision turns upon sects. 13 and 41. (His Lordship read those sections.) The question is, Are the lessors "persons interested?" It is curious that the lessor is not called an owner. Generally he would be so, as distinguished from the occupier. It is curious also that he is not mentioned. But who else could be meant? "Persons interested" must mean some persons. At first the word "interested" seemed to me to mean persons having a present interest. In this case the lessors have, in some events, an interest in the minerals included in the lease. A lien on minerals is an interest in them; so is a power to distrain them, and a right of re-entry. These are direct interests in the minerals, and also present ones. I have arrived at this decision after some doubt; but I think it not an unreasonable construction to hold that the working lessee is liable in the first instance, and then the persons having such an interest as the landlords here have.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The real question is whether the lessors are persons interested in the mine within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Act. If that section stood alone I should think our decision clearly ought to be for the appellant. But sect. 41 has raised a doubt in my mind. These lessors are not owners under that. However, the lease gives power of distress and entry, and a lien on the minerals. To whom else could the words imply? The respondents do not show any persons who answer the description better than themselves. So we are driven by stress of circumstances to think they must be intended.

Case remitted to magistrates. No costs.

BARBER v CALLOW.(a)

20 & 21 Vict. c. 43—32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 27—
Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1875, s. 11—
Letting carriages on hire—Sale by instalments—Possession.

A., a coachbuilder, entered into an agreement with B., to let two Clarence cabs to B., on hire, at thirty shillings a week, with a provision that if B. paid the thirty shillings weekly, at stipulated times, for seventy-five weeks consecutively, the cabs should become the property of B., upon a further payment of 5l. If B. should omit to make any such weekly payment at the stipulated time, A. might re-possess himself of the cabs. B. made default in the weekly payments, and A. re-entered into possession of the cabs. An information, charging A. with keeping a certain carriage, for the keeping of which a licence was required by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 27, without having a proper licence, was preferred by C. In support of the information the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenues Act 1875, which declares that the person who lets a carriage shall be deemed for the purpose of the Act of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, to be the person keeping the carriage, was relied on.

A. contended that the carriage had been sold, subject to a proviso as to the non-payment of the instalments. The police magistrate dismissed the information.

Upon an appeal, it was held that the judgment of the police magistrate must be affirmed.

Held also, that the true construction of the agreement was that A. had not let the carriage for hire for a period less than a year, and that it was not a letting at all, but a sale by seventy-five weekly instalments.

THIS was a case stated by the Metropolitan Police Magistrate, sitting at the Police Court, Worship-street, in the county of Middlesex, within the Metropolitan Police District, under the statute of 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant (who was dissatisfied with the determination of the magistrate upon a question of law which arose before him [as hereinafter stated], on the 22nd Feb. 1877), the appellant having duly entered into recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

The facts of the case were as follows :

1. An information was preferred by the appellant, an officer of excise, against the respondent, under the 27th section of the statute of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, in the terms and to the effect following: "That after the passing of a certain Act of Parliament made and passed in the session holden in the 32nd and 33rd years of the reign of Her Majesty, chapter 14, one John Callow did, within six calendar months, before the day of exhibiting the said information, to wit, on the 12th Oct. 1876, and within the limits of the Chief Office of Inland Revenue, in London, to wit, at the parish of Shore-ditch, in the county and district aforesaid, keep a certain carriage, for the keeping of which a license was required by the said Act, without having a proper license under the said Act, contrary to the form of the said Act; whereby, and by force of the said Act, the said John Callow had forfeited the sum of 20*l*."

2. The following facts were admitted before the police magistrate by both parties on the hearing of the complaint: That the appellant was an officer of excise. That the said information was commenced and prosecuted by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. That the respondent, who is a coachbuilder, carrying on business in Islington, had not, on the said 12th Oct. 1876, a license under the said Act authorising him to keep a carriage. That on that day two carriages were in the possession of, and used by one John Rutter, under an agreement dated the 15th June 1876, and made between the said respondent of the one part, who on the day and year last mentioned was the owner of the said carriages, and the said John Rutter of the other part. A copy of the agreement is annexed to and deemed to be part of this case. That in consequence of the non-compliance with the terms of the said agreement by the said John Rutter, the said respondent did subsequently to the said 12th Oct. 1876, and before the expiration of the year, seize and take into his possession the said carriages and sold and disposed of them in the usual way of his trade.

3. On the part of the appellant it was contended that under the said agreement the letting for hire of the said carriages was for a period less than a year, that is to say, for a week, and so on from week to week, coupled with an agreement to sell the carriages in certain events which might or might not happen, and on payment of a sum of money for the purchase, and accordingly the person who let the carriages was under the provisions of the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1875, to be deemed for the purpose of the said Act of the 32nd and 33rd years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 14, to be the person keeping the carriage.

4. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the carriages in question had, under the said agreement, been sold to the said John Rutter, the purchase money being paid by way of instalments, and the purchase being subject to a proviso that the respondent might, on nonpayment of certain instalments of the purchase-money, seize and repossess himself of the said carriages, and that on the said 12th Oct. 1876, the said carriages were the property of and in possession of, the said John Rutter.

It was further contended on the part of the said respondent that if the said agreement disclosed an hiring, and not a sale, such hiring was for a longer period than a year, and that, therefore, the said respondent had not committed a breach of the said first named Act.

5. The police magistrate being of opinion that the respondent was right in his contention, dismissed the said information.

6. The question of law for the court was, whether, on the 12th Oct. 1876, the respondent had let the said carriages for a period less than a year, within the meaning of the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1875.

If the Court should be of opinion that he had not, the police magistrate's dismissal of the information to be confirmed; if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the case to be remitted to the police magistrate, or otherwise dealt with as the court should direct.

The following is the agreement referred to above:

Memorandum of agreement made this 15th day of June, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, between John Callow of 113, Cottenham-road, in the parish of Islington, of the one part, and John Rutter, of 3, Benenden-street, East-road, in the parish of Hoxton, of the other part.

The said John Callow agrees to let the said John Rutter two Clarence cabs, from this day, on hire, at the sum of 30*s*. per week, such sum to be paid by the said John Rutter to the said John Callow on each and every Friday in each week, from the date thereof, in advance, as the hire of such Clarence cabs, free from any reduction whatsoever on account of repairs on or otherwise.

And it is hereby agreed between the parties, that if the said John Rutter shall punctually and regularly pay to the said John Callow the sum of 30*s*. per week in a manner above described for seventy-five weeks consecutively, the said Clarence cabs shall be the property of the said John Rutter on his paying the further sum of 5*l*. for the purchase thereof, and the said John Callow shall and will hereby agree to accept the further sum of 5*l*. for the purchase thereof. And it is hereby agreed between the parties that if the said John Rutter shall neglect or omit to make any of the said weekly payments, at the time or times mentioned, it shall be lawful for the said John Callow, and he is hereby fully authorized, to seize and obtain possession of the said Clarence cabs, and this agreement shall be his full authority for so doing, and the said cabs must not be sold until paid for by the said John Rutter.

Bowen appeared for the appellant, and Robertson for the respondent.—The arguments of counsel were, in effect, the same as those advanced for the appellant and respondent, respectively, before the police magistrate, and are sufficiently indicated above.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This agreement is certainly not very artistically drawn, and it is not easy to construe the whole of it so as to give effect to every part of it, assuming that every part of it performs some function that has not been performed by portions of the agreement that precede it. Looking at it, however, and, as far as one can (to a document of this kind) applying a common sense construction, it seems specially to be an agreement for the sale of a cab, to be paid for by seventy-five weekly instalments of thirty shillings each, and a further payment of five pounds at the end of the seventy-five weeks or last instalment. That being really the substantial form of the agreement, I am of opinion that it is not a letting for hire for less than a year. It is not necessary, I think, to decide whether Rutter has hired it for a year, or for any longer period, but it is enough, for the purpose of affirming the judgment of the police-magistrate, which I think ought to be affirmed, to say, that the true construction of this agreement clearly seems to me to be that Callow had not let the carriage for hire for a period less than a year. It is, in fact, not a letting at all, it is really a sale by seventy-five weekly instalments.

Grove, J.—I am of the same opinion. The onus is upon the appellant, in this case, to prove that this carriage might be let for less than a year, or might be let for more; the words of the Act are "And every person who shall let any carriage for any period less than a year shall be deemed to be a person letting a carriage." Can it be said that this is a letting for less than a year? It appears to me that it is not necessarily a letting for less than a year, because the person to whom the carriage is let, as I read the agreement, has the power to keep it for more than a year if he chooses to pay the rent. It is the necessary implication from this agreement that the person to whom the carriage is let has the right to keep it for more than a year, if he continues to pay the rent for seventy-five weeks, and also the right of purchasing the carriage for 5*l.* at the conclusion of the seventy-five weeks. There is an agreement that if he does not pay the rent, the lessor of the carriage may take possession, but when you couple that with the fact that the person to whom the carriage is let has the power of purchasing the carriage at the conclusion of the seventy-five weeks, it shows that it is in the power of the person having the carriage to keep the carriage, if he so chooses, for at all events the seventy-five weeks, and it may be longer. It is not a letting for less than a year: it is a letting which the person to whom the carriage is let can compel to be for more than a year. No doubt there are one or two clauses that may be difficult to construe, and there is always this difficulty in construing an agreement of this sort. If you are to view it through the light of the agreement, it is impossible to say what level you are to bring your mind to, or where the canon of construction is to come from. I do not see how to construe it, except by applying the ordinary rules of law, otherwise you must alter the level of construction according to the level of the mind of the person who drew the agreement. The appeal must be dismissed.

Upon an application for costs, counsel for the appellant inquired whether it was the custom to give costs when the prosecution was by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Why not? Why should they vex the subject by an unnecessary prosecution?

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Saturday, June 23, 1877.

(Before CLEASBY, B. and HAWKINS, J.)

CARPENTER (app.) v. HAMILTON (resp.)(a)

The Medical Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), sect. 40, schedule A.—Wilfully and falsely pretending to be a doctor of medicine—Person describing himself as "Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York"—Question of fact for decision of the magistrate.

The Medical Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), by sect. 40, imposes a penalty on any person who shall "wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine . . . or any name, title, addition, or description, implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon," &c. The respondent kept a shop, where he dispensed medicine and gave advice; he had a diploma in the window, in which he was described as "John Hamilton, Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York," and he so held himself out to the world and the magistrate reported that it was not satisfactorily proved that the respondent was not entitled so to describe himself. He was not registered, and held no qualifications which would entitle him to be registered under the Medical Act. The magistrate having dismissed a complaint brought against the respondent under sect. 40 of the Medical Act:

Held (by Cleasby, B. and Hawkins, J.), on appeal, that the decision of the magistrate was right, as the only evidence of any false pretence was, that the respondent pretended to be what he really was; and also that it was a question of fact for the magistrate's decision rather than one of law for the court.

CASE stated by Mr. Knox, a metropolitan police magistrate, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43:

Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 stated that a complaint was preferred against the respondent and dismissed.

4. Upon the hearing of the said complaint it was proved on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact, that the respondent for some time past, and at the date of the occurrence of the offence charged, kept, and keeps, a shop at No. 404, Oxford-street, within the jurisdiction of this court,

(a) Reported by HENRY LEIGH and R. RIGWOOD, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

[Ex. Div.]

CARPENTER (app.) v. HAMILTON (resp.).

wherein he habitually dispensed and dispenses medicines, and gave and gives medical advice to patients.

5. I find furthermore, as a fact, that on the 18th Oct. now last past, 1876, Benjamin Fordham, a detective officer of the E Division of the Metropolitan Police, went to the said shop No. 404, Oxford-street, and had an interview with the respondent, in the course of which the witness spoke with the respondent in respect of his bodily ailments, and the respondent prescribed for him, and supplied him with a bottle of medicine for which he paid the respondent the sum of 5s. 10d.

6. I find furthermore, as a fact, that the respondent kept and keeps in his shop window at the said house No. 404, Oxford-street, and in a conspicuous way, a large diploma in a frame, in which he is described as "John Hamilton, Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York in the United States of North America," of the validity of which, beyond production, he gave no further proof.

7. I find as a fact that the respondent described himself, and held himself out to the witness and to the world substantially as Dr. John Hamilton, Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York.

8. I find as a fact that the respondent's name does not appear in any register showing that he is registered under the Medical Act, and that he does not hold any qualification or diploma which would entitle him to be registered under the said Medical Act.

9. The question of law then arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court, is whether or no, if, as on the facts as above stated, a man holds himself out as Dr. John Hamilton, Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan College of New York, and not otherwise, he can be held to offend against the 40th section of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), coupled with the 34th section of the said Act for interpretation of the words "recognised by law."

10. Or more generally, Does a man who actually practises medicine or the medical art, who holds himself out to the world as a medical graduate or the holder of a diploma of a foreign university or college and nothing else, come within the prohibition of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 40?

11. I dismissed the said complaint, as I was of opinion that the respondent did not wilfully and falsely pretend to be or use the name of a doctor of medicine contrary to sect. 40 of the Medical Act, as he only represented himself to be, and used the name of, Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York. It was not proved to my satisfaction that he was not entitled so to describe himself.

12. If the court should be of opinion that I was right in point of law in dismissing the said complaint, judgment is to be given for the respondent, and if the court should be of opinion that I was wrong in point of law, the case is to be remitted to me with the opinion of the court thereon, so that I may convict the said respondent and impose on him such penalty as I may think fit.

Sect. 40 of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90) is as follows: "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner, or apothecary, or any name, title, addition, or description, implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence pay a sum not exceeding twenty pounds."

Bompas, Q.C. (with whom was Finlay) for the appellant.—The Act was intended to prevent persons not registered from practising. Therefore, by using the title of Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York, the respondent falsely pretends that his name is on the register. The magistrate was wrong in dismissing the charge, and he should have convicted the respondent of the offence charged against him.

Besley and Tickell for the respondent, contra.—The respondent need not be registered in order to practise. The Act only imposes certain disabilities on the unregistered, such as rendering them unable to recover their fees, or to be eligible for certain appointments (ss. 32, 36). The fact that such disabilities are mentioned shows that unregistered persons may practise. The respondent has no means of getting himself registered, not having practised here before the 1st Oct. 1858. By sect. 15 of the Act, the persons entitled to be registered are persons then possessed of, or who should thereafter become possessed of, any of the qualifications mentioned in schedule A. That schedule contains eleven clauses, the first ten of which relate to practitioners with British or Irish qualifications, and the eleventh is, "Doctor of medicine of any foreign or colonial university or college, practising as a physician in the United Kingdom before the 1st Oct. 1858, who shall produce certificates to the satisfaction of the council of his having taken his degree of Doctor of Medicine after regular examination, or who shall satisfy the council, under sect. 45 of this Act, that there is sufficient reason for admitting him to be registered." (For sect. 45, read sect. 46. See 22 Vict. c. 21, s. 5.) It is a question of fact for the magistrate, and not a question of law for this court, whether the respondent has committed the offence created by the statute.

Ladd v. Gould, 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 335;

Ellis v. Kelly, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 331; 30 L. J. 35, M. C.; 6 H. & N. 222.

Bompas, Q.C., in reply.

CLEASBY, B.—We have to look at this case as it stands, and see what is the offence charged. The words follow those in the 40th section of the Act, and we may suppose all the words of that section to be put into the charge in the case. Now I do not like myself to deal with a question of fact, but how is it possible to make out a charge of falsely pretending to be something, when the only evidence is that the man pretends to be what he really is? Apart from the authorities referred to, it seems to me a question of fact, the decision of which the magistrate should not throw on the court. It is the magistrate who has to determine whether there has been a false pretence or not, and, the complaint having been dismissed, the case is really disposed of.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think the decision of the magistrate should be upheld. The offence charged is under sect. 40 of the Act. [The learned judge read the section.] Now, in order to understand this, we must see who are entitled to be registered. That depends upon sect. 15, coupled with Schedule A. The schedule contains eleven descriptions of persons, the first ten of which we may dismiss as not applicable to the present case. The eleventh refers to persons with foreign or colonial qualifications, and is as follows: [The learned judge here read the eleventh head or description of persons contained in Schedule A.] Now did the defendant pretend that he fell within the first head, or within the eleventh, as a "doctor of medicine of any foreign or colonial university or college," practising as a physician in the United Kingdom before the 1st of October 1858? If he did not, then he is not liable under this charge. The case expressly finds that he only represented himself to be, and used the name of "Doctor of Medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York," and the magistrate adds that it was not proved to his satisfaction that he was not entitled so to describe himself, but there was no evidence to show that in using the words "doctor of medicine" he pretended that he practised as a physician in the United Kingdom before the 1st Oct. 1858. I give no opinion as to what would be the result if a fresh summons were taken out; but taking this case as it stands I think the respondent is entitled to our judgment.

SHEPHEARD v. BRETHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

SHEPHEARD v. BRETHAM. (a)

Statute of Mortmain (9 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 3)—Charitable bequest—Premium on granting a lease.

A premium reserved on granting a lease is an estate or interest in land within the Statute of Mortmain.

FURTHER consideration.

Cordelia Angelica Read, by her will dated the 18th Dec. 1858, gave and bequeathed to the treasurer for the time being of the Hospital for the Cure of Consumption, at Brompton, Middlesex, certain personal property therein mentioned, "and all other her personal estate and effects, which she could by law bequeath to such an institution."

The testatrix died in Dec. 1871; and the bill in this suit was filed, for the administration of her estate in May 1872, by her surviving executor.

The decree, dated the 14th Dec. 1872, directed (amongst other things) an inquiry what parts of the testatrix's estate, either capital or income, passed to the defendants, the President and Governor of the Brompton Hospital, under the bequest in her will.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, dated the 20th April 1877, found that (in addition to a very large amount of pure personality) "the premium for the lease of the Old Coventry-street public-house and interest thereon from the 1st Aug. 1857 up to the testatrix's decease, amounting together to 1019*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*," passed under the above bequest.

By an agreement dated the 1st July 1857, and made between the testatrix of the one part, and John Walkor and Charles H. Walker of the other part, the testatrix in consideration of the sum of 600*l.* to be paid to her as thereafter mentioned, agreed to grant a lease of the above mentioned, public-house for a term of thirty-one years, at a yearly rent of 100*l.*, payable quarterly; and it was thereby agreed that the sum of 600*l.* should be paid by the lessees to the testatrix on the 1st Aug. then next; and, if from any cause whatever the said sum of 600*l.* should not be then paid, they should pay interest on the same at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

The premium of 600*l.* had never been paid. This sum, together with a large arrear of interest, was still owing.

A summons had been taken out (by the devisees of the heir-at-law of the testatrix) to vary the certificate by declaring that the premium for the lease, and the interest thereon, did not pass under the bequest to the hospital.

Higgins, Q.C. and E. Beaumont, in support of the summons.—The premium, and the interest thereon, is in the nature of unpaid purchase-money. The premium is a sale pro tanto; it is not pure personality; and, therefore, cannot pass under the bequest to the hospital. They referred to Brook v. Badley, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 106.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and Norton, for the Brompton Hospital.—The testatrix had no lien on the demised land for the amount of the premium: our only remedy is a personal action against the lessees. The amount in question is, therefore, pure personality. They referred to Edwards v. Hall, 6 D. M. & G. 74.

Glasse, Q.C. and Cracknall, for the plaintiff; and Humphry, for some of the next-of-kin.

Higgins, Q.C. in reply.

MALINS, V.C., after stating the facts, said: In this state of things, the lessees being in possession, under a contract for a lease, the testatrix died, having given all her property, in the manner I have stated, to the Brompton Hospital. The question is, whether she could give this premium of 600*l.* Now, that it is her personal property nobody disputes, and it is perfectly settled that arrears of rent may be given to charities. The reason is that the remedy for nonpayment of rent is, not possession of the land, but distress upon the chattels that may be found upon it, or re-entry for nonpayment. There is no lien upon the land for the rent. Unpaid purchase-money cannot be given to charities, because it is an interest in the land within the Statute of Mortmain. Now is this premium purchase-money or is it rent? If it is rent, it is regulated by the case of Brook v. Badley (affirmed on appeal). That was the case of a mining lease, reserving a surface rent, and a large additional rent of 750*l.* per acre payable in a certain way. At the death of the testatrix a portion of this additional rent was in arrear. The Master of the Rolls decided that it was rent, not unpaid purchase-money; and, therefore, could be given to charitable purposes. The case of Edwards v. Hall is also a decision that rent can be given for charitable purposes. Now a premium cannot be distrained for: it has not a single incident of rent. Then, if it is not rent,

(a) Reported by JAMES E. HORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CHAM. DIV.]

CRACKNALL v. JANSON.

[CHAM. DIV.]

what is it? The law is perfectly settled that a lessee is a purchaser pro tanto. Therefore, pro tanto, the premium is purchase-money: it is purchase-money for a limited interest. Suppose no rent had been received; suppose a lease had been granted in consideration of 600*l.* premium for thirty-one years at a peppercorn rent, what would the 600*l.* be? Surely purchase-money for the lease. And if it is purchase-money for the lease, then there is a lien on the land to recover it. A lessee being a purchaser pro tanto, it seems to me to make no difference whether he pays a premium only, or a premium and rent. If he pays a premium only, that, to my mind, is clearly purchase-money for the interest he purchases; and it is not less so if he pays an additional sum by way of rent. Suppose these gentlemen (who had a contract for a lease) had sold their interest to a purchaser. He must necessarily have had notice that the 600*l.* was unpaid, because the contract, under which they were in possession, obliges them to pay the 600*l.*, and they could not have produced receipt for it. What would have been the remedy of the testatrix against the assignee? There would have been no privity of contract. There would have been no privity of estate, because no estate had been assigned, as the lease had not been granted. What then would have been the remedy? In my opinion the remedy which every vendor has. She might recover the money by a sale of the property out of which the money was payable; in this case by a sale of the lease for thirty-one years. In this case, therefore, I am of opinion that the testatrix had a lien upon the land for the 600*l.* premium; that the premium is purchase-money pro tanto, and, therefore, could not be given for charitable purposes. The summons will, therefore, be allowed; the costs will be costs in the cause.

CRACKNALL v. JANSON. (a)

Bankruptcy—Secured creditor giving up security—Subsequent incumbrancers.

A. and B. were respectively first and second mortgagees. The mortgagor filed a liquidation petition, under which his affairs were liquidated by arrangement. A. proved in the liquidation for the full amount of his debt, giving up his security. B. did not prove in the liquidation.

Held, that the benefit of A.'s mortgage had passed to the trustee in the liquidation, and was kept alive for the benefit of the general creditors; and was not merged in the equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises for the benefit of B.

THE facts of this case were as follow: In Aug. 1871, Joseph Turnley mortgaged real estate at Selhurst, in the county of Surrey, subject to certain prior mortgages, to Diana Mary Heance Pellowe, to secure 1500*l.* and interest. In Feb. 1872, Turnley mortgaged the same property to the plaintiffs to secure 5500*l.* and interest. In March 1874, he filed a petition in the London Bankruptcy Court for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and resolutions for such liquidation were subsequently duly passed and registered.

(a) Reported by HENRY C. DRAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Diana Pellowe proved under the liquidation for the full amount of the sum secured by her mortgage, giving up her security. The plaintiffs did not prove in the liquidation for any portion of the debt secured by their mortgage. The mortgaged estate, on being sold, proved insufficient, after providing for the prior mortgages, to pay the sum secured by Diana Pellowe's mortgage and also the subsequent incumbrances. The trustee in the liquidation claimed to be entitled to set up Diana Pellowe's mortgage against that of the plaintiffs.

A special case, stating the above facts, was accordingly prepared, and submitted to the court the question being whether the benefit of Diana Pellowe's mortgage had passed to the trustee in the liquidation proceedings, and was kept alive for the benefit of the general creditors, retaining the priority to which but for Diana Pellowe's proof it would have been entitled over the plaintiffs' mortgage, or whether by reason of such proof it was merged in the equity of redemption of the premises comprised therein, for the benefit of the plaintiffs.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Creed, for the plaintiffs.—This case comes within the ordinary rule of the court, that a mortgagor cannot acquire a mortgage security created by himself, and set it up against a subsequent incumbrancer, also claiming through him. The Bankruptcy Act and Rules provide, it is true, for a second creditor who desires to prove against the general estate giving up his security to the trustee, but the latter can only take it subject to the existing rights of other incumbrancers. The Act and rules nowhere say that the mortgagor's bankruptcy is to make any difference in the position of those incumbrancers. Indeed, they are not framed with any reference to them, but relate only to questions which may arise between an individual mortgagee and the trustee. If we are allowed to take part of our debt out of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property, we shall prove for less against the general assets, and the aggregate amount of proof by Diana Pellowe and ourselves against the general assets will be precisely the same as it would have been if she had realised her security and proved for the balance due to her; being, in either case, the total amount of the two debts, minus the value of the security. They referred to Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 6, subs. 6 and ss. 16 and 40; Bankruptcy Rules 1870, rr. 99, 100, 134, 135 and 136; Ex parte King, 82 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 273; Otter v. Lord Vane, 29 L. T. Rep. 59; 6 De G. M. & G. 638.

Rigby for the trustee.—The object of the Bankruptcy Act is to divide a debtor's assets equitably amongst all his creditors; and, with that object, they do, to a certain extent, interfere with the rights of his mortgagees. Thus, they prevent a mortgagee from exercising his ordinary right of going, at the same time, against his specific security and against the general assets of the mortgagor. The principle is expressed by saying that the mortgagee is not allowed to have both the whole of a part and a part of the whole. Formerly, a mortgagee who proved under the bankruptcy lost his security; the only exception being that he might retain his security and prove against the general estate when the latter was so incumbered that the bankrupt would have no beneficial interest in it, even if the mortgage were removed

MITCHELL v. MOBERLEY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

(Ex parte Turnley, 3 Mont. D. & De G. 576). The reason why no mention is made, in the Act or rules, of subsequent incumbrancers, is that when the security is given up by a prior incumbrancer, they merely share rateably with the other general creditors. No special provision as to them was, therefore, needed.

Dickinson, Q.C. in reply.

HALL, V.C.—The question raised by this case is a new one. It seems to me that, in disposing of it, I must bear in mind the general principle of administration in bankruptcy, which is that the bankrupt's estate should be so administered as, on the one hand, not to benefit, and, on the other, not to hurt any creditor. Now, it appears that the plaintiffs held their security subject to prior incumbrancers. One of the prior incumbrancers preferred to give up her security and prove against the general estate of the bankrupt for the full amount of her debt. In order to do that, she had to give up her security, and the question is, for whose benefit did she give it up—for that of the subsequent incumbrancers, or for that of the general body of creditors? It is immaterial whether the security so given up was a chattel or real estate; it was, under the provisions of the Act, given up to the trustee in the liquidation. Now, the sections and rules which speak of a security being given up do not make any reference to the case of successive incumbrancers. The first part of the Act which it is necessary to refer to is that which follows sub-sect. 6 of the 6th section. It says that the debt of a petitioning creditor must not be a secured debt, "unless the petitioner state in his petition that he will be ready to give up such security for the benefit of the creditors . . . or unless the petitioner is willing to give an estimate of the value of his security, in which latter case he shall . . . give up his security to such trustee for the benefit the creditors, upon payment of such estimated value." That contemplates two things; either that the secured creditor will give up his security "for the benefit of the creditors, and prove for his whole debt;" or that he will, on payment of the estimated value, give it up to the "trustee for the benefit of the creditors," and prove for the balance. The giving up in either case is the same. Then comes sect. 16, sub-sect. 4. This again provides for the secured creditor giving up his security "to the trustee," and, again, sect. 40 speaks of a secured creditor "giving up his security." The giving up is, in each case, to be a giving up to the trustee; and I am of opinion that the result of such giving up is to put the trustee exactly in the position of the person who has given up, and consequently that the giving up is not to confer any special advantage on subsequent incumbrancers. On the other hand, it will work them no disadvantage. They will be in precisely the same condition as they were before; and such a result will be in conformity with the general principle of the law of bankruptcy, which I have previously referred to.

MITCHELL v. MOBERLEY(a).

Will—Railway company—Mortgage debenture—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, schedule C—Mortmain Act—Charity.

A railway debenture, which is in the form given in schedule C to the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, is pure personality, and therefore not within the mischief of the Mortmain Act.

Chandler v. Howell (L. Rep. 4 Ch. Div. 651; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593) discussed.

THOMAS ALEXANDER MITCHELL, by his will, dated 14th March 1875, gave sundry specific and pecuniary legacies, and bequeathed the whole residue of his property upon trust for his wife for life; and after her decease upon trust for charitable purposes benefiting the City of London.

In 1876 this action was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, and on the 15th July 1876, a decree was made directing various accounts and inquiries, and on the 16th March 1877, a scheme was directed to be settled for the future management and regulation of the charity.

In prosecuting the accounts and inquiries directed by the decree, a question arose whether a debenture of the Bridport Railway Company, forming part of the testator's estate, was or was not an interest in land within the Mortmain Acts. The debenture was in the form given in schedule C of the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and by it the Bridport Railway Company, by virtue of the Bridport Railway Act 1845, in consideration of the sum of £2000 paid to them by T. A. Mitchell, "assigned to the said T. A. Mitchell, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the said undertaking, and all future calls on shareholders, and all the tolls and sums of money arising by virtue of the said Act, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the company in the same, to hold unto the said T. A. Mitchell, his executors, administrators, and assigns, until the said sum of 2000*l.*, together with interest for the same," at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum was satisfied.

Kay, Q.C. and Tremlett, for the executors, contended that the debenture was pure personality.

A. T. Watson, for the charity, supported the same contention.

Sir H. M. Jackson, Q.C. and B. Hughes, for the widow, did not oppose.

Hemming, Q.C. and W. Barber, for the next of kin, submitted that the debenture was an interest in land, and therefore within the Mortmain Acts.

Ashton v. Lord Langdale, 17 L. T. Rep. O. S. 175
4 De G. & Sm. 402;

BACON, V.C.—No doubt there is very great difficulty in this case. The principal difficulty arises from the two most recent decisions on the subject. The earlier decisions, which have been gone through at great length on both sides, that of Lord Eldon, for example, Knapp v. Williams (sup.) which was first referred to, have established that tolls do constitute such an interest in land as comes within the Statute of Mortmain. Lord Eldon's expressions are very remarkable. I find him saying, "It is not at all within the mischief" (which means the mischief which the law of Mortmain was intended to prevent), "but the consequences would open a much larger field for charitable donations." Those struck me as being strange circumstances upon which to found a judgment; but nevertheless it is a judgment plain and distinct, and which I should not feel myself at liberty to call in question in the slightest degree, if the case before me fell within the facts or the law as Lord Eldon there decided it. It is unnecessary to go through the other cases which have been mentioned, in which there arises a plain difference of opinion between the judges. I allude more particularly to the decision of Lord Langdale in the case of Walker v. Milne, and the decision of Knight Bruce, V.C., in the case of Ashton v. Lord Langdale. The first decision is clear and plain, and is in favour of the debentures not being within the Statute of Mortmain. The judgment of Knight Bruce, V.C., is directly, in plain terms, and not only in spirit, opposed to it. The judgment is expressed in very few words. He recognises the principle which had then been established that shares in a railway company were not within the Statute of Mortmain, and then he says, "But with regard to mortgages of the undertakings and of the tolls, these interests proceed directly from the corporation, and appear to me to constitute a charge or encumbrance affecting lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, or some estate or interest therein," which are the words of the Statute of Mortmain. Then he says, "In my opinion they do directly and immediately charge hereditaments, namely, the tolls, if not the land itself by the use of which the tolls are obtained; and, if so, they are within the words of the 3rd section of the Act which has occasioned the bulk of the decisions that are sometimes complained of. Upon this point I dissent, though most respectfully, yet so strongly, from the decision of the Master of the Rolls that I ought, I think, to depart from it." That case was argued before Knight Bruce, V.C. by Sir William Page Wood, as I gather from the report, and at a later period Wood, V.C. decided Re Langham's Trusts, in which he seems to have followed that, but not without considerable hesitation. In his judgment he says (p. 449), after alluding to the decisions as to shares not being within the statute, "It was, however, different in the case of an express assignment of the tolls which the company were entitled to levy. The tolls did not belong to any individual shareholder, but they belonged to the company; and the company, by their assignment, placed their mortgagee in the same position, and gave him the same right as they had themselves. In certain events the mortgagee would be entitled to have a receiver of the tolls appointed; and a party who personally, or through the hands of a receiver, might take the tolls, had acquired a direct interest in land within the meaning of the statute. Without going to the extent of some former cases upon this point, he knew of no authority for saying that a security which gave a direct right or charge upon a property, which was in fact land, could be made the subject of a charitable bequest." That brings it round then to this point—the shareholders' interest in the undertaking is not within the Statute of Mortmain. Then it is said that the interest in an unincorporated company is within the Statute of Mortmain, because that is necessary to be stated in order to justify the decisions. The decision by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce was pronounced at a time after railway companies had become somewhat familiar, but in Lord Eldon's time there was no such thing as railways known. Then it remains to be considered what the nature of this railway undertaking is before you can ascertain whether the interest which the shareholders have in it (already decided not to be an interest in land), or the interest which the undertakers, or the directors, or the incorporated company have, is such an one as that by their mortgage in the terms here expressed it can be said to bring the case within the enactments of the Statute of Mortmain. Now the principle of the law of Mortmain is old enough and much older than the Statute of Mortmain, than any statute even of this country. It is a matter of public policy, a matter of political economy. "It is against the interests of the Republic that land should be held in dead hands inalienable." That is a most wholesome law, which I believe exists in almost all civilized countries. But there has grown up in this country of ours things totally different either from the monastic establishment, or any other encroachments made by incorporated companies; and by the authority of the Legislature an incorporated company is entitled to hold in what may be said to be the dead hand the land which is necessary for them to complete their undertaking. They are the owners, no doubt, of the land, but they are owners in what sense and for what purpose? They are owners of land in order that they may by its possession carry on a commercial undertaking. The difference between buying land and making a dock and getting from the Legislature authority to levy tolls upon the persons who make use of their property; the difference between that and a trading company that carries on the business of common carriers, and is engaged in various other undertakings is perfectly obvious and cannot be questioned. I am talking now about the principle of it. In Holdsworth v. Davenport (sup.), Malins, V.C., in considering all the cases that had gone before, and expressing a strong opinion upon them, although convinced of the necessity of adhering to those cases and obeying the decisions as far as he was called upon to pronounce upon the case, nevertheless, seems to have been struck with the inconvenience—I was going to say absurdity—of applying the Law of Mortmain to a trading company, as indeed nobody can suggest a reason why it should be applied to a trading company. But then, finding the decision in Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company (sup.), he felt himself relieved altogether from the weight of the former decisions, and that it was unnecessary for him to endeavour to reconcile the decisions as far as they were conflicting; and therefore upon the authority of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, he decided that the interest which the mortgagees took under a debenture was not such an interest in land as brought it within the Statute of Mortmain. That is a very plain and distinct decision of his. Then it is said that that is at variance with the decision more recently pronounced by Hall, V.C., in Chandler v. Howell (sup.) But the decision of Hall, V.C., is upon a totally different subject. The debenture there bears no kind of resemblance to the debenture in this case. That was a security made by a public company—not a trading company, but a municipal company—for the improvement of a town. An Act of Parliament had been passed “for improving and regulating the town of Aberystwith, and for supplying the inhabitants thereof with water,” and vested in the commissioners appointed thereunder the works and the soil thereof, and authorised them to purchase land, and so on. In exercising those powers they purchased land and erected works, and consequently acquired a power to charge the works, rents, rates, or whatever else was necessary in order to accomplish the purposes of their Act, not for their own benefit, not in the slightest degree for their own profit, for it could not be said that it was a trading concern in any sense. None of the attributes of a trading concern could apply to the waterworks company in that case, and they, for the purpose of performing their duties under the Act of Parliament, borrow money and then they secure the repayment of that money by stating in the instrument that they have borrowed money upon the credit of the works, rents, and rates authorised to be erected, reserved, and so on, and they grant and assign such proportion of the said works, rents, and rates as may be necessary for the purpose. What kind of resemblance is there between that and an incorporated company, incorporated for the purposes of trade, authorised to acquire land for the purposes of trade, which, but for their Act of Parliament, they could not acquire, and giving a variety of directions, which are contained in the statute relating to them, to carry on the business of common carriers and the other business connected with railway companies? The Vice-Chancellor (Hall) keeps this steadily in view in his judgment, and in commenting upon those cases which had preceded it, and some of which were in conflict, he says this (p. 659): “There is, however, a distinction between the case of shares and bonds which was recognised by Lord St. Leonards in Myers v. Perigal. There may also well be distinctions between shares in one company and in another, though the number of persons constituting each company would not affect the question. A partner in an ordinary company has no interest in land vested in the company within the Statute of Mortmain, and this may be said as to shares, whatever be the constitution of the company.” Then his Lordship refers, as I will immediately, to the judgment in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, but he says this: “The form of the security given was such that upon the true construction of the debenture, it did not give the holder the right which he was seeking in that case to have enforced.” What was the right he sought to have enforced? There had been assigned to him by the debenture the undertaking. A part of the undertaking consisted of land, which had been bought for the purpose of the railway, and which in the further progress of the railway turned out to be surplus land, but which was nevertheless land acquired under the powers of the Act of Parliament, and which, unquestionably, until they parted with it, was a part of the undertaking. Hall, V.C. says: “That was expressly held in the judgment of Turner, L.J., who put it entirely on that ground. And as to that the argument for the defendant has a strong bearing; that is, that necessarily from the character of the undertaking and the nature of the security, it is not a fair construction of the instrument to hold that the parties were ever intended to be in a position to take the undertaking itself or anything but the fruit of the going concern; and that what the debenture holder in that case was proposing to do would have the effect of stopping the concern altogether. Those observations have an important bearing upon the question whether the principles of the decision in Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, when applied to a case like this, would show that the holder of the security in this case would not have an interest in the land.” Then when I turn to the case of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, it seems to me to bring it clearly within this case; railways having then become very numerous in this country, and their interests being frequently the subject of decision. What the court was called upon to decide there was whether the form of the debenture, being identical with the form here, did pass an interest in the land. If it did, the debenture holder's right was irresistible. There was surplus land part of the undertaking, and if he had an interest in the land then it was quite clear he might have asserted his legal right. Not only was the common law case referred to in the case before Knight Bruce, V.C., a clear plain decision, but I hold it to be so, notwithstanding the somewhat ambiguous expressions in which Knight Bruce, V.C., dealt with that case. It was a clear decision that there was no such legal interest in the land—legal, at least, in the common law sense—as will justify a shareholder in bringing ejectment; but, if he had an interest, I do not know why he could not have brought ejectment. It is a plain decision that he had no such interest in the land as would sustain ejectment. Mr. Hemming said he might still have such an interest as would entitle him to apply for a receiver. That is what was decided in Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, namely, that he had no such interest. Now the judgment in that case is so clear, so elaborate, and was so well considered by both the judges who had to deal with it, that it is in vain to say that Lord Eldon's decision and the other cases were not cited in the course of the discussion. But whether they were or not, the principles of law must have been present to the judges who dealt with it, and if the objection could have been maintained at all that it was an interest in land, then the judgment in that case is all wrong, and all beside the matter. Lord Cairns takes the case by itself, and deals with it as if it were an interest created in the trading company, distinguishing it not in words, but in his observations from a canal company, or a dock and harbour company, entitled only to tolls and rates, or to any other than that with which he had to deal, namely, a commercial undertaking which required the assistance of a manager. The company could not be carried on without a manager, and the result of that was to produce what he, in his language, calls "a fruit-bearing tree"; and then the company, having that in their possession, and that being their undertaking, charge that undertaking with the payment of the money they borrowed, and although the words of "tolls and rates" are to be found, they must have meant the tolls and rates which this trading company could levy—not the tolls and rates mentioned in Lord Eldon's judgment, as to which I have nothing to say but to speak of it with reverence, whatever doubt I may feel—not tolls and rates upon a turnpike road, but tolls and rates which were earned by the expenditure of the company, by the labour of their servants, by carrying on that general undertaking; and until those charges were defrayed there could be nothing coming either to the debenture holders or to the shareholders, or to anybody else. Profits, and profits alone, are that which it is proposed to be assigned by the debenture. Now Lord Cairns, in the observations which have been frequently read, but which I may refer to shortly again, says: "Whatever may be the liability to which any of the property or effects connected with it may be subjected, through the legal operation and consequences of a judgment recovered against it, the undertaking, so far as these contracts of mortgage are concerned, is, in my opinion, made over as a thing complete or to be completed; as a going concern, with internal and Parliamentary powers of management not to be interfered with, as a fruit bearing tree, the produce of which is to be found dedicated by the contract to secure and to pay the debt." If that is all, what becomes of the suggestion, whatever has been decided before, and whatever previous cases have decided, that it is an interest in land? The contrary is decided by the highest authority, except the House of Lords, and decided in a manner which shows, as all will admit, and as those who do not recollect the judgment cannot fail to see, on reading it, that it received the utmost attention and the most minute consideration from the judges who had to deal with it. I take it that Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company establishes this, that the undertaking, which was the subject there, was a thing which from its very nature never could be comprehended within the Mortmain Act. To hold the contrary would be to negative and disregard every word of this judgment, which applies to the undertaking itself, the nature of the undertaking and the consequences—the results of the trade as carried on under the Act of Parliament. Then his Lordship says: "The living and going concern thus created by the Legislature must not, under a contract pledging it as security, be destroyed, broken up, or annihilated. The tolls and sums of money ejusdem generis, that is to say, the earnings of the undertaking, must be made available to satisfy the mortgage; but, in my opinion, the mortgagees cannot, under their mortgages, or as mortgagees—by seizing or calling on this court to seize" (which is only the mode of exercising the legal or equitable right which they had) "the capital, or the lands, or the proceeds of sale of land, or the stock of the undertaking—either prevent its completion, or reduce it into its original elements when it has been completed." The Lord Justice Turner's judgment is, in my opinion, equally conclusive upon the same point. He says at page 221: "The debenture assigns to Gardner all the estate, right, title, and interest of the company in the same. But these words are merely referential, and cannot alter the construction of what has gone before. They cannot, I think, be construed to extend the operation of the debenture. My opinion is, that upon the true construction of this debenture, it proceeds upon the footing of the railway being treated as a continuing and going concern, and that it operates only to charge the railway and the works connected with it, and the tolls and sums of money of the like nature arising from it, in favour of the debenture mortgage. Had it been intended to go further, and to charge the capital of the railway company, and the surplus lands" (which are quite distinguishable from any other land), "as it was contended before us that it does, there can be no doubt that apt words could have been found for that purpose." Then he speaks of the assignment of the undertaking, which was necessary to protect the debenture creditors against other claimants upon the property of the company. In other parts of the judgment he expresses a clear opinion that the only charge which the debenture holders have is a first charge on the profits. Now that was the state of the law when the question came before Malins, V.C. Now, nobody can doubt that Malins, V.C., bestowed as much consideration upon this difficult subject as the case required, or, indeed, as could be required. He goes carefully through all the cases that have been decided. It is not necessary for me to repeat them further, but referring to Lord Hatherley's distinction in Re Langham's Trusts, and the distinction which Knight Bruce, V.C., drew in the cases that have been referred to, he says, "That seems to me a refinement of distinction between cases as to which I agree with the opinion of Lord Langdale in Walker v. Milne, that there is no material difference, and though I feel a profound respect generally for the judgment of Sir James Lewis Knight Bruce, I entirely dissent from it in this instance; because to say that shares in a company are not an interest in land, but that an assignment of them, which is what a debenture really amounts to, is such an interest, seems so unreasonable that I should have decided the contrary without hesitation, if it had not been for those two decisions." As I read that expression of opinion by the Vice-Chancellor, it would then have been his duty to have considered those two decisions which were in conflict with the others he mentioned; but he thought it was not necessary, because he says: "All questions are now removed by Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, which decided that a mortgage debenture made by a railway company in the form given in schedule C of the Companies' Consolidation Act 1845, does not give the debenture holder a specific charge upon the surplus lands of the company, or the proceeds of the sale of them, so as to entitle him to an order for a receiver of the sale monies or interim rents. Therefore the mortgagee has only a right to take the tolls, and it follows that he has not an interest which is within the Mortmain Act. Then it has been said in the course of the argument that the decision of Vice-Chancellor

Hall in Chandler v. Howell is directly at variance with that. In some sense it is. Vice-Chancellor Hall does not seem to have adopted the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor Malins; but then it must be borne in mind that his attention was not called to, or at least he does not express any opinion upon the plain and manifest distinction between a turnpike road, where there is no property whatever in the trustees or any body else, and a dock or harbour company where there is no interest except that the shareholders are to take what profit may be derived from the thing created either by subscription or otherwise, as in the Aberystwith case, which was then before him, which was also not a trading concern. It cannot be denied that if it is true that this is an interest within the Mortmain Act, that would furnish the means of destroying a trading concern. It was not the intention of the Legislature that any such powers should exist in any creditor of a trading company or any other person. This is a debenture charging the undertaking, which I understand and construe to mean the trade the Legislature has authorised the company to carry on—that, and nothing else. All that is necessary to carry on the trade is vested in them, but for that purpose, not for holding it in mortmain, not for any of the mischief which it was sought to prevent by the law of mortmain, not for anything but what is consistent with the ordinary transactions of human life, and particularly with railway companies. They are entitled to the undertaking of the concern, they give to the mortgagee certain authority and power and interest by assigning to him the tolls and rates, as was done in the case of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company. The extent of that right is defined and settled by a most deliberate and exhaustive judgment, and without saying that the conflict between Hall, V.C., and Malins, V.C., is irreconcilable—because I do not think it is, if regard is paid to the difference in the two subject-matters with which they had to deal—but if it were so, then, in the obedience which I feel bound to pay to the decision of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, I should feel myself constrained to prefer the judgment of Malins, V.C., to that which has been more recently pronounced by Hall, V.C. It is quite unnecessary for me to say, feeling as I do unbounded respect for both those learned judges, how glad and how ready I should be to follow what I found to be a clear decision of either of them. For these reasons I am of opinion that this is not an interest in land.

HEATHER v. PARDON. (a)

*Nuisance—Noise and vibration of machinery—Injunction—Increased noise and vibration—
Form of injunction—Reasonable user of business premises.*

The plaintiffs, a firm of solicitors, were the owners and occupiers of offices adjoining the defendants' steam printing works, which had been working from 1848 to May 1875, without any complaint by the plaintiffs of nuisance occasioned by the noise and vibration of the machinery, though a slight noise and vibration could at times be heard and felt. In May 1875 the defendants made some alteration in their machinery, which the plaintiffs contended increased the noise and vibration, and they accordingly commenced an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from working their machinery so as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from working their machinery so as to occasion a nuisance or injury by vibration to any greater degree than had previously been occasioned up to May 1875.

Semble, the fact that noise and vibration from machinery has never been complained of for more than twenty years, does not deprive a neighbour of his right to prevent any increased noise, even though such increase be slight.

THIS was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from working their printing machinery so as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs. The facts were shortly these:—The plaintiffs were the owners of three leasehold houses, Nos. 16 and 17, Paternoster-row, and a house in Queen's Head-passage at the back of No. 17, Paternoster-row, on the first floor and upper part of which they carried on business as solicitors under the name of Heather and Sons. The defendants, Messrs. Pardon and Son, carried on their business as printers in premises in Lovell's-court, adjoining part of the plaintiffs' offices, and separated only by a party wall. These printing offices, which had been in use since 1848, contained eight printing presses driven by a steam engine in the basement. About May 1875 the defendants substituted a new and improved machine known as the Dryden machine for one of the older machines, and it was from this date that the plaintiffs complained of the excessive noise and vibration, caused by the defendants' machinery, in the said house, No. 17, Paternoster-row, and Queen's Head-passage, whereby they alleged that the use and enjoyment of the said houses and the exercise of their profession and business had been disturbed and disquieted, and the said houses rendered less habitable and valuable. In the month of August in the same year the plaintiffs wrote a letter to the defendants complaining of the noise and vibration, and giving notice that unless the nuisance were abated within a week proceedings would be instituted; and as the nuisance still continued the writ was issued in Jan. 1876. After issue of the writ, and in the hopes of avoiding litigation, the defendants caused the number of revolutions of their new machine to be reduced from 1500 to 800 per hour; but, as the plaintiffs still alleged that the nuisance continued, the action came on for trial in due course.

The defendants' machinery was at work almost continually during the day, and during the night also for two or three nights in each week; and a great deal of evidence was adduced as to the noise and vibration, and the damage done to the structure of the plaintiffs' houses by the vibration. The statement of claim asked for an injunction restraining the user of the machinery, "so as to occasion nuisance, disturbance, or annoyance to the plaintiffs, as occupiers of parts of the said houses, No. 17, Paternoster-row, and Queen's Head-passage, or so as to cause injury by vibration to the said houses," and for damages; but the latter claim was not pressed at the trial. That there was some amount of noise was not denied, but the defendants contended that it was no greater than had been going on for years, that it was not an unreasonable noise, and that the plaintiffs were over sensitive to it.

Kay, Q.C. and Freeling for plaintiffs. — The defendants' printing machinery is clearly a very great nuisance to the plaintiffs. The very fact that the revolutions of the Dryden machine have been reduced is of itself evidence that the defendants felt there really was some ground of complaint. The defendants contend that since this reduction the noise is no greater than it has been since 1848; but this we deny. But, even assuming the defendants' contention is correct, if an injunction is not granted, the speed of the Dryden machine may be restored to 1500 revolutions an hour, or even more, and the nuisance become worse than ever. We submit that we are clearly entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from working their machines so as to be a nuisance to us :

Broder v. Saillard, L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 692.

Sir H. Jackson, Q.C. and Hornell for the defendants. — The steam printing has been carried on for twenty-nine years, and where a state of things has existed for such a long period, the court will not interfere by injunction. In the present case the plaintiffs have shown a nervous sensitiveness to the noise which the court cannot attend to. The law does not regard trifling inconveniences, and every alleged nuisance, such as the present, must be looked at from a reasonable point of view, the locality and all other circumstances being taken into consideration: (St. Helen's Smelting Company v. Tipping, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 776; 11 H. of L. 642.) All these cases of nuisance are questions of degree, and the degree of noise here is not such as to warrant the interference of the court, and particularly where there is no greater noise now than there has been since 1848 :

Gaunt v. Fynney, 27 L. T. Rep. N.S. 569; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 8;

Freeling, in reply, referred to

Ball v. Ray, 28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 346; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 467.

Bacon, V.C. — No one can doubt for a moment that the law is clearly and distinctly settled, and has been so settled for many years. It is the law that a man is entitled to the quiet comfortable possession of his own property, and although the law does not restrict the exercise of any proper industry or business by any neighbour, it does prevent his exercising his industry or business so as to be an annoyance to his neighbour. With that limit (and that is the only limit) the defendant is at liberty to carry on his business of a printer, or any other business that he thinks fit, to any extent he likes; but what the law prohibits, as I understand it, is, that, in doing that, he shall not commit a nuisance upon his neighbour; and the single question, therefore, is whether what is done by the defendant in this case is a nuisance or not. Now there has been evidence, wholly uncontradicted, by credible persons, that the plaintiff is disturbed in the enjoyment of his property by the manner in which the defendant carries on his business. There is not an attempt to dispute it. The witnesses have been cross-examined, but there has not been a single fact upon which their testimony has been shaken. It is proved that that which was complained of when the action was brought did exist, and it is not disputed that at that time there was a noise which impeded the carrying on of the business and diminished the comfort of the plaintiff in the occupying of his house. Plaintiff confines his complaint to what took place in the year 1875, there having been the business of a printer carried on—a noisy business, as everybody must know—up to the year 1875; but at that time a change in the manner of the carrying on of the business was adopted by the defendant of which the plaintiff had reason to complain. Then what conduct did he pursue? He wrote a letter, not an uncivil and not an unreasonable letter, to the defendant, remonstrating with him on the nuisance of which he complains, and which he states in his statement, and which is plainly, distinctly, and emphatically that addition which had been made to the machinery employed by the defendant in the year 1875. He gets no answer, or no satisfactory answer, to that letter, and from the month of August when he made his complaint down to the month of January when he brought his action, nothing whatever was done to abate that nuisance. Then, the action being brought in Jan. 1876, at some period not very distinctly mentioned, but eighteen months ago—to adopt the expression of the defendant's witnesses—the revolutions of the machine were diminished from 1500 to 1100 per hour. Can there be a plainer confession on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he asks for than that which the defendant himself did? But it does not rest there, for still this dispute going on, the litigation having been commenced, nothing having been done until the litigation was commenced, about nine months ago another alteration is made by the defendant in this machine, the noise of which was the subject of the plaintiff's complaint, and it is reduced to 800 revolutions in an hour. After that, can the defendant with any hope of success try to prove, or try to argue, that the plaintiff's complaint is an unreasonable or frivolous one? Is it of any avail that he is bringing one witness, and one witness only, to say that he, an engineer, went into the house of the plaintiff while that machine was at work at its full speed, and that he could not hear any noise at all? because that is what it comes to. He says that with difficulty, putting his head against the bookcase against the wall, he could hear something like the rumbling of a passing cart. The plaintiff's case is wholly without a particle of contradiction. It has been proved by him, and admitted by the defendant, that for three nights in the week at least, all night long this noise has continued. It has been proved by the plaintiff, and not effectually displaced by anything that the defendant has stated, that the vibration is sensibly distinct. Mr. Heather, the plaintiff, proves it by that expression which has been used, and so often referred to, that he felt the vibration of the air on the back of his head as he sat in the room. The house-keeper has proved—and the cross-examination has not in my opinion shaken his statement at all—that the weights in the window frames by which the sashes were moved up and down were displaced by the vibration, that the windows themselves were shaken by the vibration, that the ceiling of a room came down by means of the vibration; and against that there is the single testimony of this gentleman who could not or did not hear, and, with that exception only, the case of vibration is distinctly made out. It is proved that the defendant carries on a noisy business, that he has as many printing machines as the premises will possibly hold, that he works all day long some of the machines, and that some of them he works all day and all night, and Mr. Pardon himself has said, in the plainest manner possible, and as might be expected from a gentleman of great respectability, as undoubtedly he is, that when the Anglo-French machine was removed and the Dryden machine substituted for it, at that moment an increase of the noise of which the plaintiff complains began. In my opinion a very clear case of nuisance has been established, and no effectual answer is made. In point of law, no answer can be made; and in point of fact, dealing with the case as a jury would have to deal with it, I consider the facts to be clearly and distinctly established. Now, the terms of the injunction which I think ought to be granted, therefore, require some consideration. I do not think it would be right to leave it in the vague manner in which the statement of claim proposes, and it is difficult to find any other words, because the last thing that I should do would be to make any order to impede, or fetter, the business carried on by the defendant. All that I propose to do is, to restrain him from doing any more than had been done up to the year 1875, in the way of disturbing his neighbours. I think, therefore, that there should be some such words in the injunction as these, "From working or using his engine and machines so as to occasion any greater amount of noise or vibration than had been experienced by the plaintiff up to the end of the year 1875," because it is from that time the plaintiff complains. He dates his complaint from 1875, and he asks no relief in respect of anything arising out of what took place previously to that date, and what he asks from that day the defendant has conceded to some extent, and if he had done a little more upon the receipt of that letter of the 13th Aug. 1875, this action might have been avoided. That is the order which must be made, and of course the defendant must pay the costs.

EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY v. TOBBAIN.

[H. OF L.]

House of Lords.

July 2 and 3.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), Lords HATHERLEY, BLACKBURN, and GORDON.)

EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY v. TOBBAIN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION.

Edinburgh Street Tramways Acts 1871 and 1874—Construction—Maximum fares—Omnibus "worked in connection with" tramway.

By the Edinburgh Street Tramways Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. lxxxix.) the appellants were authorised to construct a system of tramways as therein specified, and the Act fixed a maximum fare per mile, to be charged on such tramways.

By the Edinburgh Street Tramways Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. lxxviii.) the appellants were authorised to abandon some of the lines specified in the former Act, and to substitute omnibuses, and the Act authorised a higher rate of fares "on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." The omnibuses were worked in connection with the tramways.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court below), that the second Act did not authorise the appellants to demand the higher fare from passengers travelling by the tramways only.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord Justice Clerk (Lord Moncrieff) and Lords Neaves, Ormisdale, and Gifford, affirming a decision of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Shand) in favour of the respondent.

By the Edinburgh Tramways Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. lxxxix.) the appellant company were authorised to construct a system of tramways in the city of Edinburgh and its suburbs, to be completed within three years from the passing of the Act, and by sect. 38 it was provided that the maximum rate of fares should be at the rate of 1d. per mile. The construction of the tramways proved more difficult than had been anticipated, and in 1873 the company obtained an extension of the time for their completion (Stat. 36 & 37 Vict. c. cxxxvi.); and in 1874 they obtained leave from Parliament to abandon some of the lines altogether and to run omnibuses instead. (Stat. 37 & 38 Vict. c. lxxviii.) This later Act provided, by sect. 3, "the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on those routes" (where the omnibuses had been substituted for the tramways), "and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." The omnibuses were worked in connection and correspondence with the tramways, and the company maintained that the effect of the Act of 1874 was to empower them to charge the higher rate of fare over their whole system, as it was all virtually "worked in connection with the omnibus routes." This action was accordingly brought against the respondent, who had refused to pay the additional 1d. per mile, in order to try the right, but the Lord Ordinary decided that the Act of 1874 had not the effect contended for, and his judgment was affirmed, as above mentioned.

The case is reported in 3 Court of Session Cases (4th series) 655.

Thesiger, Q.C. and Hunter appeared for the appellants.

The Lord Advocate (Watson) and MacLachlan, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, I have seldom seen what appears to me a more unfounded action than that which was brought in the Court of Session in this case, and I certainly have never seen a more unfounded appeal. The opinion of the learned judges in the Court of Session was unanimous, and was in accordance with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. I think your Lordships can entertain no doubt whatever that that opinion was entirely correct. In the year 1871 the

EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY v. TORBAIN.

Edinburgh Street Tramways Company obtained parliamentary authority for making a system of tramways in the city of Edinburgh. (Stat. 34 & 35 Vict. c. lxxxix.) They obtained that authority with the concurrence of the local bodies who were interested, and amongst others the Corporation of Edinburgh, and they obtained the authority after distinct and formal agreements were entered into with those parties. Those agreements were scheduled in the Act of Parliament, and were declared by the Act to have legislative authority, and were ordered to be carried into execution. I will call your Lordships' attention to one of those agreements, which may be taken as a sample of them all. In the agreement with the Corporation of Edinburgh there was a very clear and distinct stipulation with regard to the fares which the company was to be entitled to charge to passengers on these tramways. The 10th clause provided that "In no case shall the second party, or the company, demand or take for any passenger travelling upon any or either of the tramways, or any part or parts thereof respectively, tolls or charges exceeding in the whole 1d. for each mile, the fraction of a mile beyond an integral number of miles being for that purpose deemed a mile, but the second party or the company may charge for any less distance than two miles any sum not exceeding 2d." The agreement is a very long one, and it is obviously entered into for the public benefit of the city of Edinburgh, the corporation acting as the guardians of the public interest. The stipulation which I have read was one of those which were made in the interest of the public. There are a number of other similar stipulations with regard to the mode in which the works are to be conducted, and in which they are to be maintained. There is a particular provision that the system of tramways which was agreed upon should be executed as a whole within the period of three years from the passing of the Act, and there are penalties for any breach of any term of this agreement. It was, of course, obviously necessary in the interests of the public that, the construction of the tramways of the city being handed over to a company of this kind, the company should not be left free to pick and choose afterwards what particular portion of the tramways it would execute, but should be held bound to the city to execute the system as a whole. Such was the agreement entered into with the corporation. The Act of Parliament (sect. 44) enacted that "the agreements which respectively are set forth in the three schedules to this Act are hereby respectively confirmed and made part of this Act, and the same shall be carried into effect accordingly." And in addition there was a clause in the Act itself which made very careful provision with regard to the fares to be charged. By sect. 38 it was enacted, "The company may demand and take for every passenger travelling upon any or either of the tramways, or any part or parts thereof respectively, including tolls for the use of the tramway and of carriages, and for motive power, and every other expense incidental to such conveyance, any tolls or charges not exceeding 1d. per mile (and for this purpose the fraction of a mile beyond an integral number of miles shall be deemed a mile), but the company may charge for any less distance than three miles any sum not exceeding 3d." Then there follows a very careful stipulation that if a certain number of inhabitants should represent that "the company are charging a greater sum than 2d. for distances not exceeding two miles, and that under the circumstances then existing such charge is unreasonable," the Board of Trade might be called upon to entertain and to declare whether that was an unreasonable charge by the company or not. The whole of these provisions, both those in the agreement and those in the Act of Parliament, point out in the clearest way that it was a paramount object, both with the Legislature and with the corporation as intervening before the Legislature, to tie the hands of this company to whom a large and probably a lucrative, undertaking was confided, against charging any fare which should be beyond the limit of fares provided by the Act and by the agreement. I pass over what took place in the year 1873, when Parliament authorised the time for the completion of the works to be extended (Stat. 36 & 37 Vict. cap. cxxxvi.), and I come to the year 1874. In the year 1874 one portion of the tramway system was found to be very difficult of construction, as we are told, by reason of the gradients, and of course it was a great object for the company to be relieved from that part of the undertaking, which, as things then stood, they were absolutely bound to construct. They applied to Parliament for that purpose, and they stated in the preamble of the Act (Stat. 37 & 38 Vict. cap. lxxviii.), which may be taken to be their representation to Parliament, that "by the second article of the agreement with the Corporation of Edinburgh it was provided, amongst other things, that the whole of the tramways authorised by the Act of 1871 should be completed within three years from the passing of the Act." Then the preamble recited "that it is expedient that the company be authorised to abandon and relinquish the construction of the tramways and parts of tramways in this Act specified, and for the convenience of the residents in the districts in which such tramways are authorised to be laid, to run a service of omnibuses in lieu thereof." The statement of the Legislature is that the company came as suppliants to be delivered from penalties to which they would be subject if they did not make these tramways in the specified time, offering, if they were allowed to be absolved from this obligation, to provide a service of omnibuses for the benefit of the public, who would thus be deprived of the benefit they had expected in the shape of tramways. That was the condition of things before the legislation of 1874. In that state of things the Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. cap. lxxviii.) was passed. It dealt with other matters perfectly independent of that to which I am referring, but it had in it two sections, and only two, relating to the tramways which were to be abandoned, namely the 3rd and 4th. The 3rd section provided that the company might abandon and relinquish the construction of the tramways in question, and that, this benefit being conferred upon them, they were to pay in two instalments a gross sum of 3000l. to the Edinburgh Road Trust, as part of the compensation to the public for the indulgence they were to receive. Of course it was obvious that a large service of omnibuses thrown on the roads of a district might create wear and tear of the roads to a degree that would require some compensation to be made, and 3000l. in two sums was to be paid to the Edinburgh Road Trust. Then comes the provision with regard to the other equivalent for the release from the obligation of making tramways, in the shape of what they had offered in the preamble to provide, namely, the omnibus service. "The company shall by themselves or others, if and when required by the local authority of Edinburgh by one month's notice in writing to that effect, provide good and sufficient conveyance by means of omnibuses between the points which are here indicated," to run a certain number of times in the day. And then comes this provision: "It shall be lawful for the said company to apply its funds from time to time for that purpose, or for purchasing omnibuses, horses, and premises for that purpose, and to demand and take in respect of passengers and parcels carried in or by such omnibuses such tolls and charges as they think fit, not exceeding the charges which by the Act of 1871 the company are entitled to charge in the event of the construction of the tramways intended to be abandoned, and the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith, and may also charge a sum not exceeding 1d. per mile for parcels by such omnibuses not exceeding 56lbs. in weight, and for parcels in excess thereof such charge as they may from time to time think fit. Provided always, that the fares between Stockbridge and Newington by omnibuses and car shall not exceed 3d. first class, and 2d. second class for each passenger." Then the 8th clause says that, "Saving as in this Act expressly provided, nothing in this Act shall prejudice or affect the three several agreements scheduled to the Act of 1871, but those agreements shall, subject to the provisions of the agreement and by the Act of 1873 and of this Act, remain in full force and effect." Now, the contention of the company is this, that having come as suppliants to Parliament for permission to abandon the particular parts of the tramway which I have referred to, and having had put upon them the correlative obligation of supplying the public with an omnibus service over the part of the city where these tramways were abandoned, they induced the Legislature to put words into this clause which enable them to double their fares over the whole system of tramways of the city of Edinburgh; those fares, the limit of which was so carefully contracted for, and so carefully legislated for, by the agreement and by the Act of 1871. And they contend that this is no unreasonable construction which they ask to be put upon the section, for they say that, although the fares will be doubled, it will only be for first-class passengers, and there is an impression that some singular privileges are to be conferred upon first-class passengers, who in return are to pay for those privileges the double fares. There is not a trace in this section, or in any part of the Act, of any privileges being secured for first-class passengers. But your Lordships have heard at the bar the view which the company take of these privileges. The passengers on the tramways were secured by the Act of 1871 the uniform privilege of being carried in proper and suitable cars, and were carried from that time forward in covered cars along the tramways; but the additional privileges which, according to the construction sought to be put by the company upon the Act of 1874, are to be given to first-class passengers, turn out to be these: that all the passengers who up to that time were carried in the cars of the company are now, if they wish to be continued at the same fares, to be turned out of those cars and to be placed outside, and the first-class passengers are to be placed inside, paying double the amount for exactly the accommodation which all the passengers previously received. I am not surprised that the Lord Justice Clerk treated this contest on the part of the company as an "audacious" contest. It does appear to me to be the most violent construction that ever has been offered to be placed upon an Act of Parliament. It would require, in the first place, the clearest words to be inserted in the Act of 1874 before your Lordships would hold that that enactment had the effect of altering and breaking the contract made in 1871, and of replacing it by an entirely new and different contract. It would require the clearest words to induce your Lordships, when you find a section which deals with nothing but the provision of an omnibus service, to believe that in making that provision there was incidentally thrown in a clause which altered the rates, not in respect of that omnibus service, or of the points where it was to be conducted, but over the whole system of the tramways of the city. But there is no ground, as it seems to me, upon the ordinary and legitimate principles of construction, putting aside altogether these a priori considerations, which can lead to the construction which the company desire to put upon this clause. It is necessary, of course, in authorising a statutory company to purchase and run omnibuses, to give them a power also to demand and take fares, and there is that power given in the section. They are to be entitled to demand and take fares, and then come these very distinct words, which appear to me to be the key to the whole of what follows, "to demand and take in respect of passengers and parcels carried in or by such omnibuses such tolls and charges as they think fit, not exceeding the charges which by the Act of 1871 the company are entitled to charge in the event of the construction of the tramways to Stockbridge and Trinity." I put aside for the present the reference to parcels. Here is an authority to demand and take in respect of passengers carried in or by such omnibuses tolls and charges not exceeding those authorised by the Act of 1871. That appears to me to be the general and the governing power. What comes afterwards is an engrafting upon that of something which is not to have the effect of repealing what went before, but is to be read in conjunction and harmony with it—"and the company may charge"—charge for what? Charge for some service, not charge irrespective of service; and for the service for which the charge is to be made your Lordships, upon all sound principles of construction, are carried back to the introductory words at the commencement of the section. They are to charge "in respect of passengers carried in or by such omnibuses." Reading the section so, the company may charge in respect of passengers carried in or by such omnibuses, which in other words is, they may charge in respect of the omnibus service, "a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith;" that is to say, if there is omnibus service rendered

EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY v. TORBAIN.

LUCKRAFT v. PRIDHAM.

or afforded to any person who is a passenger either upon the route to Stockbridge alone or upon that route combined with any portion of any tramway route, then in respect of the omnibus service the charge may be made of 2d. for a first class passenger; and that is made more emphatic, because, when the sentence goes on to take up the question of parcels, those words which I have read into the intervening clause, or words which are exactly equivalent to them, are found in the clause with regard to parcels, for it runs thus: "and may also charge a sum not exceeding 1d. per mile for parcels by such omnibuses not exceeding 56lbs. in weight," &c. Reading it in this way, you have a construction which is, I do not say merely in harmony with the general purport of the section, which is in harmony with all the a priori considerations applicable to the position in which these parties and the public stood, but which is in harmony with the first principles of construing a provision of this kind. Although it did not appear to some of the learned judges of the Court of Session to be necessary to define the precise wording of the construction in this way, and they were contented with saying that the company had not proved that they were entitled to make this charge which they had made, still upon this construction, or upon the principles upon which it is founded, the learned judges of the court below are entirely agreed. I submit to your Lordships that the case is one that cannot admit of any doubt whatever, and that this appeal, which I must repeat is one of the most groundless I have ever known, ought to be dismissed with costs.

A testator bequeathed the proceeds of the residue of real and personal estate to the "different charities of Plymouth." The only charity which claimed was the guardians of the Poor, who were incorporated by an Act of the 6th year of Queen Anne, which empowered them to receive testamentary gifts of real estate.

power was taken away by the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36), which was a general law passed for the purpose of applying, and meant to apply to all his Majesty's subjects in making dispositions in favour of charities; and that the principle that the powers and privileges given by a special Act were not taken away by the provisions of a general Act was inapplicable to the present case.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Hall, V.C. The facts and arguments are fully reported 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 501. The testator William Robert Phillips bequeathed the proceeds of the residue of his real and personal estate "to the different charities of Plymouth, the amount and charities to be at the discretion of my said trustees." The only charity which came forward to claim was the guardians of the poor who were incorporated by a special Act of the 6th Queen Anne which empowered them to receive testamentary gifts of real estate. The question was whether this special Act was repealed by the Mortmain Act subsequently passed (9 Geo. 2, c. 36). The Vice-Chancellor having held that this power was taken away by the Mortmain Act, the guardians appealed.

JESSEL, M.R.—An Act passed in the reign of Queen Anne before the date of the Charitable Uses Act enabled a charitable corporation to take and hold land without requiring a licence in mortmain. The words used for the purpose were proper legal words. It authorised donors or testators to give or devise, and it authorised the charitable corporation to accept and hold. The recitals show that the meaning of the Act was to dispose of the licence in mortmain. The state of the law showed this quite conclusively, that at that time there was no legal prohibition which prevented intending donors devising land by will to charitable uses. The purpose and meaning of that Act, therefore, are perfectly plain and clear. Then there comes a general Act, and the object of the general Act "the Charitable Uses Act" is to protect heirs from being disinherited or to use the words of the Act, "This public mischief has of late greatly increased by very large and improvident alienations or dispositions by languishing or dying persons as by other persons to uses called charitable uses to take place after their death to the disinherison of their lawful heirs, for the remedy whereof be it enacted," so that the Act is for the benefit of the lawful heirs, and what it enacted in substance is this, that you shall not give lands to charitable uses except by deed, properly executed and attested by four witnesses twelve months before the death of the donor and enrolled. In other words it absolutely destroys the powers until that time possessed by men in England of devising land by will to charitable purposes. Why this should not apply to this charitable corporation, as well as every other charitable corporation, I am at a loss to conceive. It is not strictly in pari materia at all, though no doubt, it was in the same line of policy as the Mortmain Acts, but it does not deprive men of the power of devising which it had been found in practice had been abused. It seems to me that up to this point the case is quite unarguable, the licence in mortmain having nothing to do with the provisions of the Mortmain Act. Then there comes some private Act which continued the old provisions of the statute of Anne, and made them applicable to the provisions of the Act. Continuing the provisions did not alter their nature and effect. They meant just the same when they were continued as they meant before, and even if re-enacted in so many words it would not have altered their meaning in the slightest degree, the meaning being quite plain that it dispensed with the licence in mortmain and nothing else. That being so it appears to me there is no pretence for saying the Legislature has repealed that portion of the Charitable Uses Act which prohibited the man from devising. I am of opinion that he had no power of testamentary disposition quoad these lands in favour of charity, and that being so the attempted devise is null and void, and must fail as the Vice-Chancellor has rightly held.

JAMES, L.J.—It appears to me the Vice-Chancellor's decision was incontrovertibly right.

Burial Acts—15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, ss. 9, 25; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87, s. 12; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9—Threat or intention of converting land into a cemetery—Prohibition of burial within 100 yards of a dwelling-house—Injunction.

The defendant was the owner of a property immediately adjoining the plaintiff's estate, on which was a dwelling-house, situated close to the boundary of the defendant's land. In 1865 the defendant obtained the consent of the Home Secretary to convert his property into a cemetery, and made some attempts to get up a company for the purpose, but without success. In 1877 the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant, threatening to proceed against him for an injunction, unless he gave an undertaking not to use any part of the land for a cemetery. The defendant replied that he had no present intention of converting his property into a cemetery, but declined to give the required undertaking; if, however, at any future time he should wish to use his property as a cemetery he would give the plaintiffs two months' notice of such intention. After this the action was commenced, and Bacon, V.C. granted an injunction until the hearing or further order.

Held (reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor) that upon the question of practice, the injunction ought not to have been granted, for there was no such threat or intention to use any part of the ground for a cemetery, assuming such use to be unlawful, as required the interposition of the court by injunction to prevent it.

Held, further, that the Act of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9, only prohibited the use of ground for actual burials within the distance of 100 yards of a dwelling-house, and did not interfere with the right to convert any part of the land to the purposes of a cemetery, and therefore an injunction could not, in any case, have been supported.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The plaintiffs were Earl Cowley—who, under the will of the late Earl of Mornington, was equitable tenant for life of an estate at Leyton in Essex—and the trustees of the will.

The defendant, Mr. William Byas, was the owner of a property called Leyton-park, immediately adjoining Earl Cowley's estate, on which there is situated, close to the boundary of Leyton-park, a dwelling house belonging to the Earl, and occupied by a Mr. Beresford, as tenant.

An action was brought to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant from using Leyton-park, or any part of it, for burial or for a cemetery.

In the year 1865, the defendant, under the provisions of the Burials Act, obtained the consent of the then Home Secretary to the appropriation of Leyton-park to the purposes of a cemetery.

The defendant made some attempts to establish a company, but without success, and nothing further was done in the matter until the year 1876, when the subject was again mooted.

Some of the inhabitants of the district opposed the scheme, and endeavoured to induce the Home Secretary to withdraw the approval which had been given by his predecessor in 1865. This, however, he refused to do, stating that he was advised that he had no power to withdraw an approval once given, and referred Lord Cowley to the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9, as enabling an owner of a house within 100 yards from a site to prevent such site being used as a burial ground.

On the 23rd March 1877, the solicitors of the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant threatening to proceed against him for an injunction.

To this letter the defendants' solicitors replied:

We will first call your attention to our client's position. He holds the approval of the Home Secretary, dated the 12th Aug. 1865, and from that time till the summer of last year he has been endeavouring to convert his property into a cemetery, but without success. Lord Cowley's surveyors both live close to the land in question, and have known for the last ten or eleven years of the repeated endeavours to turn this into a cemetery, and have seen each one fail. Our client does not intend to give up any of his legal rights, and we observe your letter is only written the day after the result of the public agitation at Leyton is known. We presume, therefore, that you deferred writing or taking any steps till you saw how our client was situated, and that the threat to commence immediate proceedings is only another step taken by you, doubtless, at the request of others, and really without the slightest necessity. You can quite understand that the public inquiry was harassing enough to Mr. Byas without having threats of chancery suits or other proceedings, and we need only say that no part of our client's land within 100 yards of any dwelling house would be used as a cemetery, unless he had taken the necessary steps prescribed by the Act. Your client has rested for eleven years without raising the question before, and we do not see that there is any probability at present of any cemetery being established at Leyton, but; as before stated, our client declines to be dictated to in the matter, and will not give up any of his legal rights, although he may never wish to exercise them, and may never be in a position to form a cemetery in the spot approved by the Home Secretary. There is no necessity whatever for any proceedings being taken, as one client, under our advice, would not form it into a cemetery without ascertaining that all the provisions in the Act, and approval had been complied with.

The plaintiffs' solicitors replied as follows :

You state that Mr. Byas declines to be dictated to in the matter, and will not give up any of his legal rights, although he may never wish to exercise them, and you add, that he would not form the land into a cemetery without ascertaining that all the provisions of the act, and the approval had been complied with. We think it right to repeat that such provisions have not been complied with, and as the establishing of a cemetery would, as we are advised, cause great damage to our client's estate, we beg to give you notice that unless Mr. Byas shall send us, through you, by the 10th April next, a written undertaking that no part of the land, the subject of the recent inquiry, shall be used for a cemetery, we shall, without further notice, apply for an injunction.

To this letter the defendant's solicitors wrote as follows :

We have seen our client again to day with reference to the correspondence between us, and, as we before told you, he has no present intention whatever of attempting to convert his property into a cemetery, and in fact for some years past he had abandoned the idea until it was suggested to him by the vestry clerk of Leyton and some of his friends. You are, no doubt, very fully informed of all that took place at the recent inquiry, and we presume that in consequence of that you have been instructed to write and threaten proceedings on Lord Cowley's behalf. Our client declines to give any such undertaking as you wish; but, under our advice, he writes and repudiates any notion of attempting to convert the property into a cemetery, although at the same time he will not give up his right to do so at any future time, or admit for one instant that the grant he has obtained is invalid, or give any undertaking in the matter. This, however, he is willing to do to meet your views and to avoid litigation if possible. If at any future time he should be advised or wish to use his property as a cemetery, he will give you and your clients two months' notice of such his intention, so that you can, if you are so advised, take what proceedings you think proper and expedient in the matter.

The plaintiffs thereupon issued a writ and moved for an injunction.

The following sections of the Burial Acts are material :

By the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, s. 25, it is provided that

No ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to such burial ground, under this Act, nearer than 200 yards to any dwelling house, without the consent in writing of the owner, lessee, and occupier of such dwelling house.

By the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87, s. 12, it is provided that the above-mentioned provision Shall not extend or be applicable to or in respect of any burial grounds which have been or may be provided under the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 134, and this Act, or either of them, or to or in respect of any addition which has been or may be so provided to any burial ground; but no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated under the last-mentioned Act, and this Act, or any of them, as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground nearer than 100 yards to any dwelling house, without such consent as aforesaid.

And by the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 12, it is provided that the above-stated provision of the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85,

Shall be repealed; but no ground already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be used for burials under the said Act or this Act, or either of them, within the distance of 100 yards from any dwelling house without such consent as aforesaid.

On the 3rd May 1877, BACON, V.C., delivered the following judgment. — In my opinion the plaintiffs are most clearly entitled to the injunction they ask for. Eleven years ago, or more, the defendant got what he calls a grant from the then Secretary of State, and he would read it as if it repealed the Act of Parliament then in force, and the one which has since been passed. The grant is perfectly right; it is an authority to make a lawful cemetery; but it would be an authority to make an unlawful cemetery if it could be construed in the way for which the defendant contends. Ever since he obtained that grant he has been threatening, and he threatens now, that when it seems good to him he will make a cemetery on the land, and, fastening on the words of the Act, he says that unless he buries within 100 yards of the plaintiff's house he does not infringe the Act. I think that the Act is plain, and that it is a mere idle quibble to say that no burials shall take place within 100 yards of the house, and that what is within that distance shall be planted with trees or kept as a garden. It would not be any the less a cemetery for that. The plaintiff is entitled to his injunction to restrain the defendant from using for burial or for a cemetery the ground in question, or any part of such land or ground until judgment in the action or further order.

On the appeal,

Everitt, who (with Edmund Beaumont) appeared for the defendant, after referring to the Burial Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9, was stopped by the court.

Kay, Q.C. and Nalder, for the plaintiffs, in support of the Vice-Chancellor's order, contended that under the Acts 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, ss. 9, 25; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87, s. 12; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9; not only could no burials take place, but no ground within 100 yards of a dwelling-house could be used for the purposes of a cemetery. They also submitted that the defendant's insisting on his right to use the ground as a cemetery was, under the circumstances, such a threatening and intending to do so as to justify the court in granting the protection claimed by the plaintiffs. They cited

Heat v. Gill, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 699; 41 L. J. 761, Ch.

JESSEL, M.R.—The appeal in this case raises a question of considerable importance as regards the practice of the court, as well as a question of some importance as regards the construction of the Acts of Parliament relating to burial grounds. The first-named plaintiff is the owner of a mansion-house within 100 yards of a portion of a field belonging to the defendant, and the defendant, Mr. Byas, is the owner in fee-simple of this field. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant is about to use his land for the purposes of a cemetery, that is, to appropriate it or lay it out in some mode or other which will render it more eligible for the purposes of interment of dead bodies. The defendant says that he has no immediate intention of doing anything of the kind; that he did in the year 1865 obtain the necessary permission of the Secretary of State to use his land for a cemetery, but that he has not been able to act on that permission, not having been able to form a company for the purpose of making a cemetery; that he has recently attempted to do so, but has not succeeded; and he also says that he does not intend to use any portion of the land within 100 yards of the plaintiff's mansion or dwelling-house for the purposes of burial without obtaining the requisite consents; and, further, that in any case, before putting into exercise his rights, whatever they may be, he will give two months' notice to the plaintiff to enable him to dispute, if he thinks fit, such rights as he alleges that he possesses. In that state of things the plaintiffs bring an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using for burial or for a cemetery his land or ground known as Leyton Park, in Leyton, in the county of Essex, or any part of such land or ground, and the Vice-Chancellor has granted an injunction in these terms. Now, in the first instance it appears to me, as regards the practice of the court, that even assuming the construction of the Act of Parliament to be favourable to the plaintiffs, no such injunction ought to have been granted. The defendant has not done anything whatever to the injury of the plaintiffs. He alleges that he has the right to do something which, on the assumption I have mentioned, he would not have the right to do, but he says, not only have I no present intention to do it, but I undertake to give you two months' notice (and the reasonableness and sufficiency of such notice are not disputed) before I attempt to do anything of the kind. How can the plaintiffs say in such a case that there is an immediate threat to do something which requires the interposition of the court by injunction to prevent it? So far from there being a case for interlocutory injunction, the evidence shows that at the time when this injunction was granted, there was not the remotest probability of the defendant being able to make the cemetery, nor the remotest intention of making it. His attempts had failed, they had been discontinued for a series of years, and there was no intention of renewing them. It appears to me, also, that the plaintiffs cannot say that they could not rely on the assurance of the defendant. So far from that being the case, they offered to take his assurance in writing if he would give the assurance to the full extent they demanded, so that they did not come into court saying, we cannot trust the defendant. It seems to me, according to the ordinary practice of the court, that there was no cause either for bringing the action or for granting the injunction, and on this ground alone it ought to be dissolved. I have thus far assumed the construction of the Acts to be in favour of the plaintiffs. The Vice-Chancellor, as I read his judgment, came to the conclusion that according to the terms of the Acts, the defendant had no right to convert any portion of his land into a cemetery, although the great bulk of the land was distant more than 100 yards from the mansion-house of the plaintiff, and although no portion of the land within the distance of 100 yards was intended to be used for the purposes of burial. The ground I have already mentioned is sufficient to dispose of the case, but I think it right to state what is my view of the meaning of the Act. It must be observed that these Acts of Parliament give to neighbouring landowners a privilege in addition to their legal rights. As I understand the law, they could not, before these Acts, have prevented their neighbours from using their fee-simple properties for the purposes of burial unless such user amounted to a nuisance; but when these Acts were passed, which gave certain benefits to the public, and impose certain restrictions on landowners as regarded the use of their land for the purposes of burial, with a view to the health of the public, it was thought right also to give landowners some privileges, and one privilege given by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. s. 25, was that "no ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground under this Act, nearer than 200 yards to any dwelling-house without the consent of the owner and occupier of the dwelling-house." But by the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9, the portion that I have read of the former Act was repealed, and the words substituted were these: "No ground not already used as or appropriated for a cemetery shall be used for burials under the said Act or this Act, or either of them, within the distance of 100 yards from any dwelling-house" without such consent as above. Therefore all that is prohibited is the use for burials of the ground within the distance. I cannot find any pretence for saying that there is any prohibition as regards any ground beyond the distance, and therefore, so far as the injunction extends to prohibit the use of the ground as a burial ground beyond the distance, I find nothing in the Act of Parliament to warrant it. But, then, what is the meaning of the words "used for burials?" On the one side it is said they mean used as a cemetery, and have the same effect as the words which were in the former Act, "appropriated as a burial ground, or as an addition to a burial ground." The mere appropriation was prohibited by those words, but in the present Act we have different words. Now the words "used for burials" are words commonly understood to refer, and which properly refer to actual burials within the ground, and they are so used over and over again in various sections of the former Act, to which the Lord Chief Justice has directed my attention, so that we find a change of words combined with a change of distance. The appropriation was prohibited within 200 yards; the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87, s. 12, changed the distance to 100 yards; and the last Act uses different words to denote the Act prohibited. Therefore we come to this, that the Legislature has taken away to a certain extent the privilege before granted to landowners, for it has changed the original 200 yards into 100, and it appears to me it has altered it in another by saying in fact, "All the protection you want is a protection against nuisance; if so much of the cemetery as is within 100 yards of your house is laid out as a park, or garden, or a chapel, or for some other purpose of that kind, and not for actual burials, we do not intend to give you the right to prohibit its being so used, because such use does not hurt you;" and it must be remembered that under the first Act there is an express provision (sect. 30) enabling the burial board to lay out and embellish the burial ground, and also to erect a chapel upon any portion of it, showing that the Legislature were well aware that the whole of the burial ground was not used for the purposes of actual burial. It seems to me, therefore, that when we look at the reason of the thing, and the change of language of the Legislature, it is reasonably plain that the Legislature intended not to give the extensive privilege claimed by the plaintiffs in this case, but merely the right to prevent burials in the burial ground within 100 yards of the dwelling-house, and, therefore, upon the point of law, as well as for the other reason I have given, I think this injunction ought not to have been granted.

ATTREE v. HAWK AND WIFE.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I would only add an additional argument, which appears to me to arise in confirmation of those which the Master of the Rolls has used in favour of the construction, which I agree with him in considering that we ought to put on these Acts. The 12th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 87, which varies the distance limited by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 85, s. 25, repeats the words of the earlier section, only varying the distance. The third Act, while restoring the same limit of distance as the second Act, substitutes for the words, "shall be appropriated as a burial ground or as an addition to a burial ground," the words, "shall be used for burials." This alteration of the words shows that the clause in the third Act pointed at something different from what was pointed at in the similar clauses of the first and second Acts.

BAGGALLAT, L.J.—I also agree in the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls, and in the reasons he has given for discharging the order for the injunction; and I think we have only to look at the provisions contained in the clauses of the several burial Acts, beginning with the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, to see how clearly the word "burial" is used as denoting actual interment. We find "burial ground," "places of burial," and "cemetery," used almost interchangeably, but we constantly find the expression "burials" by itself, the Act appearing to use the words "burial" and "interment" indifferently. Thus, for instance, in sects. 2, 4, 5, and 7, the word "burials" clearly refers to actual burial. It appears to me, therefore, that the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, s. 9, intended to do away with the previous rule that no portion of the cemetery should be within a certain distance of a dwelling-house, and to substitute an enactment that no bodies should be interred within 100 yards of any dwelling-house. I also agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, that if the law had been as the plaintiffs contend, still there is no ground made here on the facts of the case for the interference of the court.

ATTREE v. HAWK AND WIFE. (a)

Will — Charitable bequest — Railway debenture stock — Statute of Mortmain.

Debenture stock the nature of which is regulated by the Companies Clauses Act 1863 is an interest in land within the Mortmain Act.

(a) Reported by A. B. ELLICOTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

JOHN BATES, by his will dated the 11th Aug. 1873, amongst other gifts and bequests, bequeathed the sum of 1500*l.* to the feoffees of Market Harborough, upon trust to apply the interest of 1200*l.* in the purchase of meat, bread, and coals, to be distributed amongst the poor of Market Harborough above forty years of age, in such proportions as the feoffees should think right, and to pay the interest of 200*l.* to the church and chapels of dissenters' Sunday schools. The will contained another bequest of 12,000*l.* to the corporation of Brighton, upon trust to apply the interest arising from it in the purchase of meat, bread, and coals for the poor of Brighton above fifty years of age, in such proportions as the corporation should think right.

The said sum of 1500*l.* and 9000*l.* out of the said sum of 12,000*l.* were described in the will as being secured upon stock of the Midland Railway Company.

The testator died on the 28th May 1874, and the only Midland Railway Stock of which he was possessed at the time of his death proved to be debenture stock.

The plaintiff, who was the executor of the will, instituted this suit for the administration of the estate, and one of the questions for the consideration of the court was whether or not the bequests of debenture stock were void under the Statute of Mortmain.

W. Pearson, Q.C. and W. Benschaw appeared for the plaintiff.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Bunting for the next of kin.

Eddis, Q.C., H. Greenwood, and Davies for the defendants.

contended that debenture stock was pure personal estate and not within the Statute of Mortmain, and distinguished the present case from those of

Chandler v. Howell, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 592; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 651;

and drew a distinction between the cases where the thing charged was the actual thing, and the cases where the mere fruits of the thing and not the thing itself were charged.

Millar, for the corporation of Brighton, contended that debenture stock was not within the Statute of Mortmain, on the ground that railway companies were in fact carriers, and that the tolls and profits of a railway company were pure personalty, being merely the earnings of carriers, and of quite a different nature to turnpike tolls and profits, which, being payment for the use of land, might be properly deemed impure personalty, and consequently within the Act.

Nov. 19.—HALL, V.C.—I have considered this case since Saturday, and I have looked again into the

CHAN. DIV.]

TURNER (app.) v. FORD (resp.).

authorities which I examined not long ago in the case of Chandler v. Howell; and it appears to me that I really cannot distinguish the present case from those cases on which I then founded my judgment. This debenture stock is stock, the nature of which is regulated by the Companies Clauses Act 1863. I have considered all the sections in part 3 of the Act. The 22nd section provides for the creation and issue of debenture stock, and it describes it as "stock;" it is to be raised on mortgage or bond. [His Lordship read the section down to the words "have power to raise on mortgage or bond."] This, then, is a creation by bond or mortgage of stock to be called debenture stock, and that stock by the 23rd section is described thus: [His Lordship read the 23rd section.] That does not appear to me to do more than to provide for the transmissibility of the stock, that is to say, it is to go like ordinary shares and stock of the company to the legal personal representative, and in all other respects it is to have the incidents of personal estate. But that does not touch the question which has to be determined in this case, namely, whether it is to be taken as pure personal estate by reason of the circumstance that ordinary shares and stocks have been held to be pure personal estate. I do not think this Act goes far enough to effectuate that. The holders of debenture stock, by the 31st section, are not to rank as being holders of stock, that is, of ordinary stock, but are to be considered as entitled to the rights and powers of mortgagees of the undertaking other than the right to require payment of the principal money paid up in respect of the debenture stock. The 24th section does not appear to me to assist the determination of the present case. The 25th section provides for the appointment of a receiver when the interest has been in arrear for a certain time; and by the 26th section that receiver is to be a receiver of the whole, or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment of the interest. So the position of a holder of debenture stock is this. He is a person who may obtain a receiver of tolls or sums liable to the payment of his interest, and these tolls or sums become liable by reason of the charge upon the undertaking which is given by sect. 23. That charge carries with it the right to have a receiver of certain tolls or sums; that is to say, in so many words, the revenue arising from the undertaking. Such being the effect of this Act of Parliament, with respect to the cases which were referred to in my judgment in Chandler v. Howell, I do not propose to go into those cases again, because I do not believe it will be said or considered that in the course of my examination of them, I did not correctly and sufficiently refer to the particulars of the several cases. I may observe that in Walker v. Milne the judgment of Lord Langdale no doubt went the other way, but in Ashton v. Lord Langdale, Knight Bruce, V.C. respectfully declined to follow that case. I need not refer to any other authorities upon the case generally, but I will merely add one modern case, that of Alexander v. Brame (No. 2) which is in the 30th of Beavan. That was a mortgage in which the late Master of the Rolls held that debentures of the commissioners of a dock made under an Act of Parliament, and in the form of an assignment of the duties arising by virtue of the Act, were within the Mortmain Act, following the case of Ashton v. Lord Langdale.

There was not there an assignment of anything but what might be properly described as the fruits of the concern. It is said that there is a distinction between a charge upon the fruits and upon the corpus, and that was the real argument before me. The cases have been divided into two classes, one in which the thing itself producing the fruit was affected to be charged, and the other in which only the fruit of the thing was the subject of charge, in which latter case it was contended that such was not an interest in land within the Act. It seems to me that such a distinction is unsound both in reason and in principle. If you charge the fruit you charge the rents and profits. Although you may say you will not charge, and although you may be prohibited from selling the land, still you are getting within the mischief of the Mortmain Act. You are still getting an interest in land which the Act does not intend you to get. For although it is true that the 1st section does not in so many words include all interests in land, yet the 3rd section does, and it has always been considered that in construing sect. 1, you must have regard to the provisions of sect. 3. There is a case before Sir William Grant, where he observed that he could not make out any solid distinction between the case before him and the earlier cases bearing upon the construction of those two sections; in like manner it appears to me that there is no solid distinction between the present case and the cases to which I have referred. Mr. Millar contended that, in fact, a railway company is more in the nature of a carrying company, and therefore ought not to be considered as a company whose property is land. Many of the cases which have arisen have had that element of the property being mixed in its nature; but it has always been said that they cannot be distinguished on that ground so long as they are within the mischief of the Act. This was Sir William Grant's language in the case of Finch v. Squire (10 Ves. 41). In the case of Gardner v. The London Chatham and Dover Railway Company, the observations on the meaning of the word "undertaking," and the decision itself were upon an entirely different question, and not at all upon the construction of the Mortmain Act, and I cannot, therefore, consider that case to be an authority, displacing the decisions which were referred to by me in Chandler v. Howell, and in particular the case before Knight Bruce, V.C., of Ashton v. Lord Langdale, which is on all fours with the present case. I must, therefore, again follow the cases referred to, and having considered the present case in all its bearings, I am of opinion that the debenture stocks in question are an interest in land within the Mortmain Act, and these bequests consequently void.

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 135, the metropolitan police may be employed in dockyards and military stations and within fifteen miles thereof, and shall have the powers and privileges and be liable to the duties and responsibilities of constables, and shall act as fully as in any part of the metropolitan police district, provided that the powers and privileges of the constables of the metropolitan police, when without the yards, &c., shall only be used in respect of the property of the Crown, or of persons subject to naval, or marine, or military discipline. The metropolitan police are authorised by the Contagious Diseases Act 1866, to carry out the police duties in respect of that Act; and the Mutiny Acts make provision for the capture of deserters.

TURNER (app.) v. FORD (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Respondent, a metropolitan constable so employed, demanded without warrant to enter the appellant's licensed alehouse, situate within one of these districts, but without the yards, &c., to search for absentees from the navy or prostitutes. The appellant prevented the respondent's entry, and was convicted by justices of resisting a constable in the execution of his duty under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 51.

Held, upon a case stated, that the respondent had no authority to do what he demanded, and that the appellant was wrongly convicted.

THIS was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Devon, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

1. At a petty sessions holden at East Stonehouse, in and for the division of South Roborough, in the county of Devon, on the 13th Dec. 1876, an information preferred by Richard Ford (hereinafter called the respondent) against Charles Turner (hereinafter called the appellant), on the 7th Dec. then last past, under sect. 3 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 51, charging for that he the said Charles Turner did on the 1st Dec. last, at the parish of East Stonehouse, in the county of Devon, unlawfully resist one Richard Ford, an officer in the metropolitan police (the said Richard Ford being then and there in the execution of his duty), was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the said appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and the said justices adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 20s., and also to pay the sum of 12s. for his costs in that behalf; and in default of payment to be imprisoned in the common gaol at Exeter for the space of seven days.

2. And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with this determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to the justices in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion of this court, and duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

3. Now therefore the said justices, in compliance with the said application, thereby stated and signed the following case.

4. Upon the hearing of the information it was proved and found as a fact that the said appellant is a licensed victualler, and occupies a licensed house within an area in which certain power is given to the metropolitan police under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 135, s. 2, and in a district in which the Contagious Diseases Acts are in force. The said respondent is a sergeant in the Metropolitan Police Force, and on Friday, the 1st Dec. 1876, he (the respondent) visited the appellant's house, in Clarence-place, in the parish of East Stonehouse aforesaid, to search for five stragglers from the Royal Navy, and for prostitutes liable to be taken into custody under 29 Vict. c. 35, s. 28. The respondent saw the appellant there, and said to him, "Turner, you know who I am. I am on duty. I want to look into your public rooms to see if you have any absentees from the navy, or any prostitutes there." Turner replied, "Fetch the town police," and asked for the names of the absentees or stragglers. Ford (the respondent) refused to give any names, and said he wanted to see for himself. Ford (the respondent) endeavoured to go in. Turner caught hold of him on both sides and prevented his going in. The respondent did not resist. The appellant said, "I have not assaulted you." The respondent had no warrant in his possession signed by the captain commanding the ship, although a document purporting to be a warrant so signed was produced. This document had many alterations and pencil additions in and to it, and was not impounded, and although the respondent has been applied to by us for it, he has neglected or refused to furnish it, and so we are unable to supply a copy. The respondent had not in his possession any warrant of any kind, nor was it alleged that any warrant had been granted empowering the respondent to enter the appellant's premises other than the document just mentioned.

5. It was contended by the appellant that the said respondent had no lawful authority to enter into his dwelling-house and to search the same or any part thereof, because the information was not laid under the Intoxicating Liquors Act or any Act relating to the sale of beer or exciseable liquors, and because the respondent was not then in the execution of his duty nor acting under a legal warrant or authority at the time of the said resistance, and because the said respondent had not in his possession any warrant authorising him to enter and search the said appellant's dwelling-house, although a document purporting to be a warrant in writing had been granted. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the information was properly laid, and that the said respondent had a right to enter the said appellant's premises at any time to search for stragglers or absentees from ships belonging to the Royal Navy, or for prostitutes, without any warrant or authority in writing from the officers commanding such ships, and that in the event of any such warrant or authority having been given in writing, the said respondent had power to enter and search any premises without having the same in his actual possession?

6. The justices, however, being of opinion that the said respondent was properly in the execution of his duty, and that he had a right to enter the appellant's premises without any warrant being granted, and without the warrant (if any had been granted) being in his possession, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner as above stated.

7. The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, Had the respondent a right to enter

Q.B. Div.]

Re WILSON.

[Q.B. Div.]

and search the appellant's premises for sailors or prostitutes without a warrant having been granted authorising him to do so? Secondly, Had the respondent a right, if such warrant had been granted, to enter and search the appellant's premises for sailors or prostitutes without having it in his possession.

If these questions, or either of them, are answered in the negative, then the conviction is to be quashed; if in the affirmative, then the conviction is to stand.

Hopwood, Q.C. (with him Tarring) argued for the appellant.—By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 135, s. 1, any number of constables of the metropolitan police which the Secretary of State may direct, may be employed in Her Majesty's yards and in the principal stations of the War Department and within certain limits therein mentioned. By sect. 2, "It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to administer to any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force, who may be appointed or employed as aforesaid, an oath to execute the office of constable within all or any of Her Majesty's yards or of the principal stations of the War Department in any part of England and Wales, and within fifteen miles of such yards or stations; and every constable so sworn shall have the powers and privileges and be liable to the duties and responsibilities of constable within the yards, stations, and limits for which he is so sworn, as well on seas as in harbours and havens, and on rivers and other waters as on land, and shall act within such yards, stations, and limits as fully as in any part of the metropolitan police district. Provided always that the powers and privileges of the constables of the metropolitan police, when without the yards, naval and marine hospitals and infirmaries, and marine barracks or stations, and not on board or in any ship, vessel, or boat belonging to Her Majesty or in Her Majesty's service, shall only be used in respect of the property of the Crown, or of persons subject to naval, or marine, or military discipline." After reciting this Act of the previous year, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 51, provides by sect. 3 that, "If any person shall assault or resist any constable belonging to the metropolitan police force acting in the execution of his duty, or shall aid or incite any person so to assault or resist, every such offender being summarily convicted thereof before any two justices of the peace shall for every such offence pay a fine or be imprisoned." There is no authority, however, in either of those Acts to enter a private house, and a licensed house does not for this purpose differ from a private house. The annual Mutiny Acts, too, although they provide for apprehension of deserters, expressly impose a penalty for forcibly entering a dwelling-house or outhouse of any person in pursuit of any deserters without warrant. (See Marine Mutiny Act 1876, 39 Vict. c. 9, ss. 48 and 83.) The other powers of the metropolitan police in this district are derived from the Contagious Diseases Act 1866 (29 Vict. c. 35), to sect. 28 of which reference is made by the justices in drawing the special case; by that section punishment is imposed upon women guilty of an offence against the Act; and its conclusion is, "In the case of the offence of quitting the hospital without being discharged as aforesaid, the woman may be taken into custody without warrant by any constable." But here again there is no authority to enter a private house. Under the licensing Acts the local police, no doubt, are empowered to enter on any licensed premises (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 35), but such a privilege is excepted from those granted to the metropolitan police under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 135, s. 2, those privileges being only to be used in respect of the property of the Crown, or of persons subject to naval, or marine, or military discipline.

The respondent did not appear.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this conviction cannot be upheld. The Act which gives powers and privileges, usually belonging to the local police, to be exercised and enjoyed by the metropolitan police, confines their plenary use to the dockyards and stations; as regards other places within the fifteen miles, those powers and privileges are in respect only of Crown property, and persons subject to discipline. No power is given to a metropolitan constable to force his way into a house against the will of the occupier, even to search for such property or persons. The metropolitan police have but a limited authority in the districts to which they are appointed, and they are not empowered to act in all matters as if they were the local police. Here the appellant was justified in resisting the respondent's entrance, and the justices have made a mistake in convicting.

MELLOR, J.—I think Mr. Hopwood has clearly shown us that the authority vested in the metropolitan police in these districts does not include all the powers of the local police, and I think the justices have proceeded in this case under a mistaken view of the Act. I regret it, if we have overlooked any statutory provisions which might have altered our opinion; but, in consequence of the difficulty created by the respondent's not appearing, we have taken more than usual care in searching for such provision. The sections to which our attention has been called by the case itself are clearly inapplicable, and we can find no justification for the respondent's forcing an entry into the appellant's house on the grounds stated. The conviction therefore cannot be sustained.

Government and no English subject should be surrendered to the Swiss Government.

An Order in Council, relating to this arrangement, declared that the Extradition Act 1870 should apply to Switzerland.

W., a British subject, was arrested on prima facie evidence of larceny in Switzerland, and retained in custody for the purpose of being surrendered to the Swiss Government.

Held, that the exception in the treaty must prevail in his favour, and a rule for a habeas corpus made absolute.

THIS was a rule of habeas corpus to discharge from custody one Wilson, who had been apprehended on a charge of larceny alleged to have been committed in Switzerland. The return to the writ, made by the stipendiary magistrate sitting at Bow-street, showed that the prisoner was in custody under a charge of larceny alleged to have been committed in Switzerland, that the prisoner was a British subject, and that it was proposed to surrender him to the Swiss Government under the Extradition Act 1870. This Act enacts by sect. 2:

Where an arrangement has been made with any foreign state with respect to the surrender to such state of any fugitive criminals, Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that this Act shall apply in the case of such foreign state.

Her Majesty may, by the same or any subsequent order, limit the operation of the order, and restrict the same to fugitive criminals, who are in or suspected of being in the part of Her Majesty's dominions specified in the order, and render the operation thereof subject to such conditions, exceptions, and qualifications as may be deemed expedient.

Every such order shall recite or embody the terms of the arrangement, and shall not remain in force for any longer period than the arrangement.

Every such order shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within six weeks after it is made, or, if Parliament be not then sitting, within six weeks after the then next meeting of Parliament, and shall also be published in the London Gazette.

And sect. 6 enacts:

Where this Act applies in the case of any foreign state, every fugitive criminal of that state who is in or suspected of being in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, or that part which is specified in the order applying this Act (as the case may be), shall be liable to be apprehended and surrendered in manner provided by this Act, whether the crime in respect of which the surrender is sought was committed before or after the date of the order, and whether there is or is not any concurrent jurisdiction in any court of Her Majesty's dominions over that crime.

In 1874 a treaty was made in pursuance of the statute between the British Government and the Government of the Swiss Confederation, and such treaty contained the following clause:

No Swiss shall be delivered up by the Swiss Government to the Government of the United Kingdom, and no subject of the United Kingdom shall be delivered up by the Government of the United Kingdom.

In Feb. 1875 an Order in Council was issued which recited the treaty and declared that the Act should be in force as regards Switzerland.

E. Clarke, for the prisoner, was stopped by the Court.

O. Bowen, for the Swiss Government, argued that the exception which the treaty contained in favour of British subjects was not imperative, and that, even if it was, it went beyond the statute, and introduced an exception which the statute did not authorise.

A. Venn Dicey watched the case for the Crown.

cussion should have arisen, as I happen to be chairman of the Royal Commission which is now sitting upon the question of extradition, and I will take care that this blot on the law shall be removed. It is a serious blot on the law that a British subject who commits an offence in a foreign country should escape with impunity because he is a British subject. But I think the point is one on which there can be no doubt. By the Extradition Act Her Majesty is empowered to apply that Act to particular countries, "subject to any condition, exception, or qualification" made by treaty with those countries. The treaty with Switzerland contains an exception in favour of British subjects, and the Act can only have application so far as it is consistent with the treaty. The prisoner, therefore, must be discharged.

REG. v. CHURCHWARDENS OF HANDBOROUGH. (a)
Churchwarden, election of—Time of closing poll—Delay in questioning election.

On the Friday after Easter a vestry meeting of the parish of Handborough, of which meeting notice had been posted on the church door on Easter Sunday, was held for the election of churchwardens. The rector nominated one churchwarden, and there were two candidates for the office of parishioners' churchwarden, one being the existing churchwarden, and the other a candidate put forward by a party dissatisfied with the administration of the parish charities. The show of hands was in favour of the last-named candidate. The poll was closed by the rector at five o'clock on the day of the election, when there appeared a majority of votes for the existing churchwarden. The validity of the election was questioned by a rule, made on the 5th July, for a mandamus to the rector and churchwardens to hold a new election.

The Court discharged the rule on the grounds (1) that the closing of the poll was a matter in the discretion of the rector, which had not been shown to be unreasonably exercised; (2) that it had not been shown that, had the poll been kept open, the result of the election would have been different; and (3) that there had been too great delay in questioning the election.

THIS was a rule, made on the 9th day of July last, calling upon the Rev. William Higge, rector of the parish of Handborough, in the county of Oxford, and the churchwardens of the said parish, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue to them directing them to convene a meeting in vestry of the inhabitants, ratepayers of the said parish, for the election of a churchwarden for the said parish for the current year; and to take all necessary steps for that purpose. The undisputed facts appeared from the affidavits to be as follows:

In the parish of Handborough there is an open vestry and an annual election of one churchwarden by the parishioners, the rector nominating the other. On Easter Sunday 1877 the following notice was posted on the door of the parish church:

(a) Reported by J. M. LEST, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

M

PARISH OF HANDBOROUGH.

Notice is hereby given that a vestry meeting will be held in the school room on Friday next, at half-past ten in the forenoon, for the purpose of auditing the churchwardens' accounts for the year ended; and also to elect churchwardens for the year ensuing.

Edward Parker, Joseph Laitt, Churchwardens.

Mr. Parker was the rector's churchwarden, and Mr. Laitt was the parishioners' churchwarden.

The election had for some time previous been a matter of public discussion, and it was generally known that Mr. Laitt would present himself for re-election, and that a Mr. William Lay would endeavour to displace him. At half-past ten on the day appointed the meeting was held, and attended by an unusually large number of parishioners. Mr. Parker having been nominated by the rector, Mr. Lay and Mr. Laitt were duly proposed and seconded. Upon a show of hands being taken the votes were: for Mr. Lay, 48 or thereabouts; for Mr. Laitt, 22 or thereabouts. A poll having been demanded on behalf of Mr. Laitt, the rector announced (at about 11.30 a.m.) that it would begin forthwith, and would be kept open till 5 p.m. At the close of the poll, about that hour, the number of votes recorded were, Laitt 98, Lay 77; the number of persons qualified to vote being 227. The rector, notwithstanding the protestations of the supporters of Mr. Lay, closed the poll and declared Mr. Laitt to be duly elected.

The following extract from Mr. Lay's affidavit shows the case attempted to be made out in support of the rule:

The parish contains upwards of 200 electors, the majority of whom are labourers, and many of them work some miles from home, and had left for their work before the said poll was demanded, and did not return until after it was closed, and had no opportunity of voting at the said poll, or of knowing it was open. Several of those electors who did not vote have informed me that they should have voted for me had they had the opportunity; and from the amount of support I was promised when I became a candidate for the office, and from the conversation I have had with the parishioners since the election, I verily believe that, if the poll were taken at a time when the labouring parishioners of the said parish could attend, I should be elected parish churchwarden instead of Joseph Laitt.

An affidavit of one of Mr. Lay's supporters contained the following paragraphs:

Mr. Matthews demanded a poll for Joseph Laitt. The Rector thereupon said it should be taken immediately. I then proposed that the poll should be adjourned till a future day, in order to give every ratepayer an opportunity of attending. Richard Westbury seconded that proposition. I then asked the chairman to put that proposition to the meeting. He said, "I have a perfect right to do as I like, and the poll shall be taken immediately, and closed at five o'clock." I then said that five o'clock is an unreasonable hour for the labourers to attend, and asked him to allow the poll to be kept open till seven o'clock. He said, "The poll shall be closed at five o'clock, and you can take what steps you like in it afterwards." William Lay asked him if he would allow the poll to be open till six o'clock, and he said "No." He asked him to allow half an hour more. He said "No, I am determined it shall be closed at five o'clock." The poll was then taken at once; I voted for William Lay, and then left the room. I attended again at four o'clock, when the poll was going on, and again immediately after five when the poll was closed. The result of the poll was that Joseph Laitt was elected.

The time for the labourers to leave work at Handboro is from five to half-past five o'clock in the evening. None to the best of my belief leave before five, and I believe that the object of the Rector, in closing the poll at five o'clock, was to exclude the votes of the labouring men. There are various charity matters relating to the parish, as to which the labourers are dissatisfied, and they were desirous of electing a churchwarden from their own body to inquire into those matters; and I believe that the object of the rector of the parish was to exclude such an inquiry. The great majority of the parishioners in the parish are labouring men, and are desirous of being represented by a churchwarden elected from their own body.

After the election I saw fourteen of the electors who had not voted, who all informed me that they should have voted had the poll been kept open a sufficient time to have enabled them to do so; the majority of them told me that they should have voted for William Lay had they had an opportunity. Several of them to my knowledge worked seven or eight miles from the place of polling, and had no opportunity of knowing that the poll was opened until their return from work after it was closed. I verily believe that if the poll had been kept open two hours longer William Lay would have been elected instead of Joseph Laitt.

Another supporter of Mr. Lay deposed as follows:

I have seen four or five of the parishioners since the election, and they have told me that they would have voted for William Lay if they had the opportunity, but that they did not know of the poll till after it was closed. The large majority of the population of the parish are labourers, and are desirous of being represented by a churchwarden elected by their own body, as they are dissatisfied with the administration of parish charities, and I verily believe that if the poll had been open at a time when the labouring parishioners were not at work, the said William Lay would have been elected parish churchwarden instead of Joseph Laitt; and I believe that the object of the rector in fixing the poll at a time which would exclude the votes of a large number of the labouring parishioners was to secure the election of Joseph Laitt, and so as to avoid that inquiry into the administration of the parish charities, which was one of the objects of the nomination of William Lay.

And there was an affidavit by five parishioners as follows:

We are respectively parishioners and householders in the parish of Handborough, in the county of Oxford.

We were respectively at work on the Friday after Easter at various places, and had no notice of the poll which was taken for parish churchwarden at Handborough aforesaid on that day until our return from work, after the said poll was closed.

If we had been aware that a poll had been demanded and was being taken, we should have attended, and voted for William Lay.

From conversations we have had with other parishioners of the said parish, and from our knowledge of the feeling in the said parish as to the desirability of electing some one not a farmer as churchwarden to look after the interests of the poor in the said parish, we believe that, if reasonable notice of the said poll had been given, or if the same had been kept open until after the return of the labouring parishioners of the said parish from work, William Lay would have been elected instead of Joseph Laitt; and, speaking from our said conversations and general knowledge, we say that it is the desire of the majority of the parishioners of the said parish that another election of a parish churchwarden may be held during the present year.

The principal affidavit in opposition to the rule was that of the rector of the parish, and the principal paragraphs of such affidavit are as follows:

The vestry meeting was attended by an unusual number of people, and, considering the number of persons present at the vestry, and the fact that the majority of them belonged to the labouring class, to whom, in my opinion, it would be inconvenient, and would cause the loss of a day's wages to attend upon another day, I announced that the poll would be taken forthwith at half-past eleven o'clock on the same morning, and would be kept open until five o'clock in the evening.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. CHURCHWARDENS OF HANDBOROUGH.

[Q.B. Div.]

An application was made to me to adjourn the poll to a future day, or to extend the closing of the poll to seven o'clock in the evening. But, influenced as well by the reasons above stated as by the fact that great notoriety had been given to the meeting, and, after conferring with my churchwarden and the most influential inhabitants of the parish, I considered that to close the poll at five o'clock was affording a reasonable length of time, sufficient for all qualified persons to vote; and therefore I made no alteration in the hour of closing which I had first announced. I was moreover induced to adhere to my decision by the opinion of the eminent counsel Dr. Stephens and Mr. Jeune, at that time published in the daily papers, in which it was recommended that five o'clock was a proper hour for closing the poll.

It was represented to me that some voters were absent at work as labouring men in the neighbourhood, and that the train from Oxford by which they might arrive might be too late to enable them to reach the polling place by five o'clock. I therefore consented to keep the poll open until after the arrival of the train; and, to the best of my belief, all the persons who came by that train recorded their votes, or had the opportunity of doing so. The voting, after the first commencement, was not kept up continuously, and some interval passed without a vote being recorded. I publicly asked more than once if it was known whether any more voters would come; and Mr. Lay, the candidate himself, informed me that he had no more supporters who would come.

After carefully counting the votes, I declared the result of the poll to be that the said Joseph Laitt was elected by a majority of 21 votes.

During the period of my incumbency and, according to the best of my information, for upwards of forty years, there has been no poll at a vestry meeting of the parish; and no custom exists in the parish as to the time at which a poll should be closed.

Some excitement prevailed among the supporters of the unsuccessful candidate at the result of the poll; but from that time until I was served with the rule of this honourable court, dated the 9th day of July inst., nothing has come to my knowledge to lead me to believe that the election would be impugned. From the time of his election as aforesaid, the said Joseph Laitt has acted as churchwarden. He was churchwarden the previous year, and was admitted as such, and is a proper person for the office.

In my opinion the hours prescribed for taking the poll were reasonable and proper, and such as I, in the exercise of my discretion as chairman and after consultation with the most influential parishioners, deemed it proper to define so as to give all qualified persons an opportunity of voting, and in my belief no one was debarred or excluded from voting by reason of the poll being held on the same day as the vestry meeting, or because it was closed at five o'clock in the evening. I do not believe that the result of the election would have been different if a longer time had been allowed for the poll, or if an adjournment of the meeting had taken place.

Other affidavits in opposition had been sworn by Mr. Parker, the rector's churchwarden, and by the assistant overseer of the parish.

Mr. Parker deposed that in his opinion the majority of voters well knew that a poll would be taken on the day of the election, and that every qualified person had full opportunity of recording his vote; and that sufficient and reasonable time was given to allow every one to vote who was entitled or willing to do so, unless any might happen to be at a great distance; and that the number of those so absent was very small, and could have made no difference to the result of the election. This was confirmed by the assistant overseer and another deponent, the former stating it to be within his knowledge that several qualified voters abstained from recording their votes for Mr. Laitt, because they considered his election to be secure.

Channell for the defendants now showed cause. He cited

R. v. D'Oyly, 12 A. & E. 139;

Ex parte Joyce, 23 L. J. 153, M. C.

In the latter of these cases a rule for a mandamus to the vicar to hold a new election was discharged chiefly on the ground that it was not shown that the result of the election would have been different, if certain rejected votes, upon the rejection of which the question arose, had been received.

Morten, for the prosecutors, supported the rule, and cited

Frideaux on Churchwardens, 121;

Baker v. Wood, 1 Curtes, 507;

R. v. St. Mary Newington, 6 D. & L. 162;

Westerton v. Davis, Spink, 388;

R. v. Winchester, 7 East, 13.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. It appears that the election was held in April, but that no application was made to this court until July. There would, therefore, be in all probability no time to try the issues of fact before next April; and at any rate there has been unreasonable delay in applying for the rule. As for the merits of the case, while on the one hand I cannot say distinctly that it might not have been wiser to extend the time for taking the poll, on the other hand, it is material to observe that the prosecutors do not make out that the result of the election would have been different if the time had been extended. The affidavits, in fact, merely show a case of suspicion under circumstances which were nothing more than ordinary circumstances. It is not enough to show that it would have cost a labourer half-a-crown or a shilling to leave his work and vote; it should be shown that intended voters were actually excluded from the poll. By refusing to make this rule absolute, we should be doing no harm, and, although I should be the last person to take a course prejudicial to the interest of the labourer in these matters, I think that I should be exercising an unwise discretion if I allowed this rule to go.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Nothing is further from my wishes than to put any limit on the exercise of the franchise in these matters by working men. But I utterly fail to see any ground for saying that a reasonable time was not allowed for the poll. The rector, in fact, waited for the train to come in, although he refused to extend the time further. For this refusal, no improper motive is proved. The rector appears to have done what he thought was reasonable; and I do not see that the result of the election would have been altered if he had acted otherwise, but rather the contrary. For the future it seems desirable that working men should have every time given them for exercising this franchise, and, without saying what time should be allowed for a poll, I would recommend all presiding officers to allow such a time as would not leave open even the slightest ground for suspicion that the time allowed was purposely inadequate. Lastly, if this application had been made in time, there might have been a trial at the Summer Assizes; as it is, it is made so late that on the ground of delay alone I think the rule ought to be discharged.

HIGHAM v. WRIGHT AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 52—Force of special rule—Continuance of service.

A. and another, employed as miners, left their work in the mine during working hours with the object of determining their employment. The hooker-on refused to send them to bank until the usual hour, when they, in breach of a special rule of the mine, caused themselves to be drawn up. They were charged with having committed an offence under the above Act, but the local magistrates dismissed the charge. On appeal, The Court held that they should have been convicted.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Justices of the borough of Bolton.

The respondents were charged before the magistrates with breaking a rule of a mine of the Wigan Coal and Iron Company (Limited). The rule in question was (so far as material) as follows :

Miners and all other Workpersons.

42. He (a person employed in or about the works) shall not go down or up, or into the pit, contrary to the direction of the banksman or the hooker-on, &c.

The respondents went down the pit to work at six o'clock. At eight o'clock they ceased work, and in effect discharged themselves from their employment. At nine o'clock they required the hooker-on to send them to bank. He refused to do so until the usual hour, two o'clock, whereupon the respondents pushed him aside, and procured themselves to be drawn up.

Sect. 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, authorises the adoption of special rules, to meet the circumstances of particular mines, with the object of preventing accidents and enforcing discipline ; and these rules are to have the same force as if they were contained in the Act.

The magistrates, holding that the words of the section should be construed strictly, dismissed the charge against the respondents.

Herschell, Q.C. and FitzAdam for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

GROVE, J.—It would have been a matter of satisfaction if the respondents had been represented ; but, as we must decide upon this question, I am of opinion that Mr. Herschell's contention is right, and that the construction of the magistrates was too narrow. No doubt they were literally in the right in deciding as they did ; but, in construing statutes, it is a rule that, when the strict grammatical sense of the words made use of would lead to absurdities, a construction must be adopted in accordance with the reason of the case. In this case, the literal construction would lead, in effect, to an abrogation of the Act, and might even cause actual danger. Again, when persons undertake service in a mine, and actually go down to work in it, they must be held to accept that service subject to the regulations in force for the management of the mine, and their character of servants does not cease at any moment they choose to determine it, but must continue so long as they remain in the pit, or for a reasonable time. Justices — Jurisdiction — Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70) ss. 2, 75, 109—Animals Order of Privy Council 1875, ss. 4, 44, 47, 53—33 & 34 Vict. c. 36, s. 2 (Irish Act)—Continuing offence—Practice—Stating case.

By Art. 44 of the Animals Order 1875 it is directed that when sheep are carried on the deck of a ship they shall be divided into pens by substantial divisions.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70) does not extend to Ireland, but by sect. 109 it is provided, "For the purposes of proceedings under this Act, or any order of the Privy Council or order or regulation of a local authority thereunder, every offence against this Act or any such order or regulation shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint under this Act or any such order or regulation shall be deemed to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the person charged or complained against happens to be."

Sheep were carried upon the deck of a vessel from Ireland to Wales without being divided into pens as required by the Animals Order 1875.

Held, that this was a continuing offence, punishable in Wales, and that Welsh justices had jurisdiction.

Sect. 108 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70 provides an appeal from a decision of justices with regard to any forfeiture or penalty under the Act to Quarter Session.

Held, that the power of justices to state a case was not thereby taken away, and that they might state a case, having heard the case, although they had declined jurisdiction.

Case stated by the justices of the peace for the county of Pembrokeshire under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 :

1. That the appellant is and was on the said 13th Feb. 1877, the inspector appointed by the Privy Council for the purposes of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, at New Milford, and the respondent is and was on the same day the master of the steamship Pelican.

2. That the said ship belongs to a company carrying on business at Cork (under the title of the City of Cork Steam Packet Company), and plies regularly between that city and Newport, Monmouthshire, calling on her voyages to the latter place, at New Milford, but returning direct to Cork.

3. That animals consigned to New Milford, or to be sent thence by railway are landed from the said vessel thereat, and dispatched therefrom to their destination.

4. That on the said 13th Feb. 1877, eighty sheep were carried as cargo for hire on board the Pelican, from Cork, and landed at New Milford.

5. That during such transit by sea, the places on board such vessel used for conveying the sheep were not divided into pens by substantial divisions as required by part 2, article 44 of the Animals Order of 1875.

MUIR v. HORN.

[C.P. Div.]

6. That the respondent was the master of the Pelican during such transit.

7. That New Milford is situated in Milford Haven, at a distance of ten miles from the entrance thereof.

8. That the said Haven is in the body of the county of Pembroke (Rex v. Bruce, R. & Ry. C. O. 243).

9. That the respondent did not happen to be within the said county at the time the information was laid, but was a few days afterwards duly served with a summons on his arrival at New Milford with his vessel.

10. That the said Order of Council was duly passed, and no evidence was given, nor any statute or order produced to the justices relating to contagious diseases (animals) in Ireland.

11. That the solicitor for the respondent called no evidence to rebut the charge laid in the information, but contended that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the same, inasmuch as the cause of complaint actually was committed or arose in Ireland, and that the said Act did not apply thereto, and that the fact of there being no such pens on board the Pelican as required by the said order after her arrival inside Milford Haven did not confer on the justices any jurisdiction within the meaning of sect. 109 of the said Act.

12. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the facts as proved did confer such jurisdiction.

13. The justices found that the whole of the allegations in the said information were duly proved, and being of opinion that the said section did not under the above circumstances confer on them jurisdiction to convict the respondent, they gave their determination against the appellant in the manner above stated.

14. The question of law arising from the foregoing statement is, whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear the case or not.

15. The opinion of the court is asked upon the same question of law, whether or not the justices were correct in their determination, and as to what further should be done or ordered on the premises.

Thompson for the respondent took a preliminary objection on the ground, first, that by the 108th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70, it is provided that "if any party feels aggrieved by the dismissal of his complaint by justices, or by any determination of justices with respect to any penalty or forfeiture under this Act, he may appeal therefrom, subject to the conditions and regulations following: 1. The appeal shall be made to some court of general or quarter sessions for the county or place in which the cause of appeal has arisen, holden not less than fifteen days and not more than four months after the decision of the justices." By this section the appeal should have been to the quarter sessions, and not to this court. The appellant has mistaken his remedy. [Per CURIAM.—This section does not take away the right to have a case stated.] Secondly, that where justices decline to hear on the ground that they have no jurisdiction, the proper course is by mandamus to hear: (Wakefield Local Board of Health v. West Riding Railway Company, (12 Jur. N. S. 936.)

Gorst, contra.—The case only applies to preliminary objections. The observations of Blackburn, J., apply where the justices have not heard the case; in this case the justices heard and determined the case.

Grove, J.—We must hear the case. As to the first objection, we are of opinion that there is nothing in it, because the 108th section does not take away the appellant's right to have a case stated. As to the second objection, I have more doubt, because of the dicta of Blackburn, J. in the case of Wakefield Local Board of Health v. The West Riding Railway Company, in which he says, "Your proper course seems rather to have been to apply for a rule by way of mandamus calling on the justices to hear the case, for they have not heard it yet. I think there has never been an instance where the justices declined to hear the case for want of jurisdiction, and then stated a case for the opinion of the Superior Court." I think, however, that those observations would not be applicable in this case; for there the justices declined jurisdiction on account of a preliminary objection, which is not the case here, for in this case the justices did try and determine the case.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are bound to hear the case. Mr. Thompson says they may appeal to the quarter sessions, but that does not interfere with 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. I don't see anything in the case cited to indicate that the judges would think differently in this case.

Gorst, Q.C. (Moorsom with him), for the appellants.—The 109th section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act provides that, "for the purposes of proceedings under this Act, or any order of the Privy Council, or order or regulation of a local authority thereunder, every offence against this Act or any such order or regulation shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint under this Act, or any such order, or regulation, shall be deemed to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the person charged or complained against happens to be." The 47th of the Animals Order of 1875, assists in construing the 44th, and says: "Animals landed from a vessel shall, on a certificate of an inspector of the Privy Council, certifying to the effect that the foregoing regulations, or some one of them, have not or has not been observed in the vessel, be detained at the place of landing," &c. It is clear therefore that the offence against the Act may be at the landing as well as at the embarkation. The 53rd further makes the owner and the occupier of the place where animals are put on board of or landed from vessels, responsible for offences against the order.

Thompson for the respondent.—The Irish Act 33 & 34 Vict. c. 36, s. 2, is in the same terms as s. 75 of the English Act; therefore, if the offence was committed in Ireland, it can be punished under the Irish Act. The interpretation clause, sect. 6, which says that the term "foreign," as applied to cattle or animals, means brought from any place out of the United Kingdom, must be limited by sect. 2, which says that the Act is not to extend to Ireland, and the term "United Kingdom" therefore does not include Ireland, which places Ireland in the position of a foreign country. In the case of Mahoney v. Ashtin (2 B. & S. Ad. 478) it was held that a bill drawn in Ireland upon a person in England is not an inland bill, and may therefore be accepted without writing on such bill. In the case also of Mentons v. Gibbons and another (3 T. R. 267) Ireland is regarded as a foreign country. This vessel is to be treated as foreign, and the Order does not apply to animals brought in foreign vessels, or from a foreign port; the dividing the cattle into pens would take place at the starting place, and not on the transit or at the port of destination, and so the alleged offence did not take place within the jurisdiction.

GROVE, J.—The question turns on the point whether the offence was committed in England or not. The Act gives the Privy Council power to make regulations, the infraction of which is to be visited with certain penalties. The contention is that the offence was committed in Ireland. The vessel starts from Ireland and comes to Milford Haven, and then sails up twenty miles to New Milford. New Milford is in the county of Pembroke. When the ship sails into Milford Haven it has not conformed with the regulations of the Animals Order of 1875; it was not divided into pens as required. The question is, whether the offence, which commenced in Ireland, was a continuing offence, and applied to the landing as well as to the embarkation. We are of opinion that it was, as the 47th section expressly mentions animals landed from a vessel. Moreover, the power given by the Order can only be exercised by the inspector on the landing. I cannot see any argument that will show that, presuming a vessel might fail to conform with the regulations at starting from Ireland without being liable to a penalty, it is not an offence to continue to disregard the regulations in the ports and waters of Great Britain. By section 12 of the Order, if anything is omitted to be done which is required by the Order, the owner and master of the vessel on which the omission takes place is held responsible, and the omission applies to every condition named in the section. It is argued that the offence was completed in Ireland. I think that it was a continuing offence in England. The object of the Act is to restrain the spread of the cattle disease in England. If a man could do as the respondent has done without coming under the provisions of the Act, the whole object of the Act would be defeated. Mr. Thompson argued that the term "United Kingdom" did not include Ireland, which, for the purpose of the Act, was to be considered foreign, but I think Ireland is not to be treated as foreign; nor do the provisions as to foreign animals apply to Irish animals; and the 4th section places it beyond reasonable doubt, and therefore that contention cannot be maintained. Irish animals when they come to England and Scotland are clearly subject to the provisions applied to animals of the United Kingdom.

DENMAN, J., concurred.

Case referred to justices.

An application was made on behalf of the respondents to be allowed to appeal; which was refused, on the ground that where the original decision is final, as the magistrates' would have been, no appeal can be given.

BURGESS v. NORTHWICH LOCAL BOARD.(a)

Public Health Act 1875—Arbitration—Liability of local authority to make compensation for damage—Jurisdiction of arbitrator under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 308.

The owner of house property alleged to have been damaged by the operations of a local board of health brought a claim against the board for compensation, and gave the usual arbitration notices prescribed by the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 179, 180. The board refused to acknowledge that they were in any way liable, or to appoint an arbitrator, and the reference proceeded before the arbitrator appointed by the claimant without the board becoming in any way party to the proceeding. On a motion to set aside the award for want of jurisdiction in the arbitrator,

Held, that it was not sufficient, in order to oust the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, that the board should deny their liability to make any compensation, but that at any rate some primâ facie ground for asserting their non-liability must be shown.

THIS was a motion for a rule nisi to set aside an award made by the County Court Judge for Cheshire, sitting as arbitrator under the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55), against the Local Board of Northwich, on the ground that under the provisions of the Act, the arbitrator had proceeded without jurisdiction. The district within the powers of the Northwich Local Board contained a number of salt works, and the extraction of the salt occasioned not unusually more or less subsidence of the ground in the neighbourhood. To meet this danger of subsidence some of the houses in the district were constructed on what was called the raiseable principle, being built upon a large wooden framework, and capable of being elevated by means of powerful screw jacks. In 1876 a subsidence of one of the roads took place so as to lower the houses which were built along it, and the Local Board for Northwich caused the road to be raised to its former level, thus leaving it several feet higher with regard to the houses bordering it than it had been originally. One Burgess, who owned certain of these houses, constructed upon the movable principle above described, thereupon gave notice to the local board that he claimed compensation for the injury sustained by his property in consequence of the board having caused the road to be restored to its former level. The local board having refused to entertain the claim, Burgess appointed an arbitrator under sect. 180, sub-sect. 4, of the Public Health Act, and gave notice to the local board of such appointment. The board, without entering into the amount of damage sustained by the claimant, refused to admit that they were under any liability whatever, and did not appear before the arbitrator. The reference was brought to a conclusion in their absence, without any arbitrator being appointed in their behalf, and an award was made against them. The material sections of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), upon the construction of which the argument turned, are as follows:

Sect. 179. In case of dispute as to the amount of any compensation to be made under the provisions of this Act (except when the mode of determining the same is specially provided for), and in case of any matter which, by this Act, is authorised or directed to be settled by arbitration; then, unless both parties concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, each party shall appoint an arbitrator to whom the matter shall be referred.

(a) Reported by J. A. FOOTE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sect. 180. With respect to arbitrations under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed (that is to say).

- (1.) Every appointment of an arbitrator under this Act when made on behalf of the local authority shall be under their common seal, and on behalf of any other party under his hand, or if such party be a corporation aggregate under their common seal.
- (2.) Every such appointment shall be delivered to arbitrators, and shall be deemed a submission to arbitration by the parties making the same.
- (3.) After making of any such appointment the same shall not be revoked without the consent of both parties, nor shall the death of either party operate as a revocation.
- (4.) If for the space of fourteen days after any matter by this Act authorised or directed to be settled by arbitration has arisen, and notice in writing by one party who has duly appointed an arbitrator has been given to the other party, stating the matter to be referred, and accompanied by a copy of such appointment, the party to whom notice is given fails to appoint an arbitrator, the arbitrator appointed by the party giving the notice shall be deemed to be appointed by and shall act on behalf of both parties.

Sect. 308. When any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the Act, in relation to any matter as to which he is not himself in default, full compensation shall be made to such person by the local authority exercising such powers; and any dispute as to the fact of damage or amount of compensation shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided by this Act; or if the compensation claimed does not exceed the sum of £20, the same may, at the option of either party, ascertained by and recovered before a court of summary jurisdiction.

Horace Brown, for the Local Board of Northwich.—There was no dispute here either as to "the fact of damage or amount of compensation," in the words of sect 308, and the arbitrator had, therefore, no jurisdiction to proceed. Even assuming that the claimant had sustained damage or deterioration to the amount of 10,000*l.*, the board denied that they were under any legal liability whatever. The question whether or not the local authority is liable is not left to the arbitrator, whose only function is to decide the amount of compensation to be paid, if any. The decision in Reg. v. The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers 1. E. and B. 391, was under sect. 69 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, but the principle involved is really the same: (Bradley v. Corporation of Southampton, 24 L. J., Q. B. 239.) [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Unless you go so far as to say that the mere denial of any liability by one of the parties to the reference ousts the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, you must give some prima facie reason for non-liability.] The arbitrator has no jurisdiction to decide the question of liability at all; he can only inquire into the fact of damage and the amount of compensation. It was never intended to submit so important a question as that of liability to the judgment of an inferior tribunal. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—If the Lands Clauses Act provisions are incorporated with the Public Health Act, then the arbitrator has power to state a case.] They are not incorporated for the purposes of arbitration, and the decision of the arbitrator would be practically final. Assuming that we could still dispute our liability in an action on the award, we should be concluded as to amount by the award, which we have treated throughout as a nullity; so that this motion to set it aside is the only proceeding open to us.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there is no ground for this application. If the matter had been so brought before us, either by affidavits or in any other way, that we could see that the arbitrator had not jurisdiction to decide the matters he did decide, and that there was no liability imposed on the defendants by law, I am not prepared to say that in that case his award might not have been aside. But here we are asked to set an award aside in a matter apparently—I say no more—within the provisions of those sections of the Act which give the arbitrator jurisdiction, on the single ground that the applicant asserts his non-liability. I can see no ground for holding that a mere unsupported assertion to that effect will oust the jurisdiction of the arbitrator.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I express no opinion as to the actual meaning and effect of sect. 308 of the Public Health Act, on the question whether the arbitrator has jurisdiction to decide if the board are under any legal liability at all, but here there has been nothing brought before us to show what the real ground of the arbitrator's decision was. The words of sub-sect. 15 of sect. 180 of the Act are extremely strong; and though the applicants have stood aloof from the proceedings, they are made in a sense parties to the reference by standing aloof. I do not intend to prejudge any subsequent proceedings that may be taken with regard to the award, but give my opinion on the ground that I have no means of knowing what the grounds of the arbitrator's decision were.

Motion refused.

WHITEHEAD v. SMITHERS. (a)

Preservation of wild fowl—35 & 36 Vict. c. 78, s. 2—39 & 40 Vict. c. 29—Possession of protected birds during prohibited periods.

The statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 78, s. 2, forbids the killing, wounding, or taking of certain wild birds of the United Kingdom, or exposing them for sale, within certain periods, and imposes a penalty, but provides that proof that such birds were received from a person residing out of the United Kingdom is a sufficient defence to a charge under the Act.

The statute 39 & 40 Vict. c. 29, after stating in its preamble that it was expedient to provide for the further protection of wild fowl of the United Kingdom, provides, in its second section, that any person who shall have in his control or possession any of the said wild fowl within the prohibited periods shall be liable to a penalty. The second statute makes no reference to a defence that the fowls were obtained from a person residing out of the United Kingdom. The penalty in the second statute is larger than in the former statute; and the prohibited period in the second statute is earlier in the season than in the former.

Reported by CAMERON CHURCHILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (reversing the decision of the City magistrate) that it is an offence for a person to have in his possession, during the prohibited period, a protected bird, whether such bird came from abroad or not.

Held also, that the second section of the second Act was in substitution for the second section of the former Act, although the former Act is not in terms repealed.

THIS was a case stated by one of the aldermen of the City of London, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the City of London, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with the determination of the magistrate upon the question of law which arose before him as hereinafter stated, on the 16th of June, 1877, at the Mansion House Justice Room in the City of London.

The facts of the case were as follows :

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information and complaint preferred by the appellant against the respondent under the statute 39 & 40 Vict. c. 29, s. 2, entitled "An Act for the Preservation of Wild Fowl" (hereinafter referred to as the Act of 1876) charging that the respondent had unlawfully had in his control and possession a certain wild fowl, to wit, a plover, then recently killed, in the City of London, between the 15th of Feb. and the 10th of July 1877, to wit, on the 10th of April, 1877, contrary to the statute, &c.

The magistrate dismissed the information and complaint.

2. Sect. 2 of the Act of 1876 provides as follows :

Any person who shall kill or wound, or attempt to kill or wound or take any wild fowl, or use any boat, gun, net, or other engine or instrument, for the purpose of killing, wounding, or taking any wild fowl, or shall have in his control or possession any wild fowl, recently killed, wounded, or taken between the 15th Feb. and the 10th July, in any year, shall on conviction of any such offence before any justice or justices of the peace in England or Ireland, or before the sheriff or any justice or justices of the peace in Scotland, forfeit and pay for every such wild fowl so killed, wounded, or taken, or so in his possession, such sum of money not exceeding one pound, as to the said justices or sheriff shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction.

3. On behalf of the appellant, it was proved or admitted by the respondent, that Henry Read, an officer of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, on the 10th April, 1877, purchased for 1s. 3d. at the shop of the respondent, situate in Cannon-street, in the City of London, a plover, then and there in the possession of the respondent and exposed for sale, which had been recently killed.

4. On behalf of the respondent, it was proved or admitted by the appellant that the plover so purchased by the said Henry Read was one of a consignment of dead plovers received by a Mr. Howard, a poulterer, from Holland, and by him sold to the respondent.

5. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, the plover in question being a foreign wild fowl, and killed abroad, the case did not come within the said statute, inasmuch as the preamble of the Act of 1876, which is as follows : "Whereas the wild fowl of the United Kingdom, forming a staple article of food and commerce, have of late years greatly decreased in number, by reason of their being inconsiderately slaughtered during the time that they have eggs and young, and whereas, owing to their marketable value, the protection accorded to them by the Act of the 35th & 36th years of the reign of her present Majesty, chap. 78, intitled 'An Act for the Protection of Certain Wild Birds during the Breeding Season,' is insufficient, it is expedient therefore to provide for their further protection during the breeding season," shows that the Act was intended for the further protection of the wild fowl of the United Kingdom only.

6. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that if the information had been laid under sect. 2 of the statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 78 (hereinafter referred to as the Act of 1872), which provides as follows : "Any person who shall, knowingly or with intent, kill, wound, or take any wild bird, or shall expose or offer for sale any wild bird recently killed, wounded, or taken, between the 15th March and the 1st August, in any year, shall, on conviction of any such offence before any justice or justices of the peace in England or Ireland, or before the sheriff or any justice or justices of the peace in Scotland, for a first offence be reprimanded and discharged on payment of costs and summons, and for every subsequent offence forfeit and pay for every such wild bird so killed, wounded, or taken, or so exposed or offered for sale, such sum of money as, including costs of conviction, shall not exceed 5s., as to the said justice, justices, or sheriff shall seem meet, unless he shall prove to the satisfaction of the said justice, justices, or sheriff that the said wild bird or birds was or were bought or received on or before the said 15th March, or of or from some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom. Provided, nevertheless, that every summons issued under this Act shall specify the kind of wild bird in respect of which an offence has been committed, and that not more than one summons shall be issued for the same offence," then the defence set up by the respondent would have been good in law, as provided by the exemption clause in the said section ; but he submitted that as the Act of 1876 in its preamble declares the protection accorded to wild fowl of the United Kingdom during the breeding season, by the Act of 1872 to be insufficient, and that "further protection" is expedient, the provisions of the Act of 1876 were designed to be more far-reaching than the provisions of the Act of 1872, and that they actually do more effectually enlarge and extend the protection of wild fowl of the United Kingdom, and he also contended that, inasmuch as the words contained in the 2nd section of the Act of 1872, forbidding any person "to expose and offer for sale" a protected bird, are omitted in the Act of 1876, more comprehensive words being used instead thereof, namely, that no person shall "have in his control or possession" a protected fowl, and that inasmuch as the Act of 1872 contains a clause exempting foreign birds from its operation, and the subsequent Act of 1876 contains no such exempting proviso, the protection of wild fowl had been enlarged and extended by the substitution of such more comprehensive words, and by the omission of such proviso, and, consequently, that the mere control or possession of wild fowl, whether foreign or not, recently killed, during the prohibited season was an offence against the Act of 1876.

7. After hearing the witnesses and arguments on both sides, the magistrate arrived at the conclusion :

First, that the Act of 1876, as appears by the preamble, was for the preservation of wild fowl of the United Kingdom only, and that for their marketable value as an article of food and commerce.

Secondly, that the wild fowl in question, a plover, having been bought or received of or from some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom, was not proved to be a wildfowl of the United Kingdom.

On these two findings the magistrate dismissed the summons.

Thirdly, that it was doubtful whether the 2nd section of the Act of 1876 was intended to apply to an offering or exposing for sale of a wild fowl.

This section, making it an offence for anyone to have in his control or possession any wild fowl recently killed, &c., within the limited period, the magistrate considered that this could not be intended to apply to the possession of wild fowl imported from Holland or elsewhere, but to refer only to wild fowl recently killed, or taken, and found on the person, or under the control, or in the possession of one engaged in killing or taking the same, in the United Kingdom, but who could not be proved to have actually killed or taken the same.

Fourthly, the magistrate considered that proceedings in this case ought properly to have been taken under the 2nd section of the Act of 1872, as that Act provides for the unlawful exposing or offering for sale of any wild bird, &c. (a plover being a wild bird mentioned in the Act of 1872, and also a wild fowl mentioned in the Act of 1876, recently killed, wounded, or taken); and the Act of 1876 is silent as to the exposing and offering such for sale, and does not in terms repeat the former enactment. The magistrate considered that the Act of 1876 must therefore be regarded as an amending Act, and must be taken concurrently with the Act of 1872, and that, as the facts proved in this case showed an exposing and offering for sale within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Act of 1872, that section applied, and further, that, as express provision is made for exempting the sale of a "wild bird" from the penal operation of that section if it were proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate, as was done in this case, that the said wild bird was brought or received of or from some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom, no conviction could take place.

The questions of law submitted for the opinion of the court were :

1. Whether the Act of 1876 makes it an offence for any person to have in his control or possession, within the prohibited time a wild fowl recently killed, &c., although such wild fowl shall have been bought or received of some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom.

2. Whether the second section of the Act of 1876 applies to the control or possession (by exposing or offering for sale in a shop), of a wild fowl recently killed, within the prohibited time, such exposing or offering for sale being a distinct offence in itself, punishable under the 2nd section of the Act of 1872, if such wild fowl be not bought or received of or from some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

Waddy, Q.C. (with him Willis Bund) for the appellant. — There must be a conviction. Under the 2nd section of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 78 (the Act of 1872), "An Act for the Protection of Wild Birds," &c., it is provided that "any person who shall knowingly, or with intent, kill, wound, or take any wild bird, or shall expose or offer for sale any wild bird," &c., should be punishable, but that statute did not provide that any person who should have in his possession any wild bird, &c., should be punishable. The second Act, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 29, the Act of 1876, supplements the first, which had been found insufficient, owing to the difficulty of proving that a person had himself killed, wounded, or taken the bird. Under the first Act, proof that the bird had been bought or received out of the United Kingdom was a sufficient defence. Under the second Act it is no defence. The first part of the first Act with regard to exposing for sale is omitted in the second Act, thus showing that it is not necessary for a person to do more than have a protected bird in his possession, to bring him within the statute, and the second part, with regard to the reception of a bird from without the United Kingdom, is also omitted, showing that the reception from any quarter of a protected bird is within the statute.

Reginald Brown for the respondent.—There can be no conviction. It appears from the first Act that Parliament intended it to apply to birds of the United Kingdom; and the second Act does not repeal the second section of the first Act. The preamble of the second Act says their further protection, i.e., the wild fowl of the United Kingdom. In this case the fowl is not from the United Kingdom. If a conviction were obtained in such cases as this, the laws of England would exercise control over the trade of other countries in birds. [Lord COLERIDGE.—If the Act accidentally interferes with the slaughter of birds in foreign countries, is that an argument against it? The Copyright Act prevents printed matter being circulated in England; but it does not prevent the matter being printed in France. So this Act may prevent the importation of certain protected birds during prohibited periods into England, but it does not, except incidentally, interfere with the slaughter of such birds in other countries.] If the contention of counsel for the appellant be good, then the Legislature has repealed a section of a former statute without mentioning it expressly.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Our opinion is that the judgment of the magistrate must be reversed, and that there must be a conviction in this case. The first Act, which is the statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 78 enacts in its 2nd section that "any person who shall knowingly, or with intent kill, wound, or take any wild bird, or shall expose or offer for sale any wild bird recently killed, wounded, or taken, between the 15th March and the 1st Aug. in any year, shall on conviction," &c., "unless he shall prove to the satisfaction of the said justice," &c., that the said wild bird or birds was or were bought, or received on or before the said 15th March, "of or from some person or persons residing out of the United Kingdom." Obviously, therefore, under that statute, it was a sufficient defence to a charge of this description to prove that the wild bird in question had been purchased or obtained from some person residing out of the United Kingdom. But this statute was supplemented by a second statute, and it becomes necessary, in a decision upon this case, to consider carefully, first, what was the deficiency in the first statute which the second statute was designed to supply; and, secondly, how was that deficiency supplied? The preamble of the second Act states that the wild fowl of the United Kingdom have of late years materially decreased in number by reason of their being inconsiderately slaughtered during the time that they have eggs and young, and that owing to their marketable value the protection accorded to them by the provisions of the former Act, i. e., the Act of 1872, has proved to be insufficient, and that it is therefore desirable and expedient to provide for their further protection during the breeding season. How is that further protection accorded to them? The second statute omits all mention of exposing or offering for sale the protected bird, and makes it penal to have any such bird in control or possession within the prohibited period. It alters the date of the prohibited period from the 15th March and the 1st day of Aug. in any year, to the 15th of Feb. and the 10th July. It further omits all mention of its being a defence to a charge of this nature to prove that the bird in question was received from some one residing out of the United Kingdom. Mr. Brown argues that the two statutes must be taken together, that the second does not repeal the first, and that what would have been an answer to the former statute is still an answer to the second, and, further, that making one statute to repeal another which it does not refer to is an unusual mode of construing an Act of Parliament. But the earlier statute is expressly referred to, and amended and strengthened, and with regard to the question as to whether a subsequent statute can repeal a previous statute, which it does not in express terms repeal, the case of Mitchell v. Brown (1 Ellis & Ellis, 267) will be found very instructive. In that case it will be found that the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 1, which imposed a penalty for the offence of throwing ballast, &c., into navigable rivers, was impliedly repealed by the subsequent statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 11, which provides a different punishment for the same offence, and prescribes a different mode of procedure, although the preamble of 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, states the expediency of repealing certain other statutes (which are repealed) and the expediency only of enlarging the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 22. Lord Campbell, in his judgment, says: "If that part of statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 22, on which this conviction was founded be still in force, we think that the conviction would be supported by the evidence. But after a careful comparison between this statute and statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, we have come to the conclusion that such part of the former statute is repealed. . . . If a later statute again describes an offence created by a former statute, and affixes a different punishment to it, varying the procedure, &c., giving an appeal where there was no appeal before, we think that the prosecutor must proceed for the offence under the later statute. . . . These considerations may justify the editors of the statutes in saying that the former statute is repealed, although some of its enactments are extended as well as re-enacted, in a later statute. When such specimens of legislation come before us, we are driven to form the best conjecture we can as to the intentions of the Legislature." There can be no doubt, therefore, that the second statute does repeal, though not in terms, the part of the former statute which renders penal an exposing or offering for sale, and, instead, renders the possession of a protected bird, within the prohibited period, a punishable offence, and, further, that the second statute repeals that portion of the former statute which allows proof that the bird was obtained from persons residing out of the United Kingdom to constitute a sufficient defence. It is further said that, if the law be construed in this way, the slaughter of birds in foreign countries, which the legislature of those countries does not control, would be controlled by British law. That, however, is merely saying in other words that the direct protection of British birds means the indirect protection of foreign birds. There must be a conviction, and the judgment of the magistrate must be reversed.

GROVE, J.—This clause is in substitution for a clause in the previous statute. How does the second statute provide for the further prosecution of wild birds in accordance with the terms of its preamble? The penalty is increased for one thing, and whilst by the former statute the first offence is punishable by a reprimand and payment of costs, and subsequent offences by a fine not exceeding 5s. for each bird, to include the costs of the conviction, the second statute makes every offence punishable by a fine not to exceed 1l. for every bird so found in possession of the person charged, and the costs of the conviction. There are two distinct provisions; and it is not as if a new provision, partly consistent with, and partly varying from, an old one were here, but the old one is directly altered and enlarged. It was found hard under the previous Act to prevent people saying, when detected in selling English protected birds during prohibited periods, that the birds came from a foreign country, and so the second Act fines the person who has a protected bird in his possession during the prohibited period, whether the bird be a foreign bird or not. The two questions submitted for the opinion of the court must be answered in the affirmative.

GRANT v. OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF PAGHAM (a.)

Parliament — County vote — Disqualification — Bribery at Election (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 43).

Upon the trial of an election petition in 1874, in which the appellant was respondent, under the Election Petitions Act 1868, the judge determined that the election was null and void, and the appellant was thereupon unseated.

The judge further certified and reported that it was proved before him that the appellant was guilty of a corrupt practice at the said election within the true intent and meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, and that the nature of the corrupt practice was the promising before and at the time of the said election to certain voters for the borough and other inhabitants thereof that he (the appellant) would, in the event of his being returned at the said election and after such return, give to such voters and other inhabitants an entertainment consisting, amongst other things, of meat and drink, with the intent to induce such voters to vote for him, the appellant, at the said election.

Held, that this report did not amount to a finding by the report of the judge upon an election petition that bribery had been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of the appellant, so as to render him personally guilty of bribery at such election, and affect him with the disability imposed by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 43.

Per Grove, J.—In order to ascertain whether or not such personal guilt of bribery is reported as having been found, the report alone of the election judge must be considered, and not the judgment given upon the hearing of the election petition.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the Western Division of the County of Sussex, disallowing the appellant's vote.

The following case was stated :

1. The said Albert Grant claimed to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the Western Division of the county of Sussex, as being duly qualified in respect of his ownership of certain freehold property situate in the parish of Pagham, in the polling district of Bognor, in the said division of the said county.

2. One Eugene Edward Street, a voter for West Sussex, duly objected to the said appellant being so inserted on such list of voters.

3. The claim came on and was heard before me at the court holden by me as revising barrister for the said Western Division of the county of Sussex, at Bognor, on the 1st day of October 1877, and the said Albert Grant was proved to be duly qualified in respect of his said claim, unless the objection put forward by the said Eugene Edward Street, and mentioned in the next paragraph of this case, should be decided by me to be a valid one.

4. The said objection was that, the said Albert Grant having been returned by the returning officer for the borough of Kidderminster as having been duly elected on the 31st day of January 1874 to serve in Parliament for the said borough, a petition had been presented against such election and return, and at the trial of the matters alleged in such petition before Mr. Justice Mellor, the election judge appointed to try the same, such election and return were determined to be null and void; and that the certificate and report made by Mr. Justice Mellor, as such election judge, on the trial of the said petition, and dated the 17th day of July 1874, rendered the said Albert Grant incapable of being registered as a voter and voting at any election in the United Kingdom during seven years next after the said 17th day of July 1874.

5. The certificate and report, so far as the same is material, is in the words and figures following :—“ Now I, Sir John Mellor, Knight, one of the judges on the rota for the trial of Election Petitions in England, having, according to the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, tried the matters alleged in the said petition, and determined the same, do hereby certify and report that at the trial of the matters alleged in the said petition I determined that the said Albert Grant was not duly elected and returned as to the said election, and that his election and return were and are wholly null and void. And in compliance with the directions of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 I further certify and report that it was proved before me that the said Albert Grant was guilty of a corrupt practice at the said election within the true intent and meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854. And I further report that the nature of such corrupt practice was the promising before and at the time of the said election to certain voters for the said borough of Kidderminster and other inhabitants thereof that the said Albert Grant would, in the event of his being returned at the said election and after such return, give to such voters and other voters and inhabitants of Kidderminster an entertainment consisting, among other things, of meat and drink, with the view and intent to induce such voters to vote for him, the said Albert Grant, at such election. And I further report that, in course of the trial, it appeared, more or less clearly, that a number of voters had been induced to vote for the said Albert Grant by virtue of a promise made to them by persons canvassing them for their votes, that their names should be put down upon a committee, and that it would be worth to them 10s. each when all was over, and in other cases that they would be paid for their services when it could be done with safety; but, inasmuch as in some cases the persons implicated were not clearly identified and in other cases the counsel for the respondent did not call them to contradict or explain the circumstances on the ground that their evidence did not affect Mr. Grant, I think that I cannot safely report the names of any persons as having been proved to have been guilty of bribery. I am not able, from the evidence before me, to report that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said election.”

“ There was evidence of a good deal of illegal treating during the election. But it was not proved to my satisfaction to have been corrupt.”

6. The evidence produced before me, and admitted by the claimant and objector, as common to both, consisted of a return to an order of the Honourable the House of Commons, dated 12th June 1874, for a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the judgments delivered by the judges selected in pursuance of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1863, for the trial of election petitions, and ordered by the House of Commons to be printed 5th Aug. 1874. With consent I annex to this case, as part thereof, a copy of the said return, and for the purposes of this appeal I incorporate in this case as facts proved before me the facts stated in Mr. Justice Mellor's judgment and certificate.

7. After hearing arguments in support of the said objection and against the said claim, and arguments in support of the said claim and against the said objection, I adjourned the further hearing and determination of the said claim and objection until the sitting of the court to be holden by me as such revising barrister at Horsham, within such western division of the said county on the 8th day of October 1877. And at such further hearing I did, as such revising barrister, decide and determine, having regard to the distinction existing between bribery and treating as affecting a voter's mind, and that treating as defined in the Corrupt Practices Act 1854 does not include a promise to treat, but that bribery, as defined in the said Act, does include a promise to give; and having regard to Mr. Justice Mellor's judgment and certificate, and to the nature of the promised entertainment, and the value of the proposed accompanying gifts as set forth in Mr. Justice Mellor's judgment, and for other reasons, that the corrupt practice reported by Mr. Justice Mellor to the House of Commons to have been committed by the said Albert Grant at the Kidderminster election was and amounted to bribery within the true intent and meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854 and the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, and was not treating, as contended before me on his behalf, and that consequently it was found by the said report that bribery had been committed by the said Albert Grant at the said election, I accordingly disallowed his claim to have his name inserted in the list of voters.

If the court shall be of opinion that the corrupt practice found by the said report to have been committed by the said Albert Grant at the Kidderminster election was and amounted to bribery within the true intent and meaning of the above-mentioned Acts, and that it was found by the said report that bribery had been committed by the said Albert Grant at the said election, my decision, so far as it disallowed his claim, will be affirmed.

If the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then my decision will be reversed, and such order made as may be fitting.

The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 (the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868), s. 143, is as follows, so far as is material:—

Where it is found by the report of the judge upon an election petition under this Act, that bribery has been committed by, or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at an election, such candidate shall be deemed to have been personally guilty of bribery at such election, and his election, if he has been elected, shall be void, and he shall be incapable of being elected to, and of sitting in the House of Commons during the seven years next after the date of his being found guilty, and he shall be further incapable during the said period of seven years,

(1) Of being registered as a voter, and voting at any election in the United Kingdom.

By sect. 11, sub-sect. 14 of the same Act, it is enacted,

Where any charge is made in an election petition of any corrupt practice having been committed at the election to which such petition refers, the judge shall in addition to such certificate, and at the same time, report in writing to the Speaker as follows:

(a) Whether any corrupt practice has or has not been proved to have been committed by, or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election, and the nature of such corrupt practice.

Pollard for the appellant.—The question for the court is not whether the appellant has been guilty of personal bribery or not; but whether he has been so found by the report of an election judge. That is the condition of the disability imposed by the statute. He has not been so found by the election judge in his report; and neither the revising barrister nor this court have jurisdiction to try the case over again (Lord Huntingtower v. Gardner, 1 B. & O. 297; Britt v. Robinson, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 188; L. Rep. 5 C.P. 503). [DENMAN, J.—You say that the election judge is the sole judge both of law and fact, and that we are not to say whether the corrupt practice stated by him amounts to personal bribery or not?] Exactly. In the present case another revising barrister has actually held that the same report does not amount to a finding of personal bribery, so that the evil of not accepting the words of the report itself as conclusive is manifest. First, the appellant contends that the report, in order to satisfy the section, must not be argumentative, but must find personal bribery eo nomine. Secondly, this report does not, even argumentatively, amount to such a finding. It is consistent with such a corrupt practice, amounting even to bribery by an agent, as will suffice to unseat; but there is a distinction between such bribery and bribery with the knowledge or consent of the candidate. Besides, it has been held that an entertainment of meat and drink comes under the head of treating merely, and is not bribery proper. Promising to do an act cannot be an offence greater than the actual performance of the promise.

GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister should be reversed. I regret very much that the case should have been argued only on one side, and that the court should thus have been deprived of the great advantage of hearing the cases and statutes which may be in point brought before them on behalf of both parties. We can only act upon the material presented to our minds; and upon these I am of opinion that the finding of the learned judge in this case does not bring the case within sect. 43 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, the Act under which alone the voter can be disqualified. An election judge is required by the Act to report to the House of Commons not only whether the candidate has been duly elected or not, but also to make a report under three heads set out in sect. 11, sub-sect. 14, and has also an optional power of adding anything else that it may appear desirable to him to report. Under this provision he is directed to report, first, whether any corrupt practice has or has not been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at the election, and the nature of such corrupt practice. That is very clear and explicit, and similar words are used in sect. 43 of the same Act, which provides that, where it is found by the report of the judge upon an election petition under the Act that bribery has been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at an election, such candidate shall be deemed to have been personally guilty of bribery at such election, and his election, if he has been elected, shall be void, and he shall be incapable, amongst other things, of being registered as a voter and voting at any election in the United Kingdom during the seven years next after the date of his being found guilty of such personal bribery. Now, there is no doubt at all that the learned judge has not reported in the words of the statute, because he has not reported that a corrupt practice has been committed with the knowledge and consent of the candidate. He may have intended to have found him personally guilty within the meaning of the enactment when he says that he has been guilty; but he has not said so in words that are unambiguous and plain, according to the Act of Parliament. In the Corrupt Practices Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), the term "corrupt practice" is used of practices committed without the knowledge and consent of the candidate, and in sect. 36 of that Act it is expressly said that a man may be "guilty" of bribery by his agents as well as by himself. The terms of sect.

C.P. Div.]

GRANT v. OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF PAGHAM.

[C.P. Div.]

46 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 (the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868) are, to my mind, still stronger to the same effect. In that section it is said that for the purpose of disqualifying, in pursuance of sect. 36 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, a member guilty of corrupt practices other than personal bribery within sect. 43, the report of an election judge shall be deemed to be substituted for the declaration of an election committee. Now there the Act expressly distinguishes between a member guilty of a corrupt practice and a member guilty of a corrupt practice committed with his knowledge and consent. The words of sect. 43, "committed by or with the knowledge and consent," are not contained in the judge's report, which uses expressions not necessarily imputing personal knowledge or personal guilt; and I therefore am of opinion that on the face of this report it is consistent with it that Mr. Grant was guilty of a corrupt practice not necessarily committed with his knowledge and consent, but by his agent. The learned judge goes on to state the nature of the corrupt practice, and the same infirmity—or rather the same absence of the words of the section imposing the penalty—is still noticeable: "And I further report that the nature of such corrupt practice was the promising before and at the time." The report does not say by whom the promise was given, and does not do more to fix it upon the candidate than the first branch of the report does. On the whole it appears to me that there is nothing which is not consistent with guilt by the agent of the candidate, and without the knowledge and consent of the latter. It is necessary to see, in construing a penal statute, that the offence comes clearly within that which the Act contemplates, and it does not appear to me that the offence set out on the face of this report is clearly within sect. 43 of the Parliamentary Elections Act. I also think that we should not regard the explanatory terms of the judgment for two reasons: first, because, as a rule, in ordinary cases the reasons of a judgment are not evidence for the court, because they are remarks openly expressed by the learned judge, who may comment upon the witnesses and make a number of remarks which are not evidence at all; and, secondly, because the whole qualification of sect. 43 is made to depend not upon the judgment of the judge, but upon his report. This report, therefore, being consistent with the candidate having been guilty by an agent only, it is unnecessary to consider the other point argued by Mr. Pollard, as to its being impossible that a promise should amount to bribery when the actual performance of the promise does not.

DENMAN, J.—I entirely concur in regretting that only one side has been argued by counsel in this case. It is one of considerable importance, but all the questions that have been raised need not be decided. We were anxious that it should be discussed before a judge of so much experience in elections as my brother Grove, and for that reason were glad that a great part of yesterday's argument should be repeated to-day. The case turns upon the short question whether it has been found in this case by the report of an election judge that bribery has been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of the candidate, who is the present appellant. The barrister seems to have thought that the finding of the judge amounted to a finding to that effect. On the first point that has been raised before us, that no finding will do unless the offence pointed at is stated expressly and in so many words, and that the omission to do that here is fatal, it is not necessary to decide. It has been argued, and some authority has been cited for it, that it is necessary that the offence should be reported by the judge in the very words of the statute. That may be so; but yet some very startling results would follow from such a doctrine. An election judge might have reported facts which all the world could say amounted to gross bribery, and yet the man might be left in possession of his franchise. I do not decide the case upon that ground, especially as we have only heard the argument of counsel on one side. It may be necessary to meet it hereafter, but I do not intend to decide it now. I agree with my brother Grove in holding that this is a case in which it does not appear with reasonable certainty that personal bribery has been committed. The judge has found Mr. Grant guilty of a corrupt practice, and that the corrupt practice was the promising of an entertainment if he were elected; but I so entirely agree with the observations of my brother Grove as to this finding that I will only say that, even though it may not be necessary to use the express words of sect. 43 of the Act, there must be a statement equivalent to them, and here there is no such statement. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider whether the facts as reported by the judge would have amounted to personal bribery if done with the knowledge and consent of the candidate. It would certainly be rather startling that a mere promise to treat should be looked upon as something more serious in its consequences than treating itself, the actual performance of the promise. It may be that it would not be straining the law to treat it merely as equivalent to actual treating, so as not to amount to bribery. I wish to leave that question alone, and to confine my decision to that point which my brother Grove, J.J. has treated.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only point we have to consider is whether this finding of the learned judge comes within sect. 43 of the Parliamentary Elections Act. That section imposes the penalty of disqualification where it is found by the report of a judge upon an election petition that bribery has been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of the candidate. There is no form of report given in the Act, and no actual or precise words need be employed; but, still, in the absence of any finding that the candidate has been guilty of bribery by himself or with his knowledge and consent, if that has to be spelt out of the facts as stated, I do not think that is sufficient. Now, when we come to look at this report, it is by no means clear that bribery has been committed within sect. 43 of the Act. I think the words should be so clear and precise as to leave no reasonable doubt as to their effect. The appeal must be allowed, and the vote allowed.

Decision reversed; no costs.

BEAL v. FORD. (a)

Parliament—Borough vote—Residence—2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

The name of the appellant, being upon the list of voters for a borough, was objected to on the ground that he had not resided for the six calendar months required by 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, within the limits of the borough or within seven miles thereof.

It was proved that the appellant had occupied a house within the prescribed limits as tenant during part of the time; but that, for a period of two calendar months out of the six months required by the statute, he had lived with his wife and child in a cottage occupied by his mother-in-law. The cottage so occupied was one of certain houses called "Free Cottages," granted by the trustees thereof to inhabitants of the borough free of rent, and, under certain regulations, one of which provided that no person should reside with any inmate without the permission of the trustees. Such permission had not in this case been given.

It was further proved that, on one night in the course of the two months, the appellant had been absent in London on business, leaving his wife and child in the said cottage.

Held that the requirements as to residence in 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, had been fulfilled.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the city and county and borough of Exeter.

The following case was stated:—

At a court held by me, the barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the city and county and borough of the city of Exeter, Brutton John Ford duly objected to the name of James Beal being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Exeter, in respect of a freehold house in Albion-place in the parish of Heavitree, on the ground that the said James Beal had not resided for six calendar months next, previous to the last day of July in the present year, within the said borough, or within seven miles thereof, pursuant to 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

The following facts were duly proved before me:

1. The qualification of the said James Beal was duly proved, and admitted in all other respects.
2. On 31st July 1876, the appellant resided in a house (which he occupied as tenant), situate in Queen's-road, in the parish of St. Thomas the Apostle, within the said borough, where he continued to reside until the 29th day of March in the present year 1877.
3. On the said 29th day of March, the appellant's term having expired, he gave up possession of his residence in Queen's-road, and he, his wife, and child of necessity went to his wife's mother's house, she being a widow, (at her invitation), with the intention of remaining there (if he was so permitted) until such time as he could obtain a suitable dwelling-house within the said borough.
4. The mother-in-law of the appellant resides at No. 5, Mount Durham, within the said borough. The house so occupied by her is one of a number of houses called the "Free Cottages," which are given by the trustees of the same to inhabitants of Exeter, to be occupied free of rent during the pleasure of the trustees.

The following are the printed rules of the Free Cottages:

Rules contained in the trust deed.

Except in a case of a married couple, no person shall reside with any inmate, except by permission of the trustees.

Every inmate, by whomsoever nominated, shall be subject to the rules and orders of the trustees, and shall be subject to dismissal by the trustees as hereinafter mentioned.

The trustees shall from time to time have full power and authority to remove and displace any person from the cottages who shall wilfully transgress such rules or orders, or be guilty of other misconduct.

Bye-laws and regulations (amongst others):

1. No inmate shall receive parochial relief without the special consent of the trustees, and every inmate shall be considered as occupying during the pleasure of the trustees.

2. Any inmate marrying shall within one week give notice thereof to the trustees, who will be at liberty to regard such marriage as a forfeiture of the cottage, and the like regulation shall apply to the withdrawal of the guaranteed allowance to any inmate or any material alteration in his or her circumstances.

5. From the said 29th of March to the 29th of May in the present year the appellant (with the exception of one night, the night of the 2nd of April 1877, when absent in London on business) continuously lived and slept in the house so occupied by his mother-in-law. The appellant's wife and child lived and slept in the said house of the appellant's mother-in-law every day and night throughout the whole period from the said 29th of March to the said 29th of May, during the whole of which time the appellant and his wife and child exclusively used and occupied one sleeping apartment in the said house, but lived during the day in certain other rooms in the said house, and occupied them in common with the appellant's mother-in-law, and during this period had no other residence or dwelling within the said borough or in any other place. The appellant's mother-in-law had not obtained any permission from the trustees, as required by rule 1, to have her son-in-law to reside with her.

6. The appellant did not pay his mother-in-law for such use and occupation, but lived there as her guest, without any interference on the part of the trustees, until the said 29th of May, when he went to reside in the house in which he is now residing, which house is also within the said borough.

7. The appellant is a clerk to a solicitor carrying on business in the said city of Exeter.

On behalf of the objector it was urged that, from the 29th of March to the 29th of May the voters had no residence within the said borough or seven miles thereof:

First, because the room which he used at his mother-in-law's house was used by him as her guest or visitor.

Secondly, because that the house in which he resided for this time being an almshouse, the occupier had no right by the rules of the Free Cottages to give him the separate and entire use and occupation of any room in the said house. The case of Ford v. Pys (L. Rep. 9 C. P. 269) was relied on.

On behalf of the voter it was urged,

That during the whole of the six months previously to the 31st July 1877, he actually resided within the said borough.

That the residence at the mother-in-law's was bona fide, and that he went there with the intention of remaining there until he could find another suitable dwelling, and did remain there until that object was accomplished.

C.P. Div.]

BEAL v. FORD.

[C.P. Div.]

That he had had the separate and entire use and occupation of a sleeping apartment in the house of his mother-in-law without interruption on the part of the trustees during the time he resided there.

That he was a tenant at will of the said room of his mother-in-law.

That in the case of a freehold qualification all that was required was that the voter should actually and bodily reside within the borough or seven miles thereof.

That the words of the statute "shall have resided" should be read as "shall have lived" or "have had" a "residence" or "dwelling."

That the case of Ford v. Pye did not apply.

I decided that the residence required by the Act is that of a bond fide inhabitant having a domus of his own within the distance therein set out.

That the said James Beal between the 29th March and 29th May, 1877, was a trespasser ab initio, or, at most, a visitor in the house of his mother-in-law. That the six months' residence was thereby interrupted. I therefore expunged his name from the said list.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, consistently with the above facts stated, I could legally find that the said James Beal had not resided for the six months next previous to the last day of July in the present year within the said borough.

If the court should be of opinion on the question in the affirmative the list is to remain unaltered. If the court should be of opinion in the negative the name of the said James Beal is to be inserted in the list of voters, and the register of voters amended accordingly.

Sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, provides that no person shall be registered in any year as an elector for a city or borough "unless he shall have resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July in such year within the city or borough, or within the place sharing in the election for the city or borough, in respect of which city, borough, or place respectively he shall be entitled to vote, or within seven statute miles thereof, or of any part thereof."

A. Charles, Q.C. and Bucknill for the appellant.—The decision of the barrister was erroneous. The case turns upon the meaning of the word "reside" in 2 Will. 4, c. 45, sect. 31. Until that statute there was no enactment as to the necessity that a voter should reside within the borough. He might have resided anywhere, and merely have come up to vote. The statute, however, has avoided giving any definition of the term "residence," and does not limit it, as sect. 29 does the term "occupation," to that of an owner or tenant. A voter may reside, or rather sleep, anywhere he likes, provided only that it is within the prescribed limits. So far as the provision as to the franchise is concerned, he might sleep under a hedge. In E. v. Sowton (cited in Burn's Justice, tit. "Poor," "Settlement by Estate") it was said that a man is a stranger on the first day after his arrival in a place, a guest on the second, and an inhabitant on the third. At any rate, mere bodily presence within the statutory limits is sufficient to make him a resident for this purpose.

Bompas, Q.C. for the respondent.—First, the term "reside" in this section is used of a man having a fixed local house of his own. There are good reasons why this should be the law as to boroughs and not as to counties. Secondly, even if residence is to be taken merely as equivalent to existence within the limits, then that existence must be continuous; and the mere fact that the voter's wife and family were left behind during the night of his absence does not prevent his residence in this sense from having been broken. On that night, at least, he was away without the legal right of returning to any home whatever. He cited on the first point

DENMAN, J.—The decision of the court must be for the appellant. The revising barrister decided the case on the ground that the residence required is that of a bond fide inhabitant having a place of residence of his own; and the addition that he goes on afterwards to make, that he regarded the claimant as a trespasser ab initio, does not seem to me relevant. The statute gives a vote to all persons who have the property qualification, requiring only in addition that there shall be residence within certain limits during the last six months before they exercise it. The word residence has not necessarily the same meaning here that it has in other statutes referring to different kinds of franchise. Great expense was formerly incurred by bringing in voters to take part in elections, so as to throw a heavy burden upon the candidates, and to disappoint those who had more direct knowledge of the place, and a greater interest in it. But I do not think that in imposing that limit of residence it was intended to make the restriction so strict as that contended for by Mr. Bompas. All that was necessary was, that the person who exercised the vote should not have ceased to know the place, and to be interested in it, so as to be still in the fair construction of law a resident. Then it is said that the tenure of the voter in this particular case was precarious, and that he might have been turned out at any time if certain parties had chosen. That does not appear to me to affect the question. It is said also by Mr. Bompas, that if the person who resides in this sense is away for a single day, he must be held to have broken his residence. I think that is a fallacy. Looking at the substance of the thing, I do not think that his absence for a single night in London on business broke his residence in such a manner as to take away from him his franchise; and, further, looking at the subsequent addition made by the barrister to the case before us, I think that the distinction between the two kinds of residence which the statutes contemplate may not have been brought before the barrister's attention. The cases which have been cited are not, I think, applicable to this particular enactment, and need not be further considered.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question is as to the meaning of the word "reside" in 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 31. In this case the voter seems to have had a house of his own for a certain time, and after that he lived, in point of fact, with some of his family in another house within the prescribed limits. In every sense he seems to me to have had his residence within those limits. I am not prepared at present to follow Mr. Charles to the full extent of his argument, that any presence within those limits will do, and that a man may in fact be regarded as resident who has no residence at all, which is really what his contention comes to. But I think that here, according to the facts as stated in the case, the voter did in reality, during the six months, reside in the place, and that it was as much his home as any he ever had. The vote should, therefore, have been allowed.

PHILLIPS v. HENSON.

[C.P. Div.]

Decision reversed.

PHILLIPS v. HENSON. (a)

Lodger — Under-tenant — Distress for rent — Lodgers' Protection Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 79).

A., the tenant of a house, let the greater portion of it unfurnished to B., her brother-in-law, under a written agreement. B. occupied part and sub-let part. A. paid the rent to the superior landlord, and the rates and taxes.

Held, that B. was a lodger within the meaning of the Lodgers' Protection Act.

The fact that a person is under-tenant of part of a house is not inconsistent with his being a lodger.

This was an action for wrongfully seizing a lodger's furniture.

The evidence given at the trial was to the effect that a Mrs. Ffolkes, sister-in-law of the plaintiff, was lessee of No. 3, Park-lane, Regent's Park, at a rent of 170l. per annum, the defendant being her landlord. The plaintiff, under an agreement dated 18th Dec. 1875, took the greater part of the rooms in the house from Mrs. Ffolkes, leaving her in occupation of the rest. She was to pay the rent of the house to the landlord, and the rates and taxes. The rooms taken by the plaintiff were unfurnished, and he put a considerable amount of furniture therein. Two of the rooms were under-let by him. The defendant, failing to obtain payment of his rent from Mrs. Ffolkes, sent broker's men, who seized all the furniture in the house, including the plaintiff's. In consequence, the plaintiff brought this action, and obtained 300l. damages. The above-mentioned agreement of Dec. 18, 1875, between the plaintiff and Mrs. Ffolkes, was as follows:

The said Jane Ffolkes doth agree to let unto the said George Phillips, and the said George Phillips doth agree to take from the twenty-fifth day of December instant, for a quarter, and unless either of the said parties shall give to the other three months' notice to quit previous to the end of the said term, but not otherwise, from thence afterwards for another quarter year and so on from quarter to quarter, while and until one of the said parties shall give to the other three months' notice to quit. All that kitchen, dining-rooms, drawing-rooms, second floor, three rooms on third floor, together with the appurtenances, at and under the quarterly rent or sum of twenty-seven pounds ten shillings, the same to be paid on the day of the expiration of each quarter of a year during the term or terms aforesaid, and the first payment to commence on the 25th day of March 1876 next, which said quarterly rent or sum of twenty-seven pounds ten shillings, the said George Phillips doth agree to pay accordingly free and clear of and from all deductions whatever. And the said Jane Ffolkes doth also agree to pay all taxes and assessments for the said premises and keep the same in good and sufficient repair during the term or terms aforesaid, damage by fire or other inevitable accident only excepted.

As witness the hands of the said parties.

GEORGE PHILLIPS,
JANE FFOLKES.

MARIA PHILLIPS.

At the trial it was contended for the defendant that the above agreement was a collusive one between the plaintiff and Ffolkes, that the plaintiff never intended to pay rent to Ffolkes, but conspired with her to defraud the landlord.

A rule had been obtained for a new trial on the ground that Manisty, J., before whom the action was tried, misdirected the jury in telling them that the plaintiff was a lodger within the meaning of the Lodgers' Protection Act, and on other grounds.

Kemp, Q.C. and Gibbons now showed cause.—Mrs. Ffolkes remained in occupation of the house, paying the rent to the landlord, when it was paid by anyone, and the rates and taxes. When the broker's men came to seize the furniture, Mrs. Ffolkes locked them out, and they had to break in. There is nothing inconsistent in the agreement with the plaintiff being a lodger, and the facts show that he was so.

Murphy, Q.C. and Shaw in support of the rule.—The Act is confined to lodgers, because they have no stake in the house, a mere licence to occupy. But this agreement gives the plaintiff something more than that. A lodger cannot bring trespass quare clausum fregit (Com. Dig.); but a person occupying under this agreement could bring such an action. He is an under-tenant, not a lodger. [LINDLEY, J.—The question is whether he may not be both.]

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument:

Monks v. Dykes, 4 M. & W. 567;

Allen v. Liverpool, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 180, 181;

Roads v. Overseers of Trumpington, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 56, 62;

Toms v. Luckitt, 5 C. B. 23, 28;

Smith v. Lancaster, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 246.

Nov. 26.—GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The chief question that we have to decide is, whether certain furniture upon which a landlord distrained for rent in arrear was the furniture of a lodger within the meaning of the Lodgers' Protection Act. The facts are, that a Mrs. Ffolkes, being tenant of a house, let a large part of it unfurnished to the plaintiff, who was her brother-in-law, by a written agreement, and that, her rent being subsequently in arrear, the landlord distrained upon furniture in the house which belonged to the plaintiff. The written agreement is as follows [reads it]. It was contended that this agreement created an under-tenancy, and was not applicable to an occupation as a lodger. We are of opinion that it is unnecessary to decide whether this agreement did or did not create an under-tenancy; as it appears to us that the fact of the plaintiff being an under-tenant would not be inconsistent with his being also a lodger. The question is not whether the agreement may create a tenancy, but whether it prevents the plaintiff being considered a lodger. The Act itself gives no assistance to a definition of what constitutes a lodger. The mere fact that a person occupies the greater part of the house certainly does not negative the idea of his being a lodger. The cases cited seem to show that the real test is whether the landlord continues to occupy any part of the house, retaining his character of master of it. We had before us, a day or two ago, the question whether a particular house was a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Public Health Act. That statute may require a very different definition of the term "lodging-house," because its object is different, viz., to prevent dirt and disease. Here the object is to protect the goods of persons, between whom and the landlord there is no direct privity, and who do not owe any rent, from being seized. It is unnecessary to say anything as to the argument that the effect of this agreement would be to give a right to bring an action of trespass against the landlord, which it is said a lodger could not bring, further than that we think that it contains nothing inconsistent with the plaintiff's being a lodger. As to the other point, that the question whether the agreement was a collusive one was not left to the jury, we are of opinion that it was in substance left to them. We think, however, that the damages were excessive; and the rule for a new trial will only be discharged upon the plaintiff's agreeing to reduce the damages to 150l.

LINDLEY, J.—I agree with my brother Grove that this rule should be discharged. With respect to the question, whether the plaintiff was a lodger within the meaning of the Lodgers' Protection Act, considerable difficulty exists in determining who is a lodger within that Act. The Act throughout uses no other description of the persons coming within its scope than the word "lodgers." Although there is perhaps in this case a strong temptation to adopt a narrow construction of the Act, we ought to resist that and give the full benefit that we think the Act intended. I am not prepared to say that an under-tenant may not be a lodger. It seems to me that to say so would be to narrow the scope of the Act. Of course an under-tenant need not necessarily be a lodger. He might be in exclusive occupation of the tenement, and then he certainly would not be. But the mere fact that a person is an under-tenant is not conclusive against his being a lodger. I have no doubt that the agreement between the plaintiff and Mrs. Ffolkes did create an under-tenancy, but that is not the question we have to decide. I think, whether we look at this agreement or at the facts of the case, there is nothing inconsistent with the plaintiff's being a lodger.

Rule discharged, the plaintiff agreeing to reduce the damages to 150l.

"Common lodging-house"—Unregistered—Public Health Act 1875.

A lodging-house, where hawkers and persons of a similar class were received, staying for various periods, having their meals in one room, and paying sixpence a night, held to be a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, and therefore to require registration.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. At a Petty Session, holden at Cumbleton, in and for the division of Branton, in the county of Devon, on the 5th Feb. 1877, an information preferred by William Edgar Langdon, as clerk to the local board of health of the district of Ilfracombe, in the said county, such local board being the urban sanitary authority of the said district (hereinafter called the appellant), against the said Benjamin Broadbent (hereinafter called the respondent), under sect. 86 of the Public Health Act 1875, for that he, the said Benjamin Broadbent, lodging-house keeper of Ilfracombe aforesaid, on the 22nd Jan. instant, at the parish of Ilfracombe, in the said county, then and there being a keeper of a common lodging-house within the true intent and meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, and within the said district of Ilfracombe, unlawfully did receive into such house, as lodgers, one George Jones and others, such house not being duly registered as required by the said Act, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined by us, the said justices, the said parties respectfully being present or represented, and upon such hearing we ordered that the said information should be, and the same was by such order, then and there dismissed.

2. And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and he duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

3. Now, therefore, we the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, do hereby state and sign the following case:—

4. Upon the hearing of the information the following evidence was adduced before us on behalf of the appellant, that is to say:

Henry Lang, sworn, said:

I am clerk to Mr. Langdon, who is clerk of the Ilfracombe Local Board of Health. That board has by resolution directed the present proceedings to be instituted. I have referred to the register of common lodging-houses, and find that the defendant is not registered as the keeper of such house.

John Shepherd, sworn, said:

I am a police constable, stationed at Ilfracombe. The defendant lives in High-street, Ilfracombe, where he has a shop and keeps a lodging-house. He has done so during the time he has lodged on those premises, which is about six months. Before that he carried on similar business on premises at the bottom of Church-hill. He has received hawkers, bone gatherers, and men whom we have suspected of begging; and one or two have been convicted. Persons of that class have come to me for lodging, and I have recommended them to defendant's house, for there was no other place to recommend them to. I have seen these people in the back kitchen. On the 22nd Jan. last, a chair mender, named Jonea, was lodging there, and had been there a fortnight or three weeks. There are two sawyers there now, and one of them, as I believe, a relation of Mrs. Broadbent. There is a young man, a mason, there, and a man named Essery, who hawks fish and lounges about the streets. He has been there some considerable time. A man with his wife and child, an itinerant maker and hawker of picture frames, lodged there some time. A drover came to me on the 22nd Jan. last. He asked me where he could get lodgings, and I sent him to defendant's house, and he stayed there that night.

On cross-examination by the solicitor for the respondent, the witness said:

There are no registered lodging-houses in Ilfracombe, and that is an accommodation which is wanted. Defendant kept a similar house before, but I don't know whether it was registered or not. I don't know whether he has a refreshment licence for this house, but I have heard him say he has. It is a more modern house and different to the one he formerly occupied. Mrs. Broadbent told me one day last week that the landlord of the house would not allow it to be kept as a common lodging-house. I have known musicians, the Japanese, or what they call themselves, stopping there for a night.

Henry Lang called by Sir Bruce Chichester, Bart. (one of the justices), said:

There is no registered lodging-house in Ilfracombe at present. The house defendant formerly occupied was registered.

John Shepherd, re-examined by the solicitor for the appellant, said:

As far as I can judge defendant carries on a precisely similar business to what he did at the old house, receiving lodgers for a short time. I have over and over again sent lodgers there, and Mrs. Broadbent has sent them to the police station to ask if she should take them in. I have said she could, but she was not compelled to do so. I cannot see that there is any difference in the defendant's business now to what it was in the old house.

George Potter, sworn, said:

I am a police constable stationed at Ilfracombe. I have heard the evidence given by the witness Shepherd, and can corroborate all he has said.

George Jones, sworn, said:

I am a chair mender, and resident at Exeter; for the present I am staying in Ilfracombe and lodging at defendant's house, paying sixpence a night. A picture-frame maker, with his wife and child stayed there for eight or nine days. I have lodged there about three weeks, and there are others who have been there about as long. I have worked in the back kitchen, and the picture-frame maker worked there also. His wife did not cook there, but in the other kitchen. We all had our meals in the kitchen at the same table. A fish hawker lodged there, and he has told me he has done so for two years. I only know one person who has lodged there for a single night.

5. The preceding evidence raised doubts in our minds whether we were in law entitled to hold that the respondent was the keeper of a common lodging-house within the true meaning of those words in the Public Health Act, 1875 and we thereupon ordered that the said information should be, and the same was by such order, then and there dismissed.

6. The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, is, whether upon the evidence above stated we were entitled or bound to hold, as a matter of law, that the respondent was the keeper of a common lodging-house within the true meaning of those words in the Public Health Act 1875.

7. It was contended for the defendant that the question for us was one of fact, namely, whether, upon the evidence produced by the complainant, it was proved to our satisfaction that the defendant was the keeper of a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, and that we rightly decided upon such evidence, and that, therefore, our decision was not erroneous in point of law.

8. If the court should be of opinion that our decision was wrong, the said order of dismissal is to be quashed, and the court is humbly solicited, according to the power vested in the court by the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), to remit the case to us, the said justices, with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such order as to the court may seem fit.

9. If the court shall be of opinion that our decision was right, the said order of dismissal is to stand.

Given under our hands this 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1877.

A. ARTHUR NYE.

A. Charles, Q.C. and Murch for the appellant.

St. Aubyn for the respondent.

GROVE, J.—I am of opinion that this case must be sent back to the magistrates. If they had given any reasons for their decision I should have been inclined to say that the question here was one of fact upon which their finding would be conclusive. But they have left the question to us as a matter of law whether, assuming the evidence set out in the case to be true, they were bound to hold that the house in question was a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875. I am of opinion that there is ample evidence that it was. It appears to have received all comers, the itinerant character of the greater number of the lodgers making it probable that they did not as a rule make any long stay at the house. The object of this provision in the Act being to promote health by preventing dirt and overcrowding, the evidence seems to me clearly to show that this is a house to which such a provision is applicable. Of course each case must be decided on its own facts. There may be lodging-houses resorted to by a higher class of persons to which the term "common lodging-house" would not be applicable. The case does not find whether these lodgers occupied separate sleeping apartments. But I do not think it is necessary to show that the lodgers are all herded together, in order to bring the case within the statute. Even if a common room is necessary to constitute a common lodging-house, the evidence here shows that they all took their meals together. I think, therefore, that the decision of the magistrates was wrong.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is very difficult to define what a common lodging-house is; but it is not very difficult to define it by a type. If one looks at sects. 86 to 89 of the Act, it is evident that the kind of house that is meant is one that is open to all comers, and therefore requires supervision in order to insure cleanliness. The upper classes in society are fastidious, and will not go to dirty houses; they, therefore, exercise the necessary supervision for themselves. That this house did require such supervision is shown, I think, by the evidence as to the class of persons who frequented it. I therefore hold that this was a common lodging-house within the meaning of the Act.

Decision of the magistrates reversed, without costs.

BALLARD v. ROBINS. (a)

Parliament—County vote—List of Voters—Correction of mistake—6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40.

The name of the appellant, who claimed a vote for the county as an occupier of house and land, rated at 12l. and upwards, under the Representation of the People Act 1867, together with a correct statement of that qualification, appeared in the register of voters under the heading, "Voters in respect of property including occupiers at a rent of 50l. and upwards." Notice of objection to the retention of the voter's name was given, the objection being to the nature of the qualification and to the column in which such qualification appeared.

The appellant had not, in fact, such a qualification as to entitle him to remain upon the list where his name appeared, but possessed the qualification actually set out after his name. The appellant's name did not appear upon the alphabetical list of persons entitled to vote in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements of the rateable value of 12l. or upwards, which had been made out by the overseers under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 19, nor had he sent notice of claim to be placed thereon.

Held, that the revising barrister was empowered by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40, to correct the mistake by striking out the appellant's name and inserting it in the "separate list" under the heading where it should properly have appeared.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the county of Southampton, who stated the following case:

In the register of voters for the parish of Lyndhurst, in the Totton polling district for the county of Southampton, under the heading "voters in respect of property, including occupiers at a rent of 50l. and upwards," the name of John Ballard, the appellant, appeared in its alphabetical order.

In the third column, under the heading "nature of qualification," was inserted "occupier of house and land rated at 12l. and upwards."

Notice of objection was given to the name of the appellant being retained on the list, the objection being to the third column and to the nature of his qualification.

There were twelve other persons whose names appeared in this list in a similar manner, and with a qualification similar to that of the appellant, and of these seven had been objected to.

It was admitted that the appellant had not, in fact, such a qualification as to entitle him to be upon this list; but he had the qualification set out in the third column.

There was an alphabetical list of persons entitled to vote "in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements of the rateable value of 12l. or upwards." In this list the names of the appellant and the other twelve persons mentioned above did not appear, nor did he or they send notice of claim to be placed thereon before the 25th Aug., as provided by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 17.

It was contended that the appellant, possessing a qualification which would entitle him to vote, it was a mistake his name appearing in the first-mentioned list instead of in the 12l. occupiers' list, and that under 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40, this might be corrected by the revising barrister by striking the name of the appellant out of the list in which it appeared, and inserting it in the 12l. occupiers' list.

I was of opinion that I had no power to do this, and I struck out the name of the appellant and the seven other persons objected to, and refused to insert them in the 12l. occupiers' list.

Notice of appeal was given, and this case is stated at the request of the appellant and the other persons whose names were struck out, the appeals in whose cases are consolidated herewith.

If my decision was wrong, the names of the appellant and the seven other persons named in the schedule hereto are to be inserted in the list of persons "entitled in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements of the rateable value of 12l. or upwards."

Ridley (for the appellant).—This was a mistake which should have been corrected by the revising barrister. Sect. 40 of 6 Vict. c. 18 enacts that the barrister "shall correct any mistake which shall be proved to him to have been made in any list. . . . provided always that, whether any person shall be objected to or not, no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list of voters or claim, as the case may be; nor shall the barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same." Here the qualification is correctly stated, and the only defect is that it appears with the name under the wrong heading. It will be contended by the respondent that the section only enables the revising barrister to amend the register of voters, and not to transfer from one list to another; but this is a misapprehension. The list directed by sect. 19 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58 is in reality only a portion or subdivision of the whole list of voters, and that this is the meaning of the Act, is shown by the use of the words "list" and "lists" respectively in sects. 6, 7, 31, and 37. Until the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102) there was only one list for the barrister to amend, and sect. 59 of that Act provides that it shall be read, together with 6 Vict. c. 18; and, lastly, if the barrister is not empowered to amend the "separate list" directed in sect. 19 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, under section 40 of the earlier statute (6 Vict. c. 18), he has no power to touch it at all, since that is the only enactment giving him authority to correct mistakes.

Hooper (for the respondent).—This is not an application to correct a mistake in a list, but to transfer a name bodily from one list to another. An intending objector, looking for the appellant's name, would look under the proper heading, and, not finding it there, would be misled. He cited

Bennett v. Brumfitt, 19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 283; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 407;

Mather v. Overseers of Allandale, 23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 539; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 273.

DENMAN, J.—This objection turns mainly upon sect. 40 of the statute 6 Vict. c. 18, which enacts that the revising barrister shall correct any mistake which shall be proved to him to have been made in the list, with a proviso that no change shall be made in the description of the qualification. In the present case the name was on the register, and the list has been made out in such a way that it appears the voter is entitled to his vote by virtue of the 50*l.* qualification, the real fact being that he is not entitled by that, but by virtue of the 12*l.* qualification. The objection has been taken on the ground that his name has been put in the wrong place—in the list of those entitled under the 50*l.* qualification instead of that of the tenants or occupiers of lands or tenements rated at 12*l.* The question is whether that objection is fatal; whether the revising barrister must disallow the vote, because the subsequent statute, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, provides that there shall be separate lists of the 50*l.* and the 12*l.* voters. It appears to me that this is a mere play upon words. There is nothing in the statute to that effect. It enacts that there shall be a separate list of the 12*l.* voters; but not a separate list in this sense, that it shall cease to be, or not be, a portion of the voters for the particular parish or district. I think it would be a statute, if that were its meaning, imposing a duty on the overseers, or enabling them to perform a function which might be most unjust in its operation, i.e., the power of disqualifying the voters by placing them in the wrong list. It is not necessary to construe sect. 40 of the Act (6 Vict. c. 18) in that manner. Its natural meaning is that the revising barrister shall correct any mistake in any list of voters, no matter of how many portions that list may consist. There is nothing in it to say that a man whose qualification is truly described in any part of the list shall be disfranchised, because the barrister is tied hand and foot, so as not to be able to transfer a name from one part of the list to another. As his decision was given simply upon that question, I think that the barrister took a limited view of his powers, and that the correction should have been made. The appeal must be allowed.

C.P. Div.]

SMITH v. WALTON.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the true construction of the powers of correction which are given by sect. 40 of the statute 6 Vict. c. 18. I think that that section applies not to that separate list which is made under the later statute by itself, but to that separate list as part of the original list, and that the barrister cannot have exercised his power rightly. Here we have a list of persons entitled to vote by virtue of the 50*l.* qualification, and by virtue of the 12*l.* qualification. It is unquestionably the duty of the overseers to keep these lists separate, and to make them as accurate as they can. But the real object of giving the barrister power to amend at all is to give him power to correct mistakes of this sort, made by the overseers. Anyone looking at this list will find the name of this man and his qualification correctly stated, and can object to the vote if he chooses. That such an intending objector may have been misled is not a sufficient answer, and I think this amendment ought to have been made.

Decision reversed.

SMITH v. WALTON. (a)

Truck Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37)—Payment of wages otherwise than in current coin—Artificer's wages.

On the hearing of an information under sect. 9 of the Truck Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), the following facts were proved before the justices:

*The respondent was a cotton manufacturer, and the appellant a power-loom weaver in his employ. A complaint was made by the respondent's manager to the appellant of a defect in a piece of cloth woven by him, and he was cautioned; but at the end of the week received his full wages without abatement. In the following week a similar defect was discovered in another piece of cloth woven by the appellant; and the appellant was told by the respondent's book-keeper—first, that something would have to be deducted from his wages for the defective pieces of cloth, or that he would have to take the piece of cloth home; and, on a second occasion, that he would have to take one of the pieces of cloth home, and that there were no wages for him. The appellant ultimately took away one of the damaged pieces of cloth, the value of which in a perfect condition was 1*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, and left the respondent's employ at the end of the week following that in which the dispute had arisen. The full wages earned by him during that time were 2*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, of which amount 1*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* was earned during the week in which the last damaged piece was delivered, and 18*s.* 8*d.* during the last week. On applying for his wages he received 1*l.* in cash and retained the damaged piece of cloth.*

Held (reversing the decision of the justices), that the facts above disclosed amounted to a payment of wages in goods, and that the Truck Act had been infringed.

APPEAL from the decision of two of the justices of the borough of Burnley, dismissing an information under the Truck Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 9). The following case was stated by the justices:

CASE.

1. At a petty sessions holden at the sessions-room in Burnley, in and for the said borough, on the thirteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, an information preferred by Thomas Smith, hereinafter called the appellant, against James Walton, hereinafter called the respondent, under sect. 9 of the Act 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37, commonly called the Truck Act, charging for that he, the said James Walton, on the tenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, at the said borough, then being the employer of the said Thomas Smith, the complainant, an artificer employed in the manufacture of cotton, unlawfully did, by the agency of one John Walton, his servant, or book-keeper, pay to the said Thomas Smith, certain wages then due and payable in respect of such employment by the said James Walton to the said Thomas Smith, to wit, 18*s.* 8*d.*, otherwise than in the current coin of the realm, to wit, in a piece of cotton cloth, contrary to the provisions of the Act to prohibit the payment of wages in goods, was heard and determined by us, the said Thomas Smith being then present, and the said James Walton not appearing but being represented by his solicitor, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information.

2. And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, hath pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid, for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

3. Now, therefore, we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case:

4. Upon the hearing of the information it was found and proved that the respondent was a cotton manufacturer in the borough of Burnley, and that the appellant of the age of nineteen years was a power-loom weaver in his employment.

5. That on Wednesday, Feb. 28 last, the appellant delivered in the warehouse of the respondent a piece of cotton cloth which the appellant had woven in the respondent's shed. That day was the day up to and including which the week's wages of the weavers were reckoned, and called the making-up day, and the piece of cloth was included in the making-up or calculating the wages of the appellant for that week. No complaint was made as to the weaving of the piece of cloth that day, as it was not examined by the respondent's manager until the following day, and it is not the practice of the respondent to examine the pieces of cloth delivered by the weavers at the time they are delivered by them in his warehouse.

6. On the following day, Thursday, the 1st of March, a complaint was made to the appellant by the respondent's son (Robert Walton) who manages the respondent's mills; he said to the appellant that it would not do to let such like pieces as that pass—it was not worth twopence; but that, as the appellant was a new weaver, he would not like to discharge him, and he must mind for the future. That was all that was said at that time. The ground of complaint of the respondent's son, Robert Walton, was, that the piece of cloth was damaged by the existence in it of what is known as a "float" at the side of the piece of cloth. A "float" is caused by the warp not being woven into the cloth, and the weft passing underneath the warp instead of being woven into the warp. The piece of cloth was produced in court. The "float" was caused by the negligence of the appellant. The "float" was seen by the respondent's manager on Thursday, the 1st of March, before the appellant got his wages. Friday, the 2nd of March, was the payday for that week, and on that day the appellant received his wages including the full wages for the weaving of the damaged piece. No abatement in appellant's wages was made in respect of that piece.

7. On Saturday, the 3rd of March last, the appellant delivered another piece of cloth in the warehouse that was woven in a different loom, and was of a different class of cloth. On the 5th of March last the respondent's book-keeper, John Walton, complained to the appellant that there was a "float" in the middle of the last-mentioned piece of cloth, and that the appellant would have to have something deducted from his wages for that "float," and for the "float" in the first-mentioned piece of cloth also, or that he would have to take the piece of cloth home. The appellant said that he would leave, meaning that he would leave at once the respondent's service, and the book-keeper said that he would not have to do so. On the Tuesday following (the 6th of March last) the appellant again saw John Walton, respondent's book-keeper, and asked him what he was going to stop out of his wages for the piece, and he replied that he would have to take one of the pieces of cloth home. To this the appellant made no reply. On the 7th of March (the following day) the appellant gave one week's notice of his intention to leave the respondent's service. That was the day for making up the wages for that week, and up to that time the appellant had earned 18s. 8½d. as that week's wages. On Friday, March 9, the appellant went to the respondent's office for his wages, and saw John Walton, the book-keeper, and asked him for his wages, but did not receive them. John Walton said that the appellant "would have to take the piece home, and there were no wages for him." The appellant said if "there were no wages he would leave the piece;" that was the piece produced in court. On the following day, Saturday, March 10, in consequence of the recommendation of the Weavers' Union, the appellant went to the respondent's warehouse, and again saw John Walton, and asked for the piece, which he received and took away with him. The appellant did not receive anything that day in cash. The appellant left the respondent's employment on the 14th day of March last, in pursuance of the notice he had given; at that time the appellant would have earned as wages, if all his work had been properly done, 1l. 2s. 6½d. for the week then last past, and for the previous week 18s. 8½d.

8. The appellant retained the piece of damaged cloth, and on the 16th March he again went for his wages, and saw the respondent's manager, Robert Walton, and received from him 1l., the sum of 2s. 6½d. was retained out of his wages last earned, because there was not sufficient owing to the appellant for the previous week's wages to pay for the damaged piece of cloth which the appellant had taken. That would be 18s. 8½d. for the first week's wages, and 2s. 8½d. deducted from the last week's wages, making together the sum of 1l. 1s. 3d., the value of the piece of cloth. The appellant had on the 14th March ascertained from the respondent's book-keeper that the value of the damaged piece was 1l. 1s. 3d. After the commencement of the action in the County Court hereinafter referred to, Edward Nuttall, the out-looker of the respondent, went to the appellant's house and suggested to him that the respondent would pay him his wages if the appellant would return the piece of cloth; to which the appellant replied that the respondent should come to him himself. On the 16th March, when the appellant went again to the respondent for his wages, he did not ask the respondent to take the piece again.

9. The appellant commenced an action against the respondent in the County Court at Burnley for 1l. 1s. 3d., and on 3rd May last, when the case came on for hearing, the case was adjourned for the production of the piece of cloth, and to ascertain what damage was done. The case was finally heard by the County Court judge on 7th June last, when it was agreed between the parties that the appellant should give up the piece of cloth to the respondent, and receive his wages less the amount of the actual damage done.

The justices were of opinion that the offence charged was not of the class of offences contemplated by the statute, and dismissed the information. The question upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court is, whether that decision is right.

By sect. 3 of the Truck Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37) it is enacted that "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer, in any of the trades hereinafter enumerated, in respect of any labour by him done in any such trade, shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise; and that every payment made to any such artificer by his employer or in respect of any such wages, by the delivery to him of goods, or otherwise than in current coin, shall be and is thereby declared illegal, null, and void.

Sect. 23 of the same Act permits certain stoppages or deductions from the wages of an artificer for medical attendance, materials, tools, food, fuel, and similar purposes, provided that such stoppage or deduction shall not exceed the real and true value of the articles supplied, and that the agreement or contract for the deduction shall be in writing, and signed by the artificer.

Sect. 9 of the Act, under which the information was laid (inter alia), imposes upon any employer who shall make any payment by the Act declared illegal a penalty for the first offence not exceeding ten pounds nor less than five pounds, and sect. 10 provides that such penalty may be sued for before two justices having jurisdiction where the offence was committed, by a common informer.

Cave, Q.C. (R. S. Wright with him) for the appellant.—The Truck Act has been infringed. The whole wages for one week, and a portion of the wages for the next, were paid for in damaged cloth, which the workman had to take at the price fixed by the employer. It is immaterial that the appellant had an option to take cash, deducting only the amount of the damage done, if he had that option, which is not clear: (Wilson v. Cookson, 8 L. T. Rep. N.S. 53; 32 L. J. 177, M. C.) [Grove, J.—They deducted the value that the piece would have borne had it not been defective, and not its actual value as damaged. That may have been nothing to them.] It cannot be assumed that they gave it to him, and, as a matter of fact, the damage done was trifling. The County Court judge had jurisdiction to adjust and set off this damage under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, s. 3. He also cited Archer v. James (31 L. J. Q.B. 153).

The respondent did not appear.

Grove, J.—I regret that no one has appeared to argue this case on the other side, but have come to the conclusion that the decision must be reversed. I had some doubt at first with regard to the fact that the amount really deducted—as I use the word deducted—was the full value of the piece of cloth, assuming it not to have been damaged; and I thought it uncertain whether the real arrangement was not this, that the creditor—whether rightly or wrongly is immaterial—instead of deducting the actual value, and therefore paying him with the damaged piece of cloth, had treated the damaged piece as worthless, and given him leave to take it away, stopping from his wages the full amount that it ought to have been worth. I should hesitate before saying that that would have come within the Truck Act, as it is to my mind clearly arguable whether that would be paying him in cloth. But, upon looking more minutely into it, it does appear to me that the real contract between the parties was that the value of the cloth should be deducted, and that the intention in giving the workman the cloth to take away with him was that a certain amount of wages should be satisfied with it. The case states that the respondent's book-keeper complained to the appellant that there was a "float" in the middle of the cloth, and that the appellant would have to have something deducted from his wages for that "float," and for the "float" in the first-mentioned piece of cloth. But then it goes on to add, "or that he would have to take the piece of cloth home." On the Tuesday following the appellant asked the respondent's book-keeper what he was going to stop out of his wages for the piece, and the reply was that he would have to take one of the pieces home, to which the appellant made no answer. First, then, the question is asked, what has to be deducted? next he is told that he will have to take one piece home; lastly, he does take it, and his wages are adjusted on the footing that that was a payment for his wages. Now, if that piece of cloth had been assessed at its actual value as a damaged piece, I should have had no doubt. It is taken at a value exceeding its actual value, but still they have deducted from his wages a certain amount, treating the receipt of the damaged cloth as part payment. They say, in effect, "You may take the damaged piece home, and then you shall set it off against the damage done at our valuation." That is, I think, against the spirit and letter of the Act; and, though the man could have repudiated the arrangement, and refused to take the damaged piece home, yet it is offered and taken as a thing to be deducted from his wages. It was not taken, it is true, in a way which one can approve of; but, even though this may have been something in the nature of a trick, and we may think it rather a shabby thing, yet, having regard to the terms of the Act itself, and to the specified exceptions in which a set-off is permissible, which show that a set-off cannot be allowed upon any other terms, we must come to the conclusion that the transaction was within the prohibition of the statute. The decision must be reversed.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to understand the substance of the transaction, we must look to the state of facts at the end of the second week, when the workman had earned altogether 2*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, and the appellant paid him in cash 1*l.*, and nothing more. The arrangement was not, however, that they were to give him so much, and leave him to sue for the rest, but they had also given him a piece of goods which he had spoilt, and which they valued at 1*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* In substance, then, they did pay him his wages in goods to the extent of 1*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, and in cash only to the extent of 1*l.* That is certainly within the prohibition of the Truck Act. Or looking at it in another way, they assumed, with regard to the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.*, which they deducted from his wages for the second week, to exercise a right of set-off, which by the provisions of the Truck Act they had not a right to do. In either light they must be regarded as having transgressed the Act, and the decision must therefore be reversed. Decision reversed.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

June 11 and 18.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. LAMPLOUGH, (a)

Duty on medicines—Mineral waters—Beverage recommended for medicinal properties—Effect of repeal of a part of a statute—52 Geo. 3, c. 150—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20.

By 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, any persons vending any of the preparations set out in the schedule of the Act, without stamped wrappers as prescribed by the Act, were made liable to a penalty. The schedule contained a list of preparations with a general clause at the end, one item in the list being as follows: "Waters, videlicet, all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state, to be used for the purpose of compounding or making any of the said waters." The general words at the end of the schedule were, "And also all other powders . . . waters . . . to be used or applied externally or internally as medicines, for the prevention, cure, &c., of any disorder . . . or which shall be recommended to the public by the makers . . . as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder . . ."

By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20, so much of the schedule of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, as was contained under the head "waters" was repealed.

Lamplough's Pyretic Saline was composed of carbonate of soda, tartaric acid, and a small quantity of chlorate of potash. It was sold by the defendant in the form of a powder without a stamp, and, when mixed with water, was drunk as a mineral water as a beverage, though it was also recommended and advertised by him as a valuable medicine, the medicinal property being afforded solely by the chlorate of potash.

Upon an information for a penalty against the defendant under 52 Geo. 3 c. 150, Held, by Cleasby and Huddleston, BB. (Kelly, C.B., dissentient): First: That before the passing of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, the preparation was taxable under the general clause of the schedule, and not under the item "waters," and that, therefore, independently of all question as to the effect of the repealing statute, the preparation still fell within that clause. Secondly, assuming that it was originally taxable under the item "waters," and not under the general clause, its taxability was not taken away by the repeal of that item; but that after that repeal, 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, must be read as though the item "waters" had never existed, in which case the preparation would clearly be taxable under the general clause as a water recommended as a medicine.

INFORMATION for a penalty under 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, for the sale by the defendant of a preparation entitled "Lamplough's Pyretic Saline" without a stamp or payment of duty as required by the Act.

At the trial before Cleasby, B. and a special jury the following facts were proved or admitted.

Pyretic Saline was composed of the following ingredients: Tartaric acid 45·7, Bicarbonate of soda 52·4, and chlorate of potash 1·9. It was sold as a powder, and with water drunk as a beverage; but it was also recommended on the wrappers and by advertisement as being beneficial as a medicine and curative for fevers and other disorders, and it was admitted that it was, in fact, a very valuable medicine. The chlorate of potash was admittedly not a mineral alkali; and had no part in the effervescing properties of the mixture which was afforded by the other two ingredients forming together carbonic acid gas, but the medicinal quality of the saline was given by the chlorate of potash, which is used as a medicine for fevers.

Upon these facts the verdict was entered for the Crown, with leave to the defendant to move to enter it for him on the ground that on the above facts he was not liable to a penalty under 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, when read in conjunction with 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20. (a)

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard) and Dicey for the Crown. — The pyretic saline is not a mineral water at all, within the meaning of the words "waters, videlicet," &c. It is recommended as a medicine, and besides carbonic acid gas contains chlorate of potash. The preparations under the head "waters" were intended only to mean beverages. This is clearly shown by sect. 4,

(a) By 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, s. 2, any person, whether licensed or not, vending medicine set forth in the schedule annexed to the Act without paper covers provided by the commissioners of stamps were made liable to a penalty of 10*l*.

Sect. 4 excepted victuallers, confectioners, pastry-cooks, fruiterers, and other shopkeepers, selling artificial or other waters mentioned in the schedule and drunk on their premises, from taking out a licence for the sale, provided such waters were sold with covers, wrappers, or labels duly stamped.

The schedule referred to set out a number of quack medicines, cosmetics, pills, and other articles, one item being as follows: "Waters, videlicet, all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state, to be used for the purpose of compounding or making any of the said waters," and at the end, or "tail of the schedule" as the court, for convenience, termed it, followed these general words: And also all other pills, powders . . . tinctures, potions, cordials, &c., medicated herbs and waters, chemical and official preparations, whatsoever, to be used or applied externally or internally as medicines or medicaments for the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder or complaints incident to or in any wise affecting the human body, made, prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale, by any person or persons whatsoever, wherein the person making, preparing, uttering, vending, or exposing for sale the same hath, or claims to have, any occult secret, or art for the making or preparing the same, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale, under the authorities of any letters patent under the great seal, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be by any public notice or advertisements, or by any written or printed papers or handbills, or by any label or words written or printed, affixed to or delivered with any packet, box, bottle, phial, or other inclosure containing the same, held out or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors, proprietors thereof as nostrums or proprietary medicines, or as specifics, or as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any distemper, malady, ailment, disorder, or complaint incident to or in anywise affecting the human body.

By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20, so much of the schedule of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, as is contained under the head of "waters," was repealed.

[EX. DIV.]

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LAMPLOUGH.

[EX. DIV.]

which exempts dealers in such waters from taking out a licence where they are drunk on the premises. That being so, it never was taxable under the item "waters," but was, and is taxable, under the general words at the tail of the schedule as a water recommended as a medicine. But assuming that it might have been taxable under the item "waters," it is also taxable under the general words of the tail; and is so now, for the Act must be read as though that item never existed, and looking at the Act as it now stands, it clearly falls within the general clause. The court cannot go outside the Act to seek for its interpretation, but must read the Act as it now stands in the revised statutes, where this item "waters" does not appear.

Herschell, Q.C. and Cooper for the defendant.—The whole of the schedule to the Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, is applicable to medicines. This is clear when the previous Act of 44 Geo. 3, c. 98, is looked at. The schedule only taxes certain beverages because they are used as medicine. "Waters, &c." therefore applies to medicinal waters. The repealing statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20, is therefore co-extensive with the enacting Act, and the court must look at the state of the part repealed statute to understand what the repealing statute is meant to repeal. The pyretic saline would clearly have fallen within the item "waters" as an artificial mineral water impregnated with carbonic acid gas. It is said it is not so, because it contains other ingredients, but that cannot affect the express words of the statute. If that contention were right, a man by putting another ingredient into his preparation might escape taxation altogether. The pyretic saline clearly fell within that class, and not within the general words. That item is repealed, and the tax is therefore taken off it.

The Solicitor-General in reply.

Our. adv. vult.

HUDDESTON, B.—This case was tried before Cleasby, B., when, upon the facts proved, the verdict was entered for the Crown. Mr. Herschell then moved to set aside the verdict pursuant to leave reserved, and to enter it for the defendant, and the question was whether, with reference to the statute of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20, the pyretic saline was liable to duty. The statute of 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, imposed, in sect. 1, certain duties on articles mentioned in the schedule, and there is in that schedule a list of articles alphabetically arranged, with a general clause at the end. In this alphabetical list was found the following items: "Waters, videlicet—all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state, to be used for the purpose of compoundng or making any of the said waters." And at the end of the schedule came the general clause: "And also all other pills, powders, lozenges . . . and waters . . . to be used or applied externally or internally as medicines or medicaments for the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder or complaint . . . wherein the person making, preparing, &c., the same have or claims to have, any exclusive right or title to the making the same . . . or which have heretofore been or now are or shall be by any public notice or advertisement, or by any label affixed to . . . any parcel, box, &c., containing the same, held out or recommended by the makers as nostrums or specifics, or as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any disorder, complaint, &c." The schedule, therefore, includes a quantity of nostrums, pills, and other things, by name, and all other pills, &c., within the general words at the end. That was the state of things up to the year 1833. It may, however, be mentioned that by sect. 4 of that Act retail vendors were enabled to sell articles therein mentioned, if they were sold on the premises without this duty. Now in 1833 the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, was passed, sect. 20 of which repealed those words under the heading "waters." The effect of that is to cut out, as it were, of the schedule of 52 Geo. 3, those words, "Waters—videlicet, &c." The argument of Mr. Herschell was that Lamplough's Pyretic Saline was only taxable under those words, and that when those words were repealed the effect would be that the taxability of the pyretic saline would be taken away, and that for the future pyretic saline might be sold without paying duty, or without any stamp on the bottles; and he urged that if the pyretic saline were within those words during the existence of the Act of Geo. 3, it could not be within the general words at the tail of the schedule, and that when those words are cut out from the Act the pyretic saline cannot afterwards be made taxable under the general words. We have, then, to consider the effect of the repealing statute, and I am of opinion that the effect of that is that these words in the schedule to the Act of 52 Geo. 3, are, as it were, taken out of the schedule, and that after 1833 the statute must be read in every respect as if those words were not in it. If that be so, then it is clear that the Pyretic Saline would come within the words as they now stand in the tail of the schedule. Am I right in supposing that that is the effect of repealing a statute? Mr. Herschell said that, supposing a statute was passed to the effect that one item, for instance, "Arquebus Waters," was repealed, that item could not come within the general words. My answer is, if that was the intention of the legislature, they would say so in express words. My opinion as to the effect of repealing a statute is not without authority. See the cases of Kay v. Goodwin (6 Bing. 576), Surtess v. Ellison (9 B. & C. 752). If, therefore, I look at the present revised statute, I take it these words are clearly out of the statute, and it is obvious that the Pyretic Saline comes within the tail of the schedule. But that is assuming, which I have been doing for the purpose of argument, that the Pyretic Saline might not have been included in the words "waters, videlicet." I think that it really would not come within those words at all, but within the general words at the tail of the schedule, in which case, of course, without any reference to the repealing statute, it would clearly be taxable. I think that "waters" include things such as soda water, Malvern water, Apollinaris water, and those general waters which are popularly used as beverages. It never was intended to mean medicines. On both grounds, therefore, I think that our judgment should be for the Crown.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion as my brother Huddleston. Taking the Act as it now stands, the part repealed being struck out, and, construing the words in the ordinary way, there is no doubt that duty would be chargeable. There is a schedule in the Act enumerating several articles with general words at the tail. The whole argument of the defendant is that we must not take the Act as it now stands, because we must recollect that the statute was formerly different to what it is now. The argument of the Crown is that you must take the Act as it stands, in which case the enumeration in the body of the schedule has nothing to do with pyretic saline, but the tail as it now stands clearly comprehends it as a chemical preparation to be taken internally, and recommended as a medicine for the cure of disease. The defendant's answer to this is that the effect of dealing with the statute in that way would be such that if a specific item, say, asthmatic drops, were repealed, the duty would still be revived by the general words "drops" in the tail. This reasoning is erroneous. It assumes the Legislature to deal with a specific item in this way by repealing it singly; but that ought not to be assumed without more. The particular item "waters" in the body of the schedule, and in the general words or tail are different things. The item "waters" had been dealt with exceptionally in sect. 4, where it was enacted that as regards waters mentioned in the schedule it should not be necessary for any victualler, confectioner, pastry cook, fruiterer, or other shopkeeper who shall only sell any of the artificial or other waters mentioned in the schedule to be drunk in his or her house or shop to take out a licence for that purpose; they were only bound to sell stamped bottles. It is clear that these waters would be beverages. In dealing afterwards with "waters" which only require to be impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and which would be such as could be sold by victuallers, the language of absolute repeal would be appropriate, because the word "other" would still appear to retain the same meaning, and would include curative waters recommended as such as distinguished from waters merely impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and made taxable merely because they are so. The item "waters" in the schedule may be read as an enactment that all waters shall be taxable if impregnated with mineral alkali or carbonic acid gas, and afterwards the enactment is repealed, and "waters" are not taxable if or because so impregnated. This mode of reading it removes all difficulty. The whole argument depends on the Legislature having made use of the word "repeal." That the effect of repeal by the Legislature is to blot out what is repealed as if it never existed, as regards transactions subsequent to the Act, is shown in the strongest manner by Tindal, C.J. and Tenterden, C.J., and I only refer to authority in order to show that, Tindal, C.J. in Kny v. Goodwin (6 Bing. 582) said, "I take the effect of repealing a statute to be, to obliterate it as completely from the records of the Parliament as if it had never passed, and it must be considered as a law that never existed, except for the purpose of those actions which were commenced, prosecuted, and concluded whilst it was an existing law," and in Surtess v. Ellison (9 B. & C. 752), Tenterden, C.J. said, "It has been long established that, when an Act of Parliament is repealed, it must be considered (except as to transactions past and closed) as if it had never existed. That is the general rule, and we must not destroy that by indulging in conjectures as to the intention of the Legislature." In the present case it appears to me that this meaning was intended to be given to the repeal, to obliterate it from the Act as if it had never passed, and it is not a sufficient reason that we should do otherwise, because in a different case which might be put it might be reasonable to depart from the usual rule. There is this apparent difficulty in our reading it in this way, that this reading gives a different meaning to the word "other" from what it had before. There are two answers to this. First, I am by no means satisfied that a different meaning is given, and I am sure that the Legislature have said that a different meaning is to be given to that word by the obliteration of the item "water." I am therefore of opinion that our judgment should be for the Crown.

[Ex. Div.]

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LAMPLOUGH.

KELLY, C.B.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brothers in this case; were it not for that I should say without any kind of doubt that the preparation called Lamplough's Pyretic Saline is not subject to duty under the Act of Parliament which we are discussing. In my opinion the fallacy in the argument of the Crown consists in confounding two things essentially different, viz., confounding an Act of Parliament with a particular clause in an Act, and in confounding one kind of preparation with a class of preparations. If we keep this distinction well in mind, there is no difficulty in this case. The state of the law in 1833 was this. By 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, a large number of articles, in all about 600, of one kind or another, some undoubtedly medicines, and others other than medicines, such as cosmetics, were made liable to duty. These 600 preparations were by the schedule to that Act expressly and specifically made liable to duty, and then follows the tail or general words of the schedule by which a quantity of other articles not enumerated in the foregoing list of the 600 preparations are also made subject to the same duty. In other words two classes of articles or preparations are made taxable; the one expressly enumerated in an alphabetical list, the other coming under the general words or tail of the schedule. Among the specified articles is this: "waters, videlicet—all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state, to be used for the purpose of compounding or making any of the said waters." The first question here then, and one which pervades the whole case, is this—What is the effect of these two clauses, the alphabetical list and the tail, taken together? I cannot, in the first place, entertain a doubt that the articles made taxable by the tail are different from the 600 articles specifically enumerated. Some meaning must be given to the word "other" in the tail, and the only meaning that can be given to it is that the articles in the tail are "other" than those already enumerated. It is clear to me when you look at the two clauses together that this is the meaning to be given to the tail or general words of the schedule. That being so, the question arises as to whether the pyretic saline is taxable under the item "waters" or under the tail. It is said that it never came within the item "waters" at all. But it is impregnated with carbonic acid gas. How, then, in the name of common sense

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS.

[Ex. Div.]

can it be said that it is not taxable under the head "waters?" for the words of the schedule are, "waters, videlicet, waters impregnated with soda, or with carbolic acid gas." It is said that the pyretic saline is taken out of that description, because one of its ingredients is chlorate of potash. But what has that to do with it; how can that fact alter the express words of the statute? It may be impregnated with a hundred other ingredients, but the fact remains the same that it is impregnated with carbonic acid gas within the definition of the item "waters." I will not depart from the express words of an act to enter into speculations of what might have been added or omitted. I find by the Act that waters impregnated with carbonic acid gas are expressly made liable to duty: what right, then, have I to set aside that enactment simply because there is another ingredient besides that one? I, therefore, hold that this pyretic saline was liable to duty with the other 599 articles expressly mentioned, and was not taxable under the tail of the schedule. Before proceeding to consider the question of repeal, I will say one word as to sect. 4. That may apply to some of these waters, but it only goes to relieve from liability to duty a certain class of dealers in respect of some of the articles included under the head "waters." Well, then, that being the state of the law up to Aug. 1833, we now come to the repealing statute (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97), s. 20. The effect of that Act was not to repeal the former Act, but a very small part of it, viz., the words "waters, &c."; and the question is, what is the effect of that repeal? The effect of it is clearly this, if "waters impregnated with soda or carbonic acid gas" were before under the schedule liable to duty, they are to be no longer taxable under that schedule. Assuming, then, that the pyretic saline would have been formerly taxable under that head, by this repealing section that taxability is altogether taken away. The Crown, to make out their case, must contend for this extraordinary proposition, that, although the repealing Act expressly says that waters of this description shall not be taxed as "waters," yet these waters can still be taxed under another clause of the taxing Act. You have only to substitute the word "clause" for "act" or "statute" in the dicta which have been quoted of Tenterden, C.J., and Tindal, C.J., to make them applicable to the present case. Adopting, then, the words of Tindal, C.J., this clause is to be taken as though the item "waters" had never existed. If that be so this pyretic saline, falling as it does within that item, never was subject to taxation. But no one could say that where a particular clause is repealed it is to be taken as though the whole Act had never been enacted; it is to be taken as though this particular clause had never existed. What then results from this? The tail of the schedule has the same effect as it had at the time it was passed; at that time it did not include such a water as this; therefore it does not include it now. I may go on to say that the same fallacy exists in the confounding of one article with a class of articles. In conclusion, then, I think that the liability of these waters was put an end to by the Act of 1833, and that these waters then ceased to be taxable; and on these grounds I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant; but as I am in a minority, the judgment of the Court must be for the Crown.

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS. (a).

Libel—Calling a man "a convicted felon"—Calling an editor of a newspaper "a felon editor"—Action for—Justification, that he had been previously convicted—Statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, sect. 3.

The calling a man who is the editor of a newspaper "a felon editor" is the same as calling him "a felon," and to call a person who has been at some former time convicted of felony, and has undergone the punishment to which he was sentenced, "a felon," is actionable inasmuch as by sect. 3 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, "the punishment so endured hath the like effects and consequences as a pardon under the Great Seal as to the felony whereof the offender was so convicted," and therefore he is thereby restored to his original status, and made "as it were, a new man with a new capacity and credit."

Seemle, that it would be equally actionable to say of such a person, "he is a convicted felon;" for, though reading the words favourably for the defendants, it might be said they only mean that the plaintiff had at some former time been convicted of felony, yet they ought not to be so read, nor should the court "favour idle and injurious words" which attach the infamy of felony, and would import that the man had not been pardoned.

A slanderer should take care to be within the truth; and, had the defendants written of the plaintiff that he had formerly committed a felony, or had been convicted of felony, that would have been strictly true, and could have been justified; and the distinction is not a verbal one merely, for the two statements would have a different effect.

So held by the Enchequer Division (Olesby and Pollock, BB.), on the authority of Cuddington v. Wilkins (Hob. Rep., pp. 67 and 81) and Hawk. P.O., book 2, c. 37, s. 48, and cases there cited.

THIS was an action for libel brought by the plaintiff against the defendants under the circumstances set forth in the following pleadings:

Statement of Claim:

1. The plaintiff resides at Dartmouth, in the county of Devon, and is the proprietor and editor of a newspaper published there, and called the Dartmouth Advertiser.

2. The defendants are, and at the time of the publications hereinafter mentioned were, the proprietors, printers, and publishers of a newspaper called the Western Daily Mercury, the head publishing office of which is at Plymouth, in the said county of Devon, and which also has branch publishing offices in Devonport, in the said county, and in the city of Exeter.

3. The defendants, or some or one of them, also edit and write for the said newspaper.

4. The defendants in their said paper called the Western Daily Mercury, dated on the 24th day of April 1876, wrote, printed, and published certain words, which words (omitting for the sake of brevity certain words appearing in the original at the place marked with asterisks) were as follows:

"The narrative must be deferred till next week. . . . The history of the Advertiser too must stand over . . . its present editor is a convicted felon. The case in which a certain John Leyman, printer, was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing feathers—a case of which Mr. Foster may have heard,

(a) Reported by H. LIND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS.

since he is so familiar with the chief actor—will be reproduced."

5. The defendants in their said newspaper called the Western Daily Mercury, dated the 6th day of May 1870, wrote, printed, and published certain words, which words (omitting for the sake of brevity certain words not personally relating to the plaintiff, and appearing in the original at the places marked with asterisks) were as follows:

"There still remain to be recorded Mr. Foster's controversies with the Town Council of Dartmouth . . . and the facts regarding his newspaper (meaning the plaintiff's said newspaper the Dartmouth Advertiser), and its bankrupt and felon 'editor' (meaning the plaintiff). The narrative must be deferred till next week. It is worth the telling."

6. The words set out in paragraphs 4 and 5 were written, printed, and published by the defendants of and concerning the plaintiff, and were so written, printed and published falsely and maliciously, and with a libellous and defamatory sense and meaning.

7. The said words so set forth in paragraphs 4 and 5 were also so falsely and maliciously written, printed, and published of and concerning the plaintiff in his business and calling of a printer and newspaper editor, and his said occupation as proprietor and editor of the said Dartmouth Advertiser newspaper.

8. In consequence of the publications set forth in the fourth and fifth paragraphs, the circulation of the plaintiff's said newspaper, the Dartmouth Advertiser, has already been greatly injured and has much decreased, and will be still further injured and decreased. The plaintiff has also already experienced difficulty in getting supplied with news and obtaining persons to be his correspondents, and will experience still further difficulty in getting supplied with news and obtaining persons to correspond with him. In particular, one Mr. Robt. Dart, of Cherriton Ferrers, in the county of Devon, and one Mr. Robt. Harris, of Totnes, also in the county of Devon, who both had respectively supplied the plaintiff and his said newspaper with news and acted as correspondents to the plaintiff's said newspaper, in consequence of the said publications refused and declined any longer so to act. The value of the goodwill of the plaintiff's said newspaper has, in consequence of the matters hereinbefore appearing, become and is greatly lessened.

The plaintiff claims:

1. 1000*l.* damages.
2. An injunction to restrain the defendants from similar publications in future.
3. Such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

Statement of Defence:

1. The defendants do not admit that the plaintiff is the proprietor and editor of the Dartmouth Advertiser newspaper.

2. The defendants do not admit the allegations in paragraphs 6, 7, and 8 of the statement of claim.

3. The defendants deny that the word "bankrupt" in the quotation from their said newspaper, in the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim set out was intended to or did refer to the plaintiff.

4. And the defendants further say that the plaintiff has been convicted of felony, and was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing feathers.

5. The words in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the statement of claim complained of were and are part of certain articles printed and published in the defendants said newspaper, each of which articles was and is a fair and bona fide comment upon the conduct of the plaintiff in his public character and as the nominal editor and proprietor of the Dartmouth Advertiser, a public newspaper, and was printed and published by the defendants as and for such comment, and without any malicious motive or intent whatever.

Reply and Demurrer:

1. The plaintiff joins issue upon the first, second, and fifth paragraphs of the defendants' statement of defence.

2. As to the third paragraph of the statement of defence, the plaintiff admits the allegations in such third paragraph contained.

3. As to the fourth paragraph of the said statement of defence, the plaintiff (so that such admission be not in any way extended or taken to mean that he ever was, in fact, guilty of the offence referred to) admits the allegations contained in such fourth paragraph. But the plaintiff further says that he has never been convicted of felony save on that one occasion, which is the occasion mentioned in the said third paragraph of the statement of defence. On that occasion he was convicted of the supposed felony by a court duly having jurisdiction in that behalf, the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Cornwall; and the said court, having jurisdiction as aforesaid, in the exercise of such jurisdiction, adjudged that, as a punishment for the said supposed felony, the plaintiff should be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for twelve calendar months. The said conviction took place several years ago, and the plaintiff, as the defendants well knew, duly endured the punishment to which he was so adjudged as aforesaid, for the said supposed felony, and thereby became, and was, and has ever since been, and is, in the same situation as if a pardon under the Great Seal had been granted to him as to the said supposed felony whereof he was convicted as aforesaid.

4. The plaintiff demurs to the said fourth paragraph of the statement of defence, on the ground that, while the statement of defence admits the publication of the whole of the libels alleged in the statement of claim, and the said paragraph is pleaded to the whole of the said libels, and a part of the libel charges that the plaintiff is a convicted felon, nevertheless the said fourth paragraph contains nothing which justifies or is otherwise a defence to that portion of the said libel; and the plaintiff also demurs upon other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

Demurrer by the defendants to the third paragraph of the plaintiff's reply.

Upon the action coming on for trial before Blackburn, J., at the summer assizes for Devonshire in 1876, at Exeter, a jury could not be procured, and his Lordship, after a short argument of counsel on both sides, and without any evidence being taken, expressed his opinion to be in favour of the defendants, on the ground that the statement in the alleged libel that the plaintiff had been convicted of felony was strictly true, and that the plaintiff therefore was incapacitated from maintaining his action; but his Lordship postponed giving judgment with costs for the defendant until the fourth day of the next Michaelmas sittings. In November last the plaintiff moved for and obtained an order in the Exchequer Division that the defendants should show cause why the decision of the learned judge at the trial in favour of the defendants that the action was not maintainable should not be set aside and a new trial had, on the grounds that, on the facts stated in the pleadings and taken as admitted, the decision of the learned judge ought to have been in favour of the plaintiff, and that the action was maintainable; and by which it was also ordered that the demurrers in the action should be argued together with the above rule.

June 13 and 14. — Cole Q.C. and Bullen appeared to show cause, and contended that the judgment of the learned judge was right. The defendants had only stated of the plaintiff what was strictly true, viz., that "he was a convicted felon," and no action could be maintained against them for so doing. Alexander v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (34 L. J. 152, Q.B.; 6 B. & S. 340) was an authority in favour of the defendants. It was not contended in that case that if the statement were true it would be a libel. [POLLOCK, B.—Suppose you call a man a bankrupt, and it turns out only that he was one twenty years ago?] The principle, or rule, "Once a felon, always a felon," was in point and applicable here, and the statute of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, on which the plaintiff relied, was not applicable to the case, the sole object and purport of that statute being to remove certain disabilities attaching to persons convicted of felonies, which prevented their evidence being receivable in a court of justice, and to render them capable witnesses. The plaintiff will cite, probably, in his own favour the cases of Gwynne v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 738) and Biggs v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (Ib. p. 482); but the charge in each of those cases was one of misdemeanour, and not, as here, of felony. [CLEASBY, B. referred to Ouddington v. Wilkins (Hob. Rep. 67) as an authority favourable to the plaintiff, but observed that in that case there had been no conviction.]

Oollins, Q.C. and Pitt-Lewis for the plaintiff, contra, submitted first, that the statements contained in the alleged libels were not strictly true or accurate, and on that ground, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to have judgment in his favour. To say of the plaintiff at the time in question, "he is a convicted felon" and "is a felon editor," were utterly untrue and inaccurate statements. Had it been said that he "was, or had been, a convicted felon," it might have been different; and, again, the plaintiff never was a "felon" and an "editor" contemporaneously. The libel, therefore, was not true, the plaintiff not being a felon; for by the operation of the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3, he became, after having endured the punishment, in the same position as if he had been pardoned under the Great Seal; and there is express authority that to say of one who had been so pardoned "he is a felon" would be actionable (see Ouddington v. Wilkins, Hob. Rep. 67 and 81; Owen, 150; Moore, 869); and as to the distinction alluded to by Cleasby, B., that in that case there had been no conviction, it is said in Hawkins' P.C., book 2, c. 37, s. 48, that a pardon even after conviction so far clears the party that he may have an action for a scandal in calling him "felon" after the pardon, and be a good witness notwithstanding the conviction, "the pardon making him a new man and giving him a new credit and capacity." So in Rees v. Crosby (2 Salk. 689; 1 Lord Raym. 39) where on trial at bar for high treason the prisoners excepted to the evidence of one Smith, who had stood in the pillory for libel, it was argued for the Crown, in support of the witness's evidence, that the infamy flowed from the crime and not from the punishment, and that Smith's crime was not infamous nor deserving of such punishment; and Holt, C.J., without determining that point, held that Smith was restored by the general pardon of 2 Will. & M. which operated by way of restoration, and made him "a new creature." Again in Boston's case (Litch. 22) a parson was deprived of his benefice by the Ecclesiastical Court for adultery, and, a general pardon coming afterwards which pardoned the adultery, it was held that the parson was thereby, ipso facto, restored to his benefice without suit in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Celier's case, too (Sir T. Raym. Rep. 369), is a strong case in favour of the plaintiff. The learned judge and reporter there says: "It was debated, admit a witness be convicted of felony and afterwards pardoned, whether he shall thereby be restored to be a good witness? And my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs and myself were of opinion that he could not, because the pardon doth take away the punishment due to the offence, but cannot restore the person to his reputation; and of that opinion was Justice Nichols in Ouddington v. Wilkins' case (Moore 872, pl. 1213); but my brothers Jones and Dolben contra. And so afterwards did I conceive, for in the case of Ouddington v. Wilkins, as it is reported in Hobart, it is said that the pardon takes away not only penam but reatum." See also Vaughan's case (5 Co. Rep. 49). All these authorities show that a pardon clears the man and makes him a "new creature," and that all the consequences of the crime fall with and are washed away by it; and then the stat. 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3, enacts that the suffering the punishment shall have the same effect as a pardon. But even if the statement were true in one sense, they went far beyond the truth, and were so inaccurate as to make them libellous. In Gwynne v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 738) the plaintiff had been convicted before a magistrate of travelling on the defendants' line without a ticket, and was sentenced to a fine of 1s. and costs, or in default to three days' imprisonment. The defendants published placards stating he had been convicted, &c., and describing the alternative as "imprisonment with hard labour;" and in an action for libel, the defendants having pleaded the truth of the statement in their placard, Cockburn, C. J. said the first question for the jury was whether the defendants' account of the conviction was substantially correct; and in summing up to the jury he said: "If you are called to account for a libel, you can say, I have said no more than the truth; but if you go beyond the truth and state what you cannot prove, then you are liable, and it is for the jury to say what you will have to pay to the man of whom you have chosen to say something defamatory which you cannot make good." So here it was "beyond the truth" to say of the plaintiff "he is a convicted felon," and "he is a bankrupt and felon editor." It was a libel to write and publish the words "he is a bankrupt" of a person who, though he were a bankrupt twenty years ago, had since fully paid all his liabilities and was now solvent; and as to the "felony," that had been purged by his enduring the punishment to which he was sentenced, and so he was restored to his original status and condition. They cited also Biggs v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482; 16 W. R. 902); and Hawk. P. C., book 2, c. 46, s. 26.

Our. adv. vult.

June 22.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by CLEASBY, B.—In this case the question appears to be well raised upon the demurrer in the pleadings. It is an action for libel, and two libels are complained of, contained in a newspaper called the Western Daily Mercury, under the dates of the 24th April 1876 and 1st May 1876. If the paper of the 24th April is considered, a different question might arise from that which does arise upon the paper of the 1st May. It seems quite clear that the defendants are bound by what they wrote on the 1st May without reference to what was written on the 24th April; unless, to get at the meaning of what was written on the 1st May, it is necessary to refer to what was written on the 24th April. In the present case the article of the 1st May has by itself a clear meaning, and a person buying that newspaper on the 1st May, without having seen the paper of the previous week, would necessarily give the article that meaning. The facts of the present case, as they appear upon the pleadings, may, for the purpose of raising the question, be stated as follows: By the statement of claim the plaintiff states that he was the editor of a paper called the Dartmouth Advertiser, and he complains that on the 1st May the defendants in their newspaper referred to the plaintiff as the "felon editor." By the statement of defence the defendants justify this reference by alleging that the plaintiff had been convicted of felony, and was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing feathers. In his reply the plaintiff alleges that after his conviction, which took place some years ago, the plaintiff underwent his sentence of twelve months' imprisonment and hard labour, and so became as cleared from the crime and its consequences as if he had received the Queen's pardon under the Great Seal. To this there is a demurrer, and so the question is raised. In the statement of defence there was also a paragraph that the alleged libel complained of was a fair comment upon the conduct of the plaintiff in his public character as editor of the Advertiser, and to this there was also a demurrer in the reply. This was not argued before us, it being clear that such a justification could not be upheld in law, and upon that demurrer there must, of course, be judgment for the plaintiff. But the other question is one of some difficulty, that question being whether a man, who has been convicted of felony and undergone his sentence, can afterwards be called a "felon" without making the person calling him so liable to an action. We cannot doubt that calling a man, who is the editor of a newspaper, a "felon editor," is the same as calling him a "felon." The question could not have been raised before the passing of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 32. By the 3rd section of that Act, it is enacted as follows: "And whereas it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felonies not capital, who have undergone the punishment to which they were adjudged. Be it therefore enacted, that where any offender hath been, or shall be, convicted of any felony not punishable with death, and hath endured or shall endure the punishment to which such offender hath been or shall be adjudged for the same, the punishment so endured hath and shall have the like effects and consequences as a pardon under the Great Seal as to the felony whereof the offender was so convicted: provided always, that nothing herein contained, nor the enduring of such punishment, shall prevent or mitigate any punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any other felony." The general title of the Act relates to evidence, but the particular recital to this section introduces a new question, the civil status of particular persons. The question therefore becomes this, whether a person who has committed a felony, and received the Queen's pardon, can be called a "felon." Upon this question the authorities are clear. The case of Cuddington v. Wilkins (reported in Hobart's Reports, p. 67), is as follows: "Cuddington brought an action on the case against Wilkins for calling him 'thief.' The defendant justified, because before time he had stolen somewhat. The plaintiff replied, that since the supposed felony the general pardon in the seventh year of the King was made, and makes the usual averment to bring himself within the pardon. Whereupon the defendant demurs. See Staundford Plac. Coronæ, lib. 3, 180, that if a man arrested for felony break prison, he shall lose his battail; but yet, if the King pardon him that, it is restored. F. Coronæ, 281, 1 & 2 E. 3; F. Coronæ, 154; so here, the felony is by pardon extinct. And in the end this case was adjudged for the plaintiff, though, it may be, he knew him not to be within the pardon; for there is no cause to favour idle and injurious words. But perhaps, if he had arrested him for the felony after pardon, it might have been excused if he knew it not, because it is an act of justice," vide residuum infra, fol. 81. The case is afterwards stated more fully at p. 81, when, I suppose, judgment was given, and, after stating the facts, it is said that it was adjudged for the plaintiff, "for the whole Court were of opinion that, though he were a thief once, yet when the pardon came it took away not only penam, but realum, for felony is contra coronam et dignitatem regis," and, it proceeds: "Now, when the King had discharged it and pardoned him of it, he hath cleared the person of the crime and infamy, wherein no private person is interested but the commonwealth whereof he is the head, and in whom all general wrongs reside, and to whom the reformation of all general wrongs belongs." And there is much more to the same effect. The case is again referred to in a late part of the same reports, four years afterwards, at p. 293, in a case of Searle v. Williams, where in the judgment it is said: "And therefore I hold that if a man shall call him 'felon' or 'thief,' he may have his action as upon any other pardon, which we resolved in the case of Cuddington v. Wilkins." Now, the word "felon" was there made use of, which makes it the same as the present case. It is unnecessary to refer to the other authorities cited in the argument in support of so clear and unquestioned a decision, and one so reasonable and so just. One text book may be cited (Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, book 2, c. 37, s. 48, title "Pardon"), where, in the margin, the authorities are collected. He says: "As to the second great point, viz., what is the effect of a pardon? I take it to be settled at this day that the pardon of a treason or felony, even after a conviction or attainder, does so far clear the party from the infamy and all other consequences of his crime that he may not only have an action for a scandal in calling him traitor or felon after the time of the pardon, but may also be a good witness notwithstanding the attainder or conviction; because the pardon makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new capacity and credit." The conclusion therefore is inevitable that, if calling the plaintiff a "felon editor" involves calling him a felon, the plaintiff is entitled to his action, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff upon the demurrer to the reply. It is not necessary to decide what would have been the result if the defendants had only said of the plaintiff, as they do in the first paper, of the 24th April, "he is a convicted felon." In that case there would be more doubt, in the absence of any decided case, as to the effect of these words; and it might be said, if you choose to read the words favourably for the defendants, that they only mean that he has been at some former time convicted of felony. But it rather seems to us that they ought not to be read so favourably, and that the

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS.

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

[Ex. Div.]

result ought to be the same. It is not true to say of the plaintiff that "he is a convicted felon." He is a convicted felon who has been pardoned, and is a pardoned felon, and the felony is at the time extinguished. The calling him a felon and attaching the infamy of felony to him would import that he had not been pardoned. It would have been a different matter if the defendants had written of the plaintiff that he had previously committed a felony, or had been convicted of felony. That would have been strictly true, and could have been justified, although the fact of the sentence having been suffered was withheld. At least, such is our opinion; and the distinction is taken in the case of Cuddington v. Wilkins, at page 82 of the report. The distinction is not a verbal one merely; but the two statements would have a different effect. A man stating that another was a felon would be listened to as informing his hearers that the individual was infamous and to be shunned; but a man who stated that another man (perhaps the editor of a newspaper and in a respectable position) had been convicted of felony twenty or thirty years ago would probably himself be more condemned than the man he spoke of. But, however small the distinction may be, a slanderer should take care to be within the truth. The Court says, in the case of Cuddington v. Wilkins (Hob. p. 82), where the distinction is taken, "and it was held no great difference, though this had been a special pardon and not known to the defendant, for he must take heed at his peril that he do no man wrong, and there is no necessity nor use of slanderous words to be allowed to ignorants." The cases are numerous in which the injurious statement has gone beyond the truth and has been rendered actionable. Having regard to the authorities referred to, we cannot think that the learned judge was correct in saying that the statement should be read as a statement that the plaintiff had been convicted and was literally true. It appears to us that judgment ought to be given for the plaintiff on the demurrer, and that there should be a new trial for the purpose of assessing the damages, which the plaintiff might take, as he shall be advised, on the two libels, or on that of the 1st May.

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH. (a)

Local board—Power of to make bye-laws—Power of to pull down buildings erected in contravention of bye-laws—Action against for so doing—"New streets"—Definition and meaning of—Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) s. 34—Validity of bye-laws made in pursuance of—Ultra vires—Excess of force in pulling down—Damages for—Costs—New trial.

A local board of health made bye-laws under sect. 34 of the Local Management Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), the 3rd of which bye-laws provided that "no building should be erected by the side of any new street or proposed new street, or to which any new street would form the only carriage approach, until such street had been constructed to the approval of the local board." By the 32nd bye law it was provided that "every person who intends to erect any new building should give twenty-one days' notice to the local board of such intention, to be delivered to the local surveyor or left at his office, and should at the same time leave or cause to be left at the said office, for the use of the local board, detail plans and sections of such intended new building and its appurtenances, and a description of the materials of which the building is proposed to be constructed, of the intended mode of drainage, and means of water supply." And the 37th bye-law provided that "if the person intending to lay out any new street or construct any new building fail to give the notices therein required, or should construct or cause to be constructed any works or buildings, or do any act or omit to do any act or comply with any requirement of the local board, contrary to the provisions of any or either of the hereinbefore contained bye-laws, he shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding 5l. and a continuing penalty of 40s. a day. And the local board may at any time after the expiration of forty-eight hours from the service of a notice in writing on such person, expressing their intention so to do, in default of his showing good cause to the contrary in the meantime, cause any work begun or done in contravention of any or either of such bye-laws to be removed, altered, or pulled down as the case may require.

The plaintiff erected new houses by the side of a proposed new street before the new street had been constructed according to the approval of the local board, as required by the 3rd bye-law, and without having first given the notice or left the plans and sections required by the 32nd bye-law, and having failed to show good cause to the contrary within forty-eight hours after notice to him by the local board of their intention to pull his houses down, the local board caused the said houses to be pulled down, and in an action against them by the plaintiff for so doing justified their conduct under their 37th bye-law, and it was Held by the Exchequer Division (Gleasby and Pollock, BB.), giving judgment on demurrer for the defendants (the local board), that the 37th bye-law was not ultra vires, but was a valid bye-law, properly made under sect. 34 of the Local Management Act 1858, and within the power of the authority that made it; and that the defendants were thereby justified, so far as they exercised their power in so doing with reasonable care, in pulling down the plaintiff's houses.

The words "new street" in the Local Government Act 1858, and in these bye-laws, mean and include not only the roadway or thoroughfare for passengers and vehicles, but also the houses on both sides of it.

The jury having, in answer to a question by Blackburn, J., found that, assuming the bye-law to be good and the defendants to be justified in pulling down the houses, they used more force than was necessary, assessed the plaintiff's damages in that respect at 18l.; and on a motion by the defendants for a new trial, on the ground of that finding being against the weight of evidence,

(a) Reported by HENRY LEXER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

EX. DIV.]

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

[EX. DIV.]

The Court, having consulted Lord Blackburn on the point, were of opinion with him that unless the plaintiff accepted the defendants' offer to let the verdict for 18l. stand, without costs, there must be a new trial, and judgment was given to that effect accordingly.

THIS was an action which was tried before Blackburn, J. and a special jury, at the summer assizes for Hampshire, 1876, at Winchester, the main facts in which are contained in the following pleadings:

Statement of claim:

1. The plaintiff is a builder, carrying on business at Landport, in the borough of Portsmouth, and is lessee and occupier of certain land, situate in Tipmore street, Stanmahaw, in the said borough. The defendants, the Mayor and Corporation of Portsmouth, are the urban sanitary authority for the said borough.

2. In or about July 1875, plans were duly deposited with the defendants, in pursuance of a bye-law made by the defendants, as the urban sanitary authority for the said borough, for the construction of a street or road over the said land of the plaintiff. The said plans were submitted to and duly approved by the defendants.

3. In or about Aug. 1875, the plaintiff commenced to build sixteen houses on the said land, being eight on either side of the said street or road, and continued to build them until the month of November 1875, when eight of the said houses were roofed in, and the others were chamber-floor high, with joists on. Plaintiff admits that he had not before commencing the said houses deposited plans thereof, although he conditionally believed that his surveyor had done so, and the plans were in possession of the board before the houses were demolished, as hereinafter mentioned; but the defendants allowed the plaintiff to commence and to proceed with the erection of the said houses as hereinbefore mentioned without complaint or interference down to the month of November 1875, and the said houses were in all respects constructed in accordance with the bye-laws of the defendants, the said Mayor and Corporation, relating to the construction of buildings.

4. On the 22nd Nov. 1875 the defendants charged the plaintiff before the magistrates for the said borough with having built the said houses without having first deposited the plans for the same in accordance with the bye-laws of the defendants, the Mayor and Corporation. The plaintiff thereupon pleaded guilty, and was ordered to pay a fine of 1l. and costs.

5. On or about the 9th Dec. 1875, the defendants sent a large number of workmen to the said place, and the said workmen by their orders pulled down twelve of the said houses, eight of which had been roofed in, and totally demolished the same, and in doing so used so much violence that the materials thereof were rendered almost valueless for use at any future time for building or any other purpose.

6. Notice of this action was, on the 24th March 1876, duly given to the defendants.

The plaintiff claimed £1500.

Statement of defence:

1. The defendants deny the allegations in paragraph 3 of the statement of claim, save in as far as the plaintiff admits that he had not, before he commenced the said houses, deposited plans thereof.

2. Certain bye-laws have been duly made by the defendants, as the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Portsmouth, under and by virtue of the statutes in such case made and provided.

3. By the 3rd of the said bye-laws it is provided that no building shall be erected by the side of any new street or proposed new street, or to which any new street will form the only carriage approach, until such street has been constructed to the approval of such urban sanitary authority.

4. By the 32nd of the said bye-laws it is provided that every person who shall intend to erect any new building shall give twenty-one days' notice to the urban authority of such intention, to be delivered to the local surveyor, or left at his office, and shall at the same time leave or cause to be left at the said office, for the use of the urban sanitary authority, detail plans and sections, and a block plan of such intended new building and its appurtenances, and a description of the materials of which the building is proposed to be constructed, and of the intended mode of drainage and water supply.

5. Bye-law 37 is as follows: "The urban sanitary authority shall by resolution or order approve or disapprove of proposed new works or buildings within the times severally specified herein for the deposit of notices; but if the owner or person intending to lay out any new street or construct any new building fail to give the notices herein required, or if any owner or person shall construct or cause to be constructed any works or buildings, or do any act, or omit to do any act, or comply with any requirement of the urban sanitary authority, contrary to the provisions of any or either of the hereinbefore contained bye-laws, he shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding 5l., and he shall pay a further sum not exceeding 40s. for each and every day during which any such works or buildings shall continue or remain contrary to the said provisions; and the urban sanitary authority may, if they shall think fit, at any time after the expiration of forty-eight hours from the time of service of a notice in writing, addressed to such owner or person, signed by the local surveyor or the clerk to the urban sanitary authority, expressing their intention so to do, in default of such owner or person showing good cause to the contrary, in the meantime cause any work begun or done in contravention of any or either of the said bye-laws to be removed, altered, or pulled down, as the case may require, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be repaid by the offender, and be recoverable from him in a summary manner, as provided by the Public Health Act 1848; and any such notice may be served either personally or by leaving the same with some person either at the actual or last known place of abode or business of such owner or person, or at or upon the works or buildings referred to therein."

6. The plaintiff erected the houses named in paragraph 3 of the statement of claim in contravention of bye-laws 3 and 32. The said street was a new street, and the said houses were erected before the said street had been constructed according to the approval of the defendants as such urban sanitary authority as aforesaid. The plaintiff did not first give to the defendants, as such urban sanitary authority, such notice as by the said 32nd bye-law is required to be given, and did not leave or cause to be left at the office of the defendants, as such urban sanitary authority, for their use, detail plans or sections, or any block plan of the said houses, or any description of the materials of which the said houses were proposed to be constructed, or of the intended mode of drainage or means of water supply.

7. The defendants, upon receiving a report from their local surveyor, gave the plaintiff notice, in pursuance of bye-law 37, that the defendants would, after the expiration of forty-eight hours from the time of the service of the said notice, in default of the plaintiff showing good cause to the contrary, cause the said houses to be pulled down, as being erected by the plaintiff in contravention of the said bye-laws.

8. The plaintiff did not, within the said forty-eight hours, or before the removal of the said houses as hereinbefore mentioned, show good cause why the said houses should not be pulled down; and the defendants accordingly, in pursuance of bye-law 37 and of their said notice, and after the expiration of the said forty-eight hours, namely on the 9th and 10th December, 1875, caused the said houses to be pulled down, as they lawfully might. The defendants deny that in so doing any unnecessary violence was used, or that the said materials were rendered almost valueless, as is alleged in the fifth paragraph of the statement of claim.

Reply and demurrer:

1. The plaintiff joins issue on the defendants' statement of defence.

2. The plaintiff demurs to the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth paragraphs of the statement of defence as bad in law, on the ground that the defendants have no power to make bye-laws authorising them to pull down buildings, except in cases where such buildings are erected in contravention of some bye-law relating to mode of construction, and on other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

EX. DIV.]

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

[EX. DIV.]

The plaintiff's points for argument :

1. That the third bye-law is not authorised by the Local Government Act. That that Act authorises the local board to make bye-laws to regulate the level, width, construction, and sewerage of new streets, but does not authorise them to make a bye-law that no building shall be erected by the side of any new street until such street has been constructed to the approval of the local board, and does not make them judges as to whether the bye-laws have been complied with ; still less does it authorise the local board to make a bye-law enabling them to pull down such buildings. The only power the local board could have would be to make a bye-law imposing a penalty for not constructing the new street in conformity with the prescribed rules. 2. The Local Government Act 1858 and bye-law 37, purporting to be made thereunder, do not give power to the local board to pull down buildings in case of a default to give notices or deposit plans. For such default a penalty is imposed, and has been inflicted in this case. The power to pull down buildings is, on a true construction of the Act and the bye-law, only given where the buildings contravene the requirements of the Act and the bye-laws as regards the structural condition of the buildings, which, according to the evidence of the plaintiff, the present buildings did not.

3. If the site of the buildings was unhealthy, as contended by the defendants, the defendants have mistaken their remedy, and should have proceeded under the 29th bye-law, there being no bye-law regulating the nature of the soil to be built upon.

4. That the notice of the 23rd Nov. 1875, in pursuance of which the buildings were pulled down, is invalid, the specific bye-law alleged to have been contravened not being therein mentioned.

Points for argument on the part of the defendants :

1. That the paragraphs of the statement of defence demurred to are good in law.

2. That the bye-laws relied on by the defendants were within the scope of their authority, and authorised them to pull down the buildings in question, under the circumstances set forth in statements of claim and defence.

The Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), under the authority of which the bye-laws in question here were made, enacts as follows, by :

Sect. 14. Every local board may make bye-laws with respect to the following matters, that is to say :

- (1.) With regard to the level, width, and construction of new streets, and the provisions for the sewerage thereof.
- (2.) With respect to the structure of walls of new buildings, for securing stability and the prevention of fires.
- (3.) With respect to the sufficiency of the space about buildings to secure a free circulation of air, and with respect to the ventilation of buildings.
- (4.) With respect to the drainage of buildings, to water closets, privies, ash pits, and cesspools in connection with buildings, and to the closing of buildings or parts of buildings unfit for human habitation, and to prohibition of their use for such habitation.

And they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets, or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the local board, and as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws, provided always that no such bye-laws shall affect any buildings erected before the date of the constitution of the district.

The plaintiff obtained an order, which was unopposed, for the trial of the issues of facts before the demurrer was argued, and such issue came on for trial at Winchester before Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.) and a special jury as above mentioned, and at the close of the summing-up that learned judge submitted the following note to the jury for their guidance :

"It is agreed that the buildings were commenced without any plan being deposited, and without any formal approval of the construction of the road.

I shall ask the jury,

1. If the ground was in such a state when the buildings were begun as to make it impossible to build dwellings on it without previous precautions.

2. Whether (if that is not proved) the sanitary officers believed, and had reasonable grounds for believing, the ground to have been in such a state (I am inclined to think that neither of them is material, but as to them if the court should think them material, notice of action was given.)

3. Then I tell the jury that, supposing the bye-law bad, the plaintiff is entitled to the value of the buildings as they stood, less the value of the materials as they were handed over to the plaintiff, and I ask them to assess the value.

4. That even if the bye-law is good, and the defendants were justified in pulling down the houses, the plaintiff has a right to have it done with reasonable care and skill, and so as not to charge the plaintiff with unnecessary expense, and on the other hand not to damage the plaintiff's materials more than was necessary, and I ask the jury :

4. Was there neglect of duty in this respect ; and, if so, what is the damage ?

I shall leave it to the court on "the findings" and the demurrer to enter judgment as the court think proper.

1. To the first question the jury returned the answer, "Yes."

2. That that answer rendered it unnecessary to answer the second question.

3. To the third question, "Damages, 500*l.*"

4. And to the fourth question, "Damages, 18*l.*"

To these findings the jury added the following memorandum or rider : "The jury are of opinion that remedies might have been applied which would have rendered the pulling down the houses unnecessary."

On the following day application was made by the defendants' counsel to the court to exercise its discretion with regard to the costs of the trial after the verdict of the jury, when the court made the following order : "Costs to be reserved for the opinion of the Exchequer Division to give or withhold them, as they may think proper. Either party to have liberty to move for a new trial within the first four days of next sittings."

The case now came on for argument upon the demurrer, and upon the plaintiff's motion to enter judgment, and the defendants' motion for a new trial on the ground that the finding of the jury with respect to the 18*l.* damages was against the weight of evidence.

Cole, Q.C., Kingdon, Q.C., and Petheram appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that the 37th bye-law, under which the houses were pulled down, was, so far as it professed to give power to pull down buildings in consequence of breaches of the 3rd and 32nd bye-laws, entirely ultra vires, as being in excess of the powers given by the Act of Parliament 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 5 (the Public Health Act 1858). The proviso which followed the 4th sub-section was not a separate power, but a means only of enforcing the other bye-laws. The first three sub-sections of the Act of Parliament authorised bye-laws relating to the construction, and the 4th related to the habitation of buildings after they were constructed; and the concluding provision was to compel observance of the bye-laws relating to the construction, and there was no power enabling the board to make a bye-law for pulling down buildings except in cases of a breach of a bye-law relating to construction. The 3rd and 32nd bye-laws, on a breach of which the defendants relied, had no reference to the mode in which a street should be constructed, but only the 3rd to the mode in which the board's approval should be obtained, and the 32nd only to the depositing of notices and plans; in fact, they related to what might be termed practice only, and not to construction at all, and for a breach of them a penalty no doubt might be inflicted; but the statute gave no power to make a bye-law enabling houses to be pulled down which were built in accordance with the structural bye-laws, and as to which the only default had been the non-deposit of plans. [POLLOCK, B.—Surely, if depositing a plan be a condition precedent to the right to build, it must be a building begun in contravention of a bye-law?] Not in contravention of the bye-law as to structure. The last portion of the bye-law was a mere form of practice by which the performance of the others was to be enforced. [POLLOCK, B.—By sub-sect. 4 they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such penalties as they think necessary.] Exactly; "the same" meant there the bye-laws which went before, none of which related to depositing of plans and giving notices, &c., but to "structure" only, and the words "the same" must refer to what went before, and should have no reference to what came after.

were all authorities in favour of the plaintiff. [POLLOCK, B.—I am much caught by your argument; but the section further on says they may provide for pulling down any work begun or done in contravention of "such bye-laws." Then, if the bye-law requires plans to be deposited, it would be a legal bye-law, and a house built without such deposit would surely be built in contravention of that bye-law?] It would not be in contravention of one of the bye-laws to which this related. They may pull down where the bye-laws relating to construction have been contravened, but cannot provide for pulling down where only plans have not been delivered; nor did the Act empower the making of bye-laws relating to the construction of houses by the side of new streets, but only those relating to the level, width, and construction of the "new street" or roadway and the sewerage thereof. "Street" did not mean or include houses or buildings, but only the roadway. The bye-law under which the defendants professed to act was illegal and bad, and the plaintiff therefore was entitled to judgment in his favour for the amount of damages (500*l.*) found by the jury; and, secondly, if the bye-law should be held to be good, then the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict in his favour for 18*l.* with respect to the excess of force used by the defendants in pulling down the houses, and to costs.

Thesiger, Q.C. and Charles, Q.C., for the defendants, argued contra, and submitted that the verdict should be entered for the defendants, and then there was the subsidiary question as to the right and justification of the finding of the jury for 18*l.* The power of the defendants depended on the Local Government Act 1858. Now, in order to enable a local authority to carry out the sanitary duties imposed upon them, there were two matters with respect to buildings which ought to be taken into consideration and provided for; first, that the land to be built upon was in a fit and proper condition for the purpose; and, secondly, that the buildings themselves were properly constructed as regarded sanitary considerations. Reasoning, a priori, it was to be expected that a power to make bye-laws would be found under which the local authorities, having to guard the health of their district, would be enabled to effect and insure that great object; and both these matters were considered by the Legislature, as was shown by the language of sect. 34 and its various sub-sections. Obviously the words "the same" at the latter part of that section referred to and meant all the previous four sub-divisions. "They may provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein," &c.; that is to say, by putting into the bye-laws, and so making them a part of the bye-laws, such provisions as they shall think necessary," &c.—a wide power, no doubt, but not more so than the importance of the matter demanded. Then all these things being placed there would be themselves bye-laws, and were intended to be so by the words "they may provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein." If that be so, inasmuch as all the preceding things were, if the board thought proper, and to the extent they thought necessary, to be put into the bye-laws, then when afterwards a power is found "to remove, alter, or pull down" any work done in contravention of "such bye-laws," it must include all the parts and all the things which the board had power to put into and make part of the bye-laws, and amongst other things, therefore, the power to pull down works begun or done without such previous notices or plans as the board from time to time might require. Therefore, taking "street" either in its widest and most popular sense as a roadway plus the buildings, or in the narrower sense of the plaintiff's contention, it would in either way come within the powers of the board to "pull down" works done in contravention of a bye-law which required that, before a man built, the board must approve of the "street" (using the word in its narrow sense); and secondly, that plans and sections of the buildings should be deposited. Two things were provided for: first, the making of a proper street for the erection of buildings; and next, that the houses to be built should be fit for human habitations. As to these points the 3rd, 5th, and 6th bye-laws were important. The laying out streets and constructing new buildings were the two things forming the complement of "street" in the popular sense, and throw light upon the meaning of that word in sub-sect. 1 of sect. 34, and the decisions on the statute showed that it was used in the wider and popular sense of the roadway and the houses at each side. Pond

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

[Ex. Div.]

v. The Plumstead Board of Works, and Lord Northbrook v. The same (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 183; 41 L. J. 51, M. C.) [HUDDLESTON, B. referred to Reg. v. Fullford (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 346; 83 L. J. 122, M. C.)] Galloway v. The Mayor and Commonalty of London in the House of Lords (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 865; 35 L. J. 477, Ch.; L. Rep. 1 E. & L. App. 34). As was correctly defined by Rolt, Q.C., in his argument in that case, "street" meant not "the mere roadway, but a thoroughfare with houses on both sides." The section of the statute and the power thus given included everything connected with the level, width, construction, and general sanitary condition of the street and the houses to be erected there. As to the cases cited on the part of the plaintiff, Waite v. The Local Board of Garston (ubi sup.) did not touch or apply to the present case. The ratio decidendi in Brown v. The Holyhead Board (ubi sup.) was seemingly that the bye-law was bad for including existing as well as future buildings, and gave no compensation for any act the board might do in carrying out their powers. The cases of Hatherley v. Burr (ubi sup.) and Young v. Edwards (ubi sup.) involved other questions as to the mode of enforcing the penalty for disobedience to the bye-laws and were not applicable; but if they were, it was contended that they were practically overridden by the last case cited by the plaintiff, viz., Hall v. Nixon (ubi sup.). Buildings had been pulled down there on precisely the same grounds as here. Then with respect to the 18l. damages, looking at the evidence in the case and assuming that the board acted properly, this was a case in which the verdict was unsatisfactory, and there would be a new trial, or at all events, the plaintiff not having succeeded in his main contention that the defendants acted in excess of their powers, ought not to have the costs of the litigation. They referred also to the interpretation clauses of the Metropolitan Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) s. 250, and of the Metropolitan Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) s. 112.

Kingdon, Q.C. was heard in reply.

POLLOCK, B.—This matter has been very fully and ably argued, and every possible assistance has been given to us by the learned counsel on both sides. So far as the point with respect to the new trial is concerned, it is impossible that we should decide it without first consulting Lord Blackburn as to the view which he has taken as to the verdict of the jury with regard to the damages for the excess of violence. The action was brought by the plaintiff, the owner, and practically the builder, of certain houses in the borough of Portsmouth, against the defendants, the mayor and corporation of the borough, who, in their capacity of "urban sanitary authority" of that borough, had pulled down the plaintiff's said houses. The real damage, as alleged in the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim, is this, that in the pulling the houses down the defendants used so much unnecessary violence that the materials of the buildings were rendered almost valueless for use at any future time either for building or any other purpose. Now, it needs no argument to show that, where a power of so stringent a kind is given to the local board of health, it is incumbent upon them to exercise that power in a reasonable and proper manner, doing as little damage as would be necessary to effect the purpose which they were undertaking, in pursuance of the Act of Parliament and the bye-laws. With regard to this, evidence was given on both sides, and it appears that at the conclusion of the case, a suggestion was thrown out by the learned judge with regard to the course that might be adopted, supposing that the plaintiff was willing to consent to it, with regard to the verdict of 18l. damages being allowed to stand, and the plaintiff being deprived of his costs. Now, this is a matter of so grave a character, and so very important, so far as the functions of the local board are concerned, that I do not think it would be right for us to say, at any rate at present, that we would enforce upon the parties any arrangement of that kind which they were not willing to accept. The matter of strict right turns upon whether or not the verdict of the jury which found that there was such unnecessary violence as that in the result the plaintiff was damaged to the extent of 18l., should be upheld or not. With regard to that we will consult Lord Blackburn, and hear what he has to say before giving our opinion upon it. And now arises what is a much more important, and much more general question, and one that is raised both upon the evidence at the trial and also upon demurrer, and it arises in this way; the plaintiff, in his statement of claim, states the building of these houses, and that a summons was issued by the local board requiring him to justify their construction, and that afterwards the defendants charged him before the borough magistrates with having built the houses without having first deposited the plans for the same in accordance with the bye-laws of the local board. Thereupon the plaintiff pleaded guilty, and was ordered to pay a fine of 1l. and costs. Then after that, the defendants sent a considerable body of workmen to destroy these houses, and so did him damage. The jury have found, assuming the bye-law to be an illegal bye-law, damages amounting to 500l.; and whether that verdict will stand or not depends upon the proper construction to be put upon the statute under which these bye-laws were made, and upon the bye-laws themselves. Before, however, I go to that, I ought to add that the jury found that the ground upon which the plaintiff had built was unfit for building upon. I do not know, so far as I am concerned, that that much affects the present question; but they also found that remedies might have been applied other than the actual pulling down of the buildings, which would have made it unnecessary to pull them down. I do not see, on this part of the case, if that is to be taken as the substantial finding of the jury of what in their view they were justified in finding upon the facts, that that affects the real question between the parties, and for this reason: they do not say how and in what manner other remedies might have been applied, but we can understand what they meant; they had had a demonstration of this great power given to the local board, and they could see no way of rectifying that which was complained of in the structure of the houses without pulling them down. On that part of the case it is unnecessary to say more than that that is a power given to the board by the Legislature, and is no doubt a matter of the highest importance to all Her Majesty's subjects who build houses within any borough where the local board has parliamentary power; but still we must suppose that they exercise that discretion rightly when they bring a house within the mischief which is intended by the statute to be remedied, and that then the mode in which they shall pull down the houses, or what they shall do, is for them, provided they exercise their power in a reasonable and proper manner. Therefore the discretion vested in them is to see whether it is necessary or not to pull the houses down, and they are not to be told, "You might by having underpinned this house, or altered the foundation of it, or done something to the drains, or a great many other things with regard to the superstructure, and you might perchance have done all these other things in such a manner as that it would not have been necessary to pull the houses down." That I think is not for the jury, but is to be determined by the local board, always assuming that they exercise their discretion bona fide, and that nothing to the contrary is found. We may entertain that view, and still uphold the finding of the jury that the defendants did unnecessary damage in pulling down the houses. The one finding relates to the manner of pulling down, the other finding relates to the question whether the houses should have been pulled down at all, and whether certain remedies could have been applied which would have obviated the necessity of pulling them down. And now comes the great question between these parties, and no doubt the question that it was intended to try when this action was brought, and it is this: whether the bye-law under which the defendants justify is a bye-law which is good, or whether it is a bye-law which is bad, as being beyond the power which is given to the defendants by the statute. I do not know that there is any occasion at this period of time to allude to the history of the law relating to bye-laws. There has been, and I am sure always will be, a great jealousy on the part of the common law of England with regard to bye-laws that are made by corporations from time to time, enforcing rights and penalties and other matters, all of which, of course, are of a purely local character; and it is right that there should be that jealousy, because the bye-law has, in truth, locally the same effect as an Act of Parliament. But I shall not, in considering this case, import into it all that has been said in olden days, from Lord Coke, which will be found collected in Kyd's Book on Corporations, and in other books of that kind, where bye-laws are made to restrain the liberty of the subject in small local matters, and which help to fill the coffers of the corporation; whereas, in the present case, the bye-law is made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, which is one of a series of Acts which it was found necessary to pass, in order to give to certain local bodies authority, and power to preserve the health of the inhabitants in the different districts over which these bodies are constituted the governing sanitary authorities. That being so, we find that the Public Health Act, having been passed in 1848, was followed by the Local Government Act of 1858, and it is only by taking the clauses of those two Acts together that we can find what is the full scope and intention of the Legislature with regard to the healthy character and proper construction of houses in the district over which the different local boards have jurisdiction. Now, the bye-laws in question were made by the Local Government Act 1858, and these very bye-laws set forth what are the powers, and the only powers, under which such bye-laws have been made. These are contained in the different sub-sections to sect. 34 of the Local Government Act 1858, the first of which is in these words: "with respect to the level, width, and construction of new streets and provisions for the sewerage thereof;" next, "with respect to the structure of walls of new buildings for securing stability and the prevention of fires;" thirdly, "with respect to the sufficiency of the space about buildings to secure a free circulation of air, and with respect to the ventilation of buildings." Then with respect to drainage and other matters such as water-closets, privies, and so forth; and then comes this general provision: "and they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the local board, and as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws." It is quite clear that the local authority in the present case, acting on the statute in making their bye-laws, assumed two things: one is that, when they made their bye-laws with reference to "the level, width, and construction of new streets," that did not merely mean that they were limited to the mode in which a new road should be laid down, showing the width of the road, the proper course of the roadway, the paths on either side, the drains beneath, and matters of that kind; but they clearly supposed that they were entitled, when dealing with the words "new streets," to take the popular and wide sense of the word "street," as meaning not only a roadway over which passengers and vehicles might pass, but also that which, in popular language, is part of the street, namely, the houses on both sides. It certainly seems to me that there is a great deal to be said for that construction as a matter of ordinary experience and common sense; because otherwise, as was said in the course of the argument, a street might be limited to 40ft. in width, and the buildings which are at either side of that street might be of such a height and size as to make it, as regards proportion, a worse street than the streets in London were before the Great Fire. That cannot be the intention of the Act of Parliament, and so far as one can gather, it seems to me that they used those words properly when they used the words "new streets." There are a great many cases of this kind, principally under the Metropolitan Buildings Acts. I happen to have been engaged in a great many of them myself, but we are here not without authority, for we have the highest authority, viz., that of the House of Lords in Galloway v. The Mayor, &c., of London (ubi sup.), where the Lord Chancellor, on motion for judgment, put that construction on those words which I have adopted in the present case. But then there is another and a very material matter, which arises with regard to the houses themselves; and there again the local board assumed that they were entitled to deal with the construction of the houses, not merely with regard to the actual construction when they are finished or partly finished, but that they were entitled to deal with that portion of the Local Government Act 1858 which requires that any person who constructs buildings must deposit plans

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

[Ex. Div.]

and sections—that is to say, the local board requires any persons constructing a building to deposit plans and sections, and that, as to that, the local board have the power of making bye-laws. Now, that is a matter, no doubt, very different from the actual construction of the building itself. All the arguments used on the part of the plaintiff are very clear, very legal, and very consistent. It is one thing to say you must build a building, a certain structure, but another thing to say, as a condition precedent to that, you must deposit certain plans and give a certain section. But when we come to look at the matter, it is most reasonable to say you must, before you begin or commence your building, deposit a plan and section. It is a simple matter, known to all architects and builders, and far more reasonable to ask for that deposit to be made, than to say that the building should be built, and then afterwards, if it did not fall in with certain regulations a priori, that it should then be pulled down and destroyed. It is quite true that in many cases it shifts the onus on to the builder, and in many cases it may be that the local board may not be able to justify their acts with regard to the structural character of the building, because in some respects it may be that they cannot define exactly whether they are things that can be made good or not. But the decision in point of law is a clear one when they assert, “You have not deposited notices of plans and sections which ought to have been deposited by you who intend to construct certain buildings.” Therefore it seems to me, as far as the reason and spirit of the Act of Parliament are concerned, to come within it; but then, does it come within the strict words? I listened with very great attention to the argument of Mr. Petheram, who said that the whole of it is to be governed by these words, “And they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings,” and so on. But it does not seem to my mind that that is so at all, because the power is really and substantially a power to make bye-laws, and having made them, this section says they may make bye-laws “as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws.” Therefore it seems to me that the power exists of making a bye-law which enables them to “pull down any work begun or done in contravention of the bye-laws,” whether that contravention be a building built contrary to the structural requirements, or whether built without a proper plan having been first deposited. Practically it is for the relief of the builder, because a man would have notice, “You are building when you ought not to be, you have not deposited your plans;” and then probably the building would be pulled down at an earlier period than it would otherwise be. Well, then, in accordance with that, the 37th bye-law is made, and, for the reason which I have given, that is a perfectly good bye-law, and that which was done by the corporation in the present instance was done properly, and was within the powers given to them by their bye-laws. I will only say one word more with regard to the construction of the bye-law. It seems to me that we should deal with this case on a wrong principle if we dealt with it differently from the way in which we should deal with the construction of a conveyance or an Act of Parliament. This is a case in which we should look to the general spirit and intention of the bye-laws, in the same way as we should look at the general spirit of an Act of Parliament, in both cases giving to it its proper and reasonable effect, and not being guided by any arguments of hardship on the one side or the other, and trying to give the words used a meaning and intention according to the spirit which appears in other parts of the bye-laws, and in the statute on which they are founded. Now, several authorities were cited in the course of the argument. I do not know that they afford us very much assistance, but it is only right perhaps that we should allude to them. With regard to the cases of Young v. Edwards (ubi sup.) and Hattersley v. Burr (ubi sup.) I do not see that they at all hamper us or give us any difficulty in the conclusion at which we have arrived; but if they did we have the late case of Hall v. Nixon (ubi sup.), in the Queen’s Bench, where the matter was very fully considered, and I would adopt every word used by the learned judges in giving judgment in that case. It seems to me, therefore, that this 37th bye-law is properly made, and within the power of the authority that made it, and that in the present case, in what the board did, so far as they were exercising their power with reasonable prudence, caution, and care, they were exercising it legally and within that power given to them. As regards the other point as to the new trial, as I have before said, it will be dealt with hereafter; but with respect to the validity of the bye-law, as both my brother Huddleston and myself are clear on the subject, we thought it far better that we should express our opinion upon that point at once, and we will deal with the other matters when we have consulted Lord Blackburn.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The 8th paragraph of the statement of defence justifies the act done by the defendants on the ground that, within forty-eight hours before the removal of the houses, the plaintiff did not show good cause “why the houses should not be pulled down, and the defendant accordingly, in pursuance of bye-law 37, and of their said notice, and after the expiration of the said forty-eight hours, namely on the 9th Dec. 1875, caused the said houses to be pulled down, as they lawfully might.” They “deny that in so doing any unnecessary violence was used, or that the said materials were rendered almost valueless as is alleged.” That means, “what we did we did adopting the formalities which are required under the 37th bye-law, and by virtue of that bye-law, and we did no more damage than was necessary.” With reference to the latter part of that statement of defence, it is said that the jury have found the plaintiff entitled to 18*l.* damages, and a new trial is asked for by the defendants on the ground that that finding is against the weight of evidence. I agree with my brother Pollock that we must consult my Lord Blackburn on this point before we give any opinion as to how we shall deal with that portion of the case, either by directing the verdict to stand, saying what shall be done with reference to costs, or by directing a new trial generally. But, of course, the main and real question is as to the power to make this 37th bye-law. It is said by the 6th paragraph of the defence that the houses were built in contravention of the bye-laws, viz., the 3rd and the 32nd: of the 3rd bye-law which provides that "no building shall be erected by the side of any new street or proposed new street, or to which any new street will form the only carriage approach, until such street has been constructed to the approval of the local board," and of the 32nd bye-law, for not having delivered the notices which were thereby required to be delivered. Now that, of course, involves the proposition or question, had the Corporation of Portsmouth power to make these bye-laws? Now the only power which they have to make bye-laws is by virtue, as they themselves say, of the Public Health Act 1848, the Local Government Act 1858, and the Local Government Supplemental Act 1864, No. 2., and the section that applies and gives them the power particularly is sect. 34 of the Local Government Act 1858. Now it is contended on the part of the plaintiff that the powers there given are only with respect to roadways and streets and the external construction of the buildings, and a sufficient space round the buildings and the works underground, and that they have no reference to the construction of the buildings themselves, and that therefore the 3rd bye-law, which deals with the erection of buildings in the streets, and the 32nd bye-law, which deals with the plans with reference to those buildings, are ultra vires. Now, the whole of the question turns on what interpretation we shall give to the words "new street" in the 34th section of the Local Management Act 1858, and the bye-law of the defendants. Is the word "street" there to be confined to the narrow interpretation of "roadway" merely; or are we to take it in the popular and full meaning of the word, namely, "street" consisting of the "roadway" and the houses on each side of the street? And we must look to the interpretation clause, and see whether that will assist us; there is no such clause in the Local Government Act 1858, as applicable to "streets;" but the Public Health Act 1848, is incorporated with the Local Government Act 1858, and there is an interpretation clause in that earlier Act which says, the word "street" shall apply to and include "any highway (not being a turnpike road), and any road, public bridge (not being a county bridge), lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage within the limits of any district." What is the meaning of "shall apply to and include" unless "street" means something more than the roadway—that is, that "street" shall mean the street with the houses, and shall include the roadway? And there is authority that the word "street" in Acts of Parliament analogous to this are indeed used in that sense, and in a case with reference to this very Act of Parliament, Pollock, C.B. said, "the word 'street' includes the houses on each side of the road." That really seems the reasonable and proper interpretation of the word "street." The object of this Public Health Act is to secure not only proper roads, proper ventilation, and proper means of transit through the street, but also the comfort, and also I have no doubt the comeliness, of the buildings and of the town itself; and using the word "street" in the ordinary, I do not say popular sense, but strict natural interpretation of the Act itself, it provides by the first sub-section that the board may make bye-laws with reference to "the level, and the width, and the construction of the new streets;" that is, not merely the construction of the roadway, but the construction of the roadway plus the buildings on each side. They would therefore have the power to make bye-laws, with reference, amongst other things, to the time when the buildings should be erected, and the character of them, and also with reference to the structure of the walls of the building, and to the sufficiency of the space about the buildings, so that a free circulation of air might be secured, and also, which no doubt is most important, the proper drainage of water-closets, and privies, and so on. Having that power, "they may further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein," that is in the bye-law, "such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings;" and the words used are worthy of observation: they have power to require "notice as to the plans and sections"—now "plans and sections" would apply more naturally to the "buildings" than to the construction of the roadway—"as to plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the local board, and as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws." The local board have the power to require notices to be given, and in default of such notices being given, to pull down the work begun or done in contravention of these bye-laws; and I may add that there is a proviso in the 34th section of the Local Management Act 1858, that "no such bye-law shall affect any building erected before the date of the constitution of the district." One would thence infer that the bye-laws may deal with all buildings built after that date; and if that interpretation be right, the corporation clearly has power to make the 3rd bye-law, which provides that "no building shall be erected by the side of any new street, or proposed new street, or to which any new street will form the only carriage approach, until such street has been constructed to the approval of the local board;" and to make the 32nd bye-law, which requires the deposit of the plans, and to provide for these plans being carried out, providing penalties in the 37th bye-law, and availing themselves of the 34th section to direct the houses to be pulled down where built in contravention of any of the bye-laws, and that the corporation have shown, under the 6th, 7th, and 8th paragraphs of their statement of defence, a justification for the acts done, with the exception of that which they did with more violence than was necessary. That matter we will decide hereafter when we have heard Lord Blackburn's view of the evidence.

BAKER v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PORTSMOUTH.

June 7.—The COURT intimated that they had communicated with Lord Blackburn, and that he was of opinion, in which the court concurred, that there ought to be a new trial unless the plaintiff consented to accept the offer which had been made by the defendants that the verdict should stand for 18l. without costs.

Judgment for the defendants on the demurrer, and the plaintiff's motion to sign judgment, and rule absolute for new trial, unless the plaintiff consents to accept the 18l. without costs.

RAWLENCE AND OTHERS v. THE GUARDIANS OF HURSLEY UNION. (a)

Poor Rate Assessment Act—Valuation list—Particulars of each hereditament—Sufficiency of particulars—27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 4—37 & 38 Vict., c. 54.

Valuers employed by an assessment committee under the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 4, to value a farm, furnished a valuation list giving the estimated acreage of each of the several fields comprising the farm, but not the gross estimated rental or the rateable value of each or any of the fields separately, but giving these two last-named amounts in lump sums in the proper columns at the end of the several items comprising the entire farm.

Held, that such a list was sufficient, and in conformity with the requirements of the Act of Parliament, and that it was unnecessary to give the value of each individual field of the farm separately.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. This is an action to recover the sum of 350*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* for work done by the plaintiffs, who are land surveyors and valuers at Salisbury, for the defendants, at their request, in valuing the rateable hereditaments (except railways) comprised in the Hursley Unions, in the county of Hants, and of which sum full particulars have been submitted by the plaintiffs to the defendants.

2. In the month of March 1875, it having become necessary, under 37 & 38 Vict. c. 54, and the other Acts in force relating to the relief of the poor, that a new assessment and valuation list should be made of the Hursley Union, the defendants, who were the assessment committee of the said union, employed the plaintiffs to make such an assessment and valuation list of the said union at an agreed scale of remuneration.

3. The plaintiffs entered upon the work of the said assessment and valuation, and completed it upon the 27th Dec. 1875, on which day they sent their valuation list to the defendants.

4. The said valuation list showed such particulars of the several hereditaments and occupations comprised within the said union and the amounts at which the same were valued respectively, as are shown by the portion of such valuation list relating to the parish of Farley Chamberlayne, and which is set out in the appendix herewith, which is a fair sample of the whole.

5. The defendants received the said valuation list, and made use of the same by making the then rate of the said union on the basis thereof; but this is not to be taken, for the purposes of this case, as an admission that the said valuation list was such as the defendants were entitled to have.

6. The plaintiffs affirm, and the defendants deny, that the plaintiff's valuation list, delivered to defendants, sufficiently showed the particulars of the said hereditaments and occupations comprised in the said union, and the amounts at which the plaintiffs valued the same respectively, within the meaning of the Union Assessment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 4.

7. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the valuation list furnished by plaintiffs to defendants, as judged by the sample set out in the schedule, is a sufficient valuation under the provisions of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 4, or whether the defendants are entitled to have a separate valuation of each field in the said several occupations.

8. If the court be of opinion that the valuation list as delivered was sufficient, as aforesaid, plaintiffs are to have judgment for 350*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* and costs.

9. If the court be of opinion that the valuation list as delivered was not sufficient, then plaintiffs are to furnish defendants with a field valuation of the said union, and are then to be paid by defendants the sum of 350*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*; the defendants' costs being paid by plaintiffs.

APPENDIX TO CASE.

Valuation List for the Parish of Farley Chamberlayne, in the County of Hants.

The above portion of the valuation list was continued in the same manner, and contained eighteen other items of property described as in the occupation of "the said William John Bodwin," and as owned by "the said Thomas Godwin (late)," and as being of a certain description, and as situated in "Slackstead," and as being severally of a certain estimated extent. Neither the "gross estimated rental" nor the "rateable value" of any of the several parcels or portions was, however, given; but at the end the acreage of the several items was added together, making a total of 411a. 3r. 16p., and their aggregated gross estimated rental was put down as 476*l.*, and their aggregated rateable value as 428*l.* 8s.

The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 4 (under which the valuers acted), enacts that, "Where a valuer is appointed by the assessment committee, he shall make his valuation in writing, showing the particulars of the several hereditaments comprised therein, and the amounts at which he has valued the same respectively, and shall sign such valuation, which shall be open to inspection in like manner and with the same incidents with respect to the taking of copies and extracts as the minute books of the committee."

Charles, Q.C. (with whom was Bromley), for the plaintiffs, was contending that it was sufficient within the requirement of the statute that the valuers should, as they had done in this case, value the "hereditament" of a ratepayer as a whole, and that it was not necessary that each particular or individual field or portion of the holding or "hereditament" should be valued separately, when he was stopped by the Court, who called on Lumley Smith (with him was Meadows White, Q.C.), for the defendants.—The valuers ought to have put a distinct and separate value upon each individual parcel of which they have given in other respects a full description. A "hereditament" does not by any means necessarily mean the whole of a farm. The plaintiffs have themselves shown what particulars the Act in their opinion requires, by cutting a farm up into several fields or portions, and giving the description and acreage of each separate field or portion, and aggregating the acreage of the several portions into one whole sum at the end, and they should, in order to have carried out the intention and requirements of the Act of Parliament, have gone on and added to the description and acreage of each individual field, its gross estimated rental, and the rateable value, and have added the several items of value together at the end. This however they did not do. The valuation list would be required for future rating purposes, and would be, if made as the defendants contend it ought to have been, most useful on such occasions, and especially if a farm were to be subsequently divided into two or more holdings amongst several persons. He referred also to the following statutes: 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, s. 28; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 54.

KELLY, C.B.—I think the valuation list made by the plaintiffs is in strict conformity with the Act of Parliament, and complies with the requirements of the 4th section, by which the valuer is required to give the particulars of the several hereditaments, and the amount at which they have been valued for rating purposes. This the valuers have done here, for each farm is one separate and complete "hereditament," and it cannot, I think, be successfully contended that the value of each separate field of a farm must be given. It was said that a more minute valuation would be of advantage in case a farm were subsequently divided, and there is no doubt that that might be of some use; but, on the other hand, it is a mere speculation that any particular farm would be afterwards divided; and further, a field might be of one value in 1877, and of a very different value three years hence. It is infinitely more convenient that the valuation list should be in strict conformity with the statute, that each hereditament—that is, each farm—should be valued, and not a portion of it. No doubt a field might be considered a "hereditament," but it is unnecessary and inconvenient, and going, I think, beyond the statutory requirements to give these minute descriptions of separate portions of the same farm. On these grounds I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment of the court in their favour.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The assessment in one parish may be fifty times as large as that in another. If a parish were of great extent the size of the valuation list would be enormous, supposing a value were to be put upon each particular field. Such an inconvenient practice should not be adopted unless it is rendered incumbent upon the valuer so to do by the Act of Parliament. But, in my opinion, the Act does not require it, and when the section says that the list is to "show the particulars of the several hereditaments," it does not mean every small field comprising the farm, but rather each "hereditament" or farm in particular.

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Inland revenue—Jeweller—Dealer in gold and silver—Goldsmiths' licence—Articles alleged to be gold or silver—Higher or lower scale—Inland Revenue Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), ss. 1, 3, 5—meaning of word "gold" in sects. 1 & 5.

*By the Inland Revenue Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), s. 1, persons selling articles "composed wholly or in part of gold" are charged, where the gold is of the weight of 2oz. or upwards, the sum of 5*l.* 15s. for a licence, and when under 2oz. in weight and above 2dwts. the sum of 2*l.* 6s.; and by sect. 5 articles "alleged to be composed wholly or in part of gold" are for the purposes of the Act deemed to be composed of gold as alleged, and if upon "the hearing of any information for any offence against the Act any question shall arise touching the quantity of gold in any article, the proof of such quantity shall lie upon the defendant."*

Held (by Kelly, C.B. and Cleasby, B.), on the construction of the above sections, first, that the word "gold" in sects. 1 and 5 of the Inland Revenue Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90) did not relate to or mean pure gold as obtained by alchemists or chemical analysts, but the ordinary "gold" of commerce, using the word as understood in common parlance; and secondly, that a goldsmith selling a chain as and for "a gold chain" weighing more than 2oz. must hold a licence on the higher scale of duty entitling him to trade in articles "composed wholly or in part of gold where the gold

CASE stated by me, the undersigned metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Stepney, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon the application of the appellant:

1. Upon the hearing of an application by the appellant against the respondent, under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 3 that the respondent did, on 14th Dec. 1876, at Stepney, deal in plate without a proper licence in that behalf . . . whereby the respondent has forfeited 50l., I acquitted the respondent by dismissing the information.

2. The following facts were either found before me or admitted by both parties:

3. That the appellant was an officer of excise, and the said information was commenced and prosecuted by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

That on the 14th Dec. the appellant went to the shop of the respondent, who carried on business as a jeweller, at 565, Commercial-road, Stepney, where the appellant bought a guard chain, which was offered for sale and sold to him as a gold chain, for 14l., weighing 2oz. 11dwt. 10 grains, respondent having in force a licence to deal in plate, taken out by him under the said Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), in respect of his said shop, for which he paid 2l. 6s.

4. The amount of pure gold contained in the said chain was less than 2oz.

5. On the part of the appellant, it was contended that, inasmuch as the chain in question, as offered for sale and sold, was alleged to be a gold chain, it must, under sect. 5 of the said Act, be taken to be composed of gold as alleged; that no question could arise under the said section touching the quantity of gold contained in an article alleged to be gold; and that, as the weight of the gold chain was proved to be 2oz. or upwards, the sale thereof was not authorised by the licence granted to the respondent at the lower rate of duty; and that the respondent, not having in force a licence at the higher rate of duty, had, by the sale of the said chain, incurred the penalty of 50l. named in the 3rd section of the Act.

6. On the part of the respondent it was contended that, as the article in question contained less than 2oz. of gold, he was properly licensed.

7. I, being of opinion that the respondent was right in his contention, dismissed the information.

8. The question of law upon which the case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore is, whether, under the said Act, the actual weight of the article, or the weight of the pure gold contained therein, is to be taken as the proper test for assessing the licence duty.

The points raised by the appellant were, first, that the chain was alleged to be a gold chain, and must be taken to be composed of gold under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 5; and, secondly, that the weight of the chain was proved to be 2oz. or upwards, and the sale thereof was not authorised by the licence granted to the respondent at the lower rate of duty.

The respondent's points were, first, that the fact that the chain was sold as a gold chain did not estop the respondent from showing the quantity of gold actually contained in it; and, secondly, that the quantity of gold contained in the chain being less than 2oz., the respondent was authorised to sell it under the licence held by him.

The following sections are material to this report. 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 1, enacts (inter alia);

In lieu of the duties now payable in Great Britain on licences to persons trading in, vending, or selling gold or silver plate, and in Ireland on licences to persons to sell or make gold or silver plate, there shall from and after the 5th July 1867 be charged and paid the following excise duties on licences to deal in plate, to be taken out yearly in the United Kingdom by the persons hereinafter mentioned (that is to say): by every person who shall trade in or sell any article composed wholly or in part of gold or silver, in respect of every house, shop, or place in which his trade or business shall be carried on, where the gold shall be above 2dwts. and under 2oz. in weight, or the silver above 5dwts. and under 30oz. in weight, the sum of two pounds six shillings.

Where the gold shall be of the weight of 2oz. or upwards, or the silver of the weight of 30oz. or upwards, the sum of five pounds fifteen shillings.

Sect. 3:

Every person who shall do any act or carry on any trade or business for which a licence to deal in plate is required by this Act without having in force a proper licence authorising him so to do, shall for every offence forfeit the sum of fifty pounds; and in any proceeding for the recovery of such penalty it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant did deal in plate without a proper licence in that behalf, and it shall not be necessary further or otherwise to describe the offence.

Sect. 5:

All articles sold or offered for sale or taken in pawn, or delivered out of pawn, and alleged to be composed wholly or in part of gold or silver, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed and taken to be composed of gold and silver respectively as alleged; and if upon the hearing of any information for any offence against the Act, any question shall arise touching the quantity of gold or silver contained in any article, the proof of such quantity shall lie upon the defendant.

O. Bowen for the appellant.—Though the amount of pure gold was under 2oz., the chain weighed over 2oz., and the respondent should have obtained a licence on the higher scale. If an article is sold as gold, it must, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be gold, and the respondent having sold the chain in question, which exceeded 2oz. in weight, as and for a gold chain, he is now bound thereby, and is estopped from showing the precise quantity of pure gold actually contained in it so as to escape the penalty for not having obtained the licence on the higher scale, which the appellant contends the respondent ought to have obtained. The word "alleged" in sect. 5 refers to an allegation made at the time of sale. The latter part of the same section throws upon the seller the onus of showing the quantity of gold in the particular article. He also referred to the following Acts:

31 Geo. 2, c. 32, s. 6; 32 Geo. 2, c. 24;

43 Geo. 3, c. 69; 6 Geo. 4, c. 118.

Anstie for the respondent, contra.—The word "gold" in the section in question means pure gold, and not a mixture of gold and alloy. The pure gold in the chain sold did not amount to 2oz., and therefore a licence on the lower scale was sufficient. The chain would be, and must be assumed to have been, Hall marked, and there would be no difficulty in estimating the exact amount of pure gold in it. Since the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 96, gold wares may be wrought of a lower standard than was formerly allowed, provided such standard is not less than one-third in the whole of fine gold; and by the regulations that have been issued in pursuance of the said Act, gold articles may be made and Hall marked containing 22, 18, 15, or 9 carat gold, out of a total of 24. In addition to the statutes already mentioned he referred to the following:

[Ex. Div.]

YOUNG (app.) v. COOK (resp.)

12 Geo. 2, c. 26; 38 Geo. 3, c. 69;
53 Geo. 3, c. 80; 59 Geo. 3, c. 32, and contended that, as this was a question arising on a statute imposing a tax upon the subject, the construction to be put upon it, if there was the least doubt upon the point, should be in favour of the subject and against the Crown.

Bowen was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—In this case I think that the respondent is subject to the higher duty on the licence under which he has carried on his business. The respondent is a jeweller, dealing amongst other articles in gold chains, and on the day in question the appellant went to the respondent's shop and asked for a gold chain, and a chain was accordingly produced and described by the respondent as a gold chain, and the price asked for it being paid, the chain was delivered to the appellant as a gold chain. The weight of the chain, or in other words, the quantity of gold in it, was upwards of 2oz. in weight. If therefore the respondent then dealt in an article of gold exceeding in weight or containing more than 2oz. of gold, he is liable to the higher duty on his licence, and the question is whether, it appearing beyond all doubt that the chain, if analysed, would be found to contain less than 2oz. of pure gold, the respondent is liable to the higher duty, or whether the licence on the lower scale applicable to the dealing in gold articles where the gold contained in them is less in quantity than 2oz. is a sufficient licence. The question arises entirely on the 5th section of the Act, taken together with the 1st section. The first part of the 5th section provides that "all articles sold or offered for sale . . . and alleged to be composed wholly or in part of gold or silver, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be made and taken to be composed of gold or silver respectively as alleged." Now what is the meaning of that word "alleged," which undoubtedly is an unfortunate word, and tends rather to mislead? It is not pretended that when the purchase and sale took place the respondent, on handing the chain to the purchaser said, "I allege this to be gold;" but it must be taken to mean (if it has any meaning at all in this important provision in the Act) what would have been more properly expressed by the word "described." As where, upon the purchase or sale of an article, the goldsmith, as between himself and his customer, describes or represents the article which he is selling to be gold, and if he does that, the article must be taken as against him to be gold. Referring to the article in question here, it was alleged—or, I would rather say, represented or described—by the respondent to be a "gold chain," and therefore it must be taken to be composed of gold, and if composed of gold, as there was more than 2oz. of gold in it, he is liable to the higher licence. That undoubtedly is the effect of the Act of Parliament, if we go no further than that particular provision. But the learned counsel for the respondent has referred to a separate and independent provision in the latter part of the same section that, "If, on the hearing of any information for any offence against this Act, any question shall arise touching the quantity of gold or silver contained in any article, the proof of such quantity shall lie upon the defendant;" and he has contended, with reference to what is contained in the 1st section of the Act, that that latter provision means the quantity of pure gold, and that this case comes within that provision, and that the question arose in this case whether the quantity of pure gold contained in the chain was or was not less than 2oz., and he referred to the 1st section of the Act as supporting that view of the matter. [His Lordship here read sect. 1, and then proceeded as follows:] It is said that the words, "any article composed wholly or in part of gold," in the 1st and 5th sections, really mean "any article composed wholly or in part of pure gold only," and that the other part may be of alloy. But that is not so. The meaning is quite obvious. Every article of commerce which is bought or sold in a goldsmith's or jeweller's shop, whether it is represented or sold as gold or silver, is known to be composed in part only of pure gold or silver, and in part of alloy. Let me take, for example, some article of silver, a metal which is more frequently dealt in probably than gold. No article is more common in a gold and silversmith's or jeweller's shop than silver candlesticks, and it often happens that besides the silver candlesticks and forming part of them, there are a pair of branches for extra lights, which are generally plated and not silver, and thus there is an article not wholly, but in part, silver. Now if a customer went into the shop and said, "I wish to buy a pair of silver candlesticks with the branches," and they were represented as being all of silver, I think that would be an allegation that they were all of silver within the meaning of the 5th section; and although it might turn out that in fact the branches were plated only, still the seller would be bound by what he had alleged or described the article to be, and would be liable to the higher duty if the whole article together amounted to more than 2oz. in weight. But if the tradesman had said, "The candlesticks are of silver, but the branches are plated," and on the sale of the article any question afterwards arose what amount of duty the seller was liable to, then, under the latter part of the 5th section, the proof of the quantity of silver contained in the candlesticks would lie upon him, and if he could show that though it was true the candlesticks were of silver, yet that the quantity of silver contained in them did not exceed 2oz. in weight, he would be liable to the lesser scale of duty only. The meaning is not that the use of the word "gold" or of the word "silver" in any part of the Act means pure gold or pure silver, but merely what is ordinarily called, or what is alleged by the seller to be, gold or silver; and the evidence in the case, whenever a question arises, is not as to what is pure gold or pure silver, but what in common parlance and commercially speaking is called gold or silver. Under these circumstances, therefore, in the case before us no question, I think, arises as to how much pure gold there is in the chain in question. It is merely what is the weight of gold in the article, using the word gold in its ordinary sense and acceptation in common parlance. I am of opinion, therefore, that we must determine that the defendant or the respondent in this case was liable to the higher amount of duty, and that the information must be corrected for that purpose.

CLARKE, B.—I am clearly of the same opinion. This Act, or rather the part of it referred to, relates to persons carrying on a trade in gold and silver plate, and to the granting to such persons licences for carrying on such trade, and to the imposition of certain duties payable by them for such licences. It relates, therefore, to persons dealing in gold and silver plate, in the ordinary sense and meaning of those words. It has no relation to alchemists or chemical analysts who are engaged in procuring pure gold or silver from the ore, or to any persons of that description. Now, the first section of the Act, after the enacting part of it, provides with regard to persons dealing in gold plate, which includes plate composed wholly or in part of gold, "that a duty is to be paid by such persons for a licence amounting to 5*l.* 15*s.* if the gold is of the weight of 20*z.* or upwards. Now, what is the meaning of the words "gold of the weight of 20*z.* or upwards?" Undoubtedly I think that, taken by themselves, these words signify not pure gold, which is commercially unknown, but gold with whatever alloy there is in it, whether it be 22, 18, 15, or 9 carat gold, or of any other standard. But the 5th section is introduced for the purpose of removing the difficulty of proof that might exist as to an article which was of gold "wholly or in part." As the Lord Chief Baron has said, if the article is described as consisting wholly or in part of gold, it is to be taken to be gold for the purposes of this Act as alleged. No doubt the higher duty in an article sold as gold is imposed upon persons dealing in that article, where it contains more than 20*z.* Now that was not, and could not be, disputed by the learned counsel for the defendant, reading the Act of Parliament only up to the middle of the 5th section; but he said that the necessary effect of the subsequent part of the 5th section was to give a different meaning, and to show that in estimating the quantity of gold for the purposes of this Act, which deals entirely with a commercial matter, the quantity of pure gold, difficult as it is to get at must be taken. Nothing could be more inconvenient, and it would be next to impossible, and would lead to the pulling to pieces and destroying of almost every manufactured article to attempt to get at it; but still those words cannot be rejected if any effect whatever can be given to them by reading the word "gold" in that particular clause to mean anything more than pure gold. If an article composed partly of gold and partly of silver—as for instance a silver racing cup with a gold horse on the top—is sold there is a duty payable in respect of the gold and in respect of the silver; but upon coming to consider whether there are 20*z.* of gold or not in it, how is that to be ascertained? The Revenue officers insist that there is more than 20*z.* of gold in the horse at the top, and the tradesman says there is less. You cannot break the cup to pieces, and weigh and analyse the particular parts separately; and therefore it is provided that upon the seller, who generally will have the means of knowing and proving the amount of gold in the article, shall be the burden of proof. That seems to me to be pretty clearly the sort of case to which that part of the section applies, where the article is alleged to be partly of gold, and the question is, how much? It is not necessary for the Crown to give any evidence of that. Being partly of gold, it may be taken to be of more than 20*z.* for the purposes of the Act, unless the contrary is shown by the tradesman. I do not find the difficulty which the learned counsel so strongly insisted upon as arising on the question which he raised entirely upon that part of the section; and unless there be that difficulty, I think it is as clear as any case can be. I agree, therefore, that the case must be sent back, with the intimation that the respondent must pay the higher duty.

REG. v. ROGERS. (a)

Jurisdiction—Venue—Embezzlement—Receipt of money in one county—Fraudulent representation of non-receipt made by letter posted to and received in another county.

It was the prisoner's duty as a country traveller to collect moneys and remit them at once to his employers. On the 18th April he received money in county Y.; on the 19th and 20th he wrote to his employers from Y., not mentioning that he had received the money; on the 21st April he wrote to them again from Y., thereby intending them to believe that he had not received the money. The letters were addressed to and received by his employers in county M., and written and posted in county Y.

Held (Huddleston, B. dissentiente), that the prisoner might be tried in county M. for the offence of embezzling the money.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions.

At a general session of the peace for the county of Middlesex held at the Guildhall, Westminster, on the 7th June 1877, the prisoner was tried on an indictment which charged him with having, when he was employed in the capacity of clerk or servant to Middleton Chapman and another, embezzled the sum of 10*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* received by him on their account.

The prisoner was employed by the prosecutors, who carry on business under the style of Chapman, Son, and Co., at Charterhouse-buildings, London, as their country traveller. It was part of his duty to collect outstanding accounts; and as to all moneys he might receive, to remit them "at once" to his employers in London either by post-office orders or bankers' drafts.

On the 12th April 1877, when he was starting on his first journey, a "list," of which the following is a copy, was handed to him, and he was requested to collect the accounts therein specified:

List of accounts received from customers on account of Chapman, Son and Co., for week ending April 14, 1877, by Mr. E. G. Rogers:

(a) Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(1.) James Wood and Co., York	2	7	6
(2.) T. and H. Chapman, York.....	11	3	6
(3.) Thomas Kidd, Hull	6	18	0
(4.) T. W. Carr, Scarborough	1	3	6

At the foot of this list there was a printed note as follows :

All moneys received as above must be remitted to the firm at once, and this list returned with the balance in hand at the end of each week.

Mr. M. Chapman, one of the prosecutors, drew the prisoner's attention to this note, and desired him under no circumstances to mix up moneys collected from customers with his expenses. Ten pounds were then paid him in advance for his travelling expenses.

On Wednesday, the 18th April, the prisoner, being then at York, received there from Messrs. T. and H. Chapman 10*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* cash in discharge of the account No. 2 in the above list. He never accounted to his masters for this money, nor informed them that he had received it; and under the present indictment he was charged with having embezzled it.

It appeared that on the same day that he was paid this account he received from the prosecutors a second sum of 10*l.* towards his travelling expenses, and a third sum of 10*l.* was remitted to him for these purposes on the 24th April. On the 19th and 20th April he was at Hull, and while there he wrote three letters to his employers, but he remitted no moneys, and in neither of these letters is there any reference to the account which had been paid to him by Messrs. Chapman, of York. On Saturday, the 21st April, the prisoner was at Doncaster, and there he wrote again to the prosecutors. All these letters were addressed to them at Charterhouse-buildings, in the county of Middlesex, and were there received by them through the post-office.

In his letter from Doncaster of the 21st April, after referring to Kidd's account (No. 3 in the above list), as to which he said Kidd had promised to remit the amount, the prisoner wrote as follows : "I have only two other accounts with which I have been furnished with statements to collect before I arrive at Scarborough, which, as I shall have to go through York, will attend to and remit you in due course."

The above list of accounts being the only statement that had been furnished to him, and the account due from Kidd having been specially mentioned in a former part of this letter, it is obvious that one of the only two other accounts, to which the prisoner here referred was T. and H. Chapman's account (No. 2), which in point of fact he had already received.

Other letters and telegrams passed between the prisoner and the prosecutors, to which it is unnecessary for the present purpose to advert.

On the 2nd May the prisoner was arrested at Newcastle. He was brought thence to London, and committed at Bow-street for trial upon the present charge at the Middlesex Sessions. When arrested he had only 4*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.* in money in his possession.

Upon the above facts it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that the indictment failed of proof; the embezzlement, if embezzlement there was, having been committed in the county of York, where the money was received and appropriated by him, and not in the county of Middlesex;

it having been the prisoner's duty to account and remit the amount "at once." On the other hand, the counsel for the Crown contended that the venue was well laid in Middlesex, inasmuch as the prisoner's letter of the 21st April amounted virtually to a denial in this county of the receipt of the money, that letter having been addressed by him to Charterhouse-buildings, London, and there received by his employers through the post-office.

Having doubts upon the question thus raised, I refused to direct an acquittal, and said I would reserve the question of venue for the Court of Appeal. I therefore left the question of embezzlement to the jury irrespective of venue; but with regard to the alleged denial in Middlesex, I requested them to say whether in their opinion the prisoner intended that the prosecutors should understand, from the aforesaid statements contained in his said letter of the 21st April, that he had not yet received the amount due from Chapmans of York, and had thus in effect rendered a wilfully false account.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and answered these questions in the affirmative.

I postponed sentence pending the decision of this case.

The question reserved is whether, under the circumstances above disclosed, the venue was well laid in Middlesex. If the Court should be of opinion that it was, the conviction to stand; if of the contrary opinion, to be quashed.

I beg to refer to Reg. v. Murdock (2 Den. C.C. 298, 5 Cox C. C. 360), and to the observations thereupon of Alderson, B., in Reg. v. Davison (7 Cox C. C. 159.)

P. H. EDLIN.

No counsel appeared to argue on behalf of the prisoner.

Besley for the prosecution.—The venue was properly laid in the county of Middlesex. As soon as the prisoner received the money charged in the indictment to have been embezzled it became his masters' property, and it was his duty to have remitted it at once to the prosecutors. The letter of the 21st April, as found by the jury, conveyed the false representation that he had not received the money. This letter was addressed to and received by the prosecutors in Middlesex, and the prisoner's false statement therein was, when the letter arrived, a false representation made by the prisoner in Middlesex; that is an act done by him in Middlesex. In Reg. v. Leech (7 Cox C. C. 100) a letter containing a false pretence was received by the prosecutor through the post in the borough of C., but it was written and posted out of the borough. In consequence of the letter the prosecutor sent through the post to the writer a post-office order for 2*l.*, which sum was received by the writer out of the borough; and it was held that the writer might be indicted for false pretences in C. In the present case there was no false representation to the prosecutors that the money had not been received until the receipt of the letter of the 21st April in London. The mere posting of the letter was not a false representation to them. The non-delivery of the money over to the master per se was not embezzlement. There was no complete embezzlement in Yorkshire. Up to the moment of the false representation made to the prosecutor in

KELLY, O.B.—I am clearly of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The prisoner is charged with having, while he was employed in the capacity of clerk or servant to the prosecutors, embezzled the moneys of his employers. It was part of the prisoner's duty to collect outstanding accounts; and as to all moneys he might receive it was clearly his duty to remit them at once to his employers from the place where he received them to his employers in the county of Middlesex. On the 18th April the prisoner received the money embezzled at York, but did not account to his employers for the money, or inform them that he had received it. If the case had stopped there, and there had been no other evidence, or if it had merely appeared that he did not remit the money on the same or next day after he had received it, there would have been no evidence of the crime of embezzlement in Middlesex. But on the 18th April, the day of the receipt (and it does not appear in what form he received the money, or at what time of the day) he received 10*l.* from his employers for travelling expenses. Then on the 19th and 20th April he was at Hull, and while there he wrote two letters to his employers, but he remitted no moneys, and did not refer to the receipt of this money in either of the letters. It may well be that he had no time or means for remitting the money which he had received on the 18th, but it was clearly his duty to have remitted it within a reasonable time after his arrival at Hull. On the 21st April the prisoner wrote again from Doncaster to his employers in London; and although in that letter he does not expressly state that he had not received the money, yet it may fairly be implied from the contents of that letter, that he wished his employers to infer that he had not received it. This letter was received by his employers in Middlesex, and it is the same as if he said to them in Middlesex that he had not received the money. The question is, was the offence of embezzlement complete on the writing of that letter in the county of York. I am not prepared to say that on the writing of that letter there was not evidence of a complete embezzlement, and that the prisoner might not have been indicted for it in Yorkshire; but the fact that the letter was received by the employers in due course of post in Middlesex, and until its delivery the false statement that the money had not been received by the prisoner was never made to or reached them, in my opinion. Res v. Burdett and several other cases, shows that the offence of embezzlement was complete in the county of Middlesex. The cases of Reg. v. Taylor, and Reg. v. Murdock, are authorities in affirmance of the same principle. In Reg. v. Murdock, it was the prisoner's duty to go into Derbyshire every Monday and to sell goods and receive money for them there, and to return with it to his master in Nottingham on the Saturday. Having received two sums in Derbyshire, he did not return on the following Saturday, nor at all to his master, but appropriated them to his own use. About two months afterwards the master met the prisoner in Nottingham, and asked him what he had done with the money. He said he was sorry for what he had done, he had spent it. The court held that that was evidence of an admission of the offence in the county of Nottingham, for which the prisoner could be indicted in the county of Nottingham. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed.

FIELD, J.—I am also of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed, and I have come to this conclusion on the ground that a material part of the offence was committed in the county of Middlesex. It was not the duty of the prisoner to remit the specific money which he had received, but it was his duty to remit that money or its equivalent at once to his employers, i.e., in the course of the week in which he received it. On the 18th of April the prisoner received the money in question at York, and on the 19th and 20th the prisoner was at Hull, and wrote letters to his employers in London, saying nothing about the receipt of the money at York. And on the 21st, when at Doncaster, he wrote a letter to his employers in London; and, in answer to a question left to them, the jury say that the prisoner intended that the prosecutors should understand from the statements in that letter that he had not then received the amount in question; and the prisoner had thus in effect rendered a wilfully false account. Upon these facts the question arises whether any material part of this offence was committed in the county of Middlesex? Starting with this, that the law presumes every man to be innocent till he is proved to be guilty, I am at a loss to find any evidence of the complete offence of embezzlement in Yorkshire, except the writing and posting there of the letters addressed to the prisoner's employers in Middlesex. On the authority of Evans v. Nicholson (45 L. J. 111, C. P., n. 4) which decided that a letter, in which the defendant admitted a debt and promised to pay it, addressed to and received by the plaintiff in the City of London, was evidence of an account stated in the City of London, I think that the letter of the 21st of April addressed to and received by the prosecutors, and intended to act on their minds, in Middlesex, was in effect an act done by the prisoner in Middlesex. The case to my mind is the same as if a man standing in one county with a long spear or a pistol kills a man in the adjoining county, or as if a man with one leg in one county and one in another does a criminal act. In Res v. Burdett (4 B. & Ald. 95), which has been followed universally, the libel was contained in a letter written in county L., but received in county M., and it was held that the defendant might be indicted in either county. The case of Res v. Taylor (3 Bos. & Pul. 596) also makes the matter very plain. In that case the prosecutor's servant received 10*s.* for him in the county of Surrey, after which the same evening he returned to his master, in the county of Middlesex, who asked him if he had brought the money and the prisoner said he had not, and that it had not been paid to him; and it was held that he was properly indicted in the county of Middlesex. Lord Alvanley, O.J., said: "The receipt of the money was perfectly legal, and there was no evidence that he ever came to the determination of appropriating the money to his own use until after he had returned into the county of Middlesex. It was not proved that the money ever was embezzled until the prisoner was in the county of Middlesex. . . . In such a case as this, even if there had been evidence of the prisoner having spent the money in Surrey, it would not necessarily confine the trial of the offence to the county of Surrey. But here there is no evidence of any act to bring the prisoner within the statute until he was called upon by his master to account." The act of non-accounting is a continuing act, and extended in this case to the time of the receipt of the prisoner's letter of the 21st April in the county of Middlesex. Manle, J. put the matter in much the same way in Reg. v. Murdock. "It appears to me that there was evidence to go to the jury that the offence was committed when the prisoner met his master in Nottingham, and, being asked by him for the money, did not pay over the amount." I think, therefore, that the conviction should be affirmed.

REG. v. ROGERS.

HUDDESTON, B.—I have the misfortune to differ from the other judges of the court. I think that the conviction was not right for the following reasons: First, let us consider what the offence of embezzlement is. It is thus defined by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68: "Whoever being a clerk or servant, or being employed for the purpose, or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, shall fraudulently embezzle any chattel, money, or valuable security, which shall be delivered to, or received or taken into possession by him for or in the name or on the account of his master or employer, or any part thereof, shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen the same from his master or employer." The act of embezzlement is therefore a stealing of the master's money. The evidence of the act of embezzlement is the receipt of the money by the servant, and the appropriation of it to his own use; and the non-accounting or refusal to account for the money received is evidence merely to show that the servant has stolen it. In the present case the facts show that it was the prisoner's duty to have remitted the moneys received at once to his masters. By that I do not understand to remit in the course of the week, but by the next post, or within a reasonable time. The prisoner received the money on the 18th April at York, and he wrote two letters from Hull on the 19th and 20th April, by each of which he ought, in the course of his duty, to have remitted the money, and his not having done so was very good evidence that he had then appropriated to his own use the money which he had received at York on the 18th. Then again, on the 21st April, when at Doncaster, he wrote a letter to his masters, by which, as the jury have found, the prisoner intended his masters to believe that he had not then received that money, and he had thus, in effect, rendered a wilfully false account. That is strong evidence to show that the prisoner had embezzled the money before the 19th or 20th April in Yorkshire; and I think therefore that the stealing of the money took place in Yorkshire, and that there was strong evidence of that on receipt of the letter in Middlesex. The offence was a complete offence in Yorkshire when the false statement in the letter that he had not received it was written. When it reached the masters' mind, in my opinion, is not material. When the letter containing the false statement was put in the post it could not be recalled, and if the letter had not reached its destination the offence would have still been complete in Yorkshire. So far as regards principle. Then how stands the case as to the authorities? As to the cases of libel and false pretences: in libel the main ingredient is the uttering or publication of the libel, and in Rees v. Burdett the libel was published where the letter was received in the county of Middlesex. So, as to the crime of false pretences, the offence is not complete until the false pretences reach or are made to the person intended to be defrauded. As to the cases of embezzlement. In Rees v. Hobson the prisoner received the money in Shropshire, his orders being to take it to his master in Staffordshire the same night. He did not take it, but on the following evening told his master in Staffordshire that he had not received it; and the majority of the Judges were of opinion that the indictment might be tried in Shropshire, where the prisoner received the money, "the statute having made the receiving property and embezzling it amount to a larceny, made the offence a felony where the property was first taken, and the offender might therefore be indicted in that or in any other county into which he carried the property." In the case of Rees v. Taylor the prisoner, after receiving the money in Surrey, returned to his master in Middlesex, and told him he had not received it, and that was held to be good evidence of the offence having been committed in Middlesex, because there was nothing to show that the prisoner had appropriated the money to his own use in Surrey. Lord Alvanley, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "In the present case no doubt can be entertained. The prisoner, being sent over Blackfriars Bridge into the county of Surrey, there received 10s. for his master. The receipt of that money was perfectly legal, and there was no evidence that he ever came to the determination of appropriating the money to his own use until after he had returned into the county of Middlesex. It was not proved that the money ever was embezzled until the prisoner was in the county of Middlesex. In cases of this sort the nature of the thing embezzled ought not to be laid out of the question. The receipt of money is not like the receipt of an individual thing, where the receipt may be attended with circumstances which plainly indicate an intention to steal, by showing an intention in the receiver to appropriate the thing to his own use. Thus, if a servant receive a horse for his master, and sell it before he gets out of the county where he first received it, it might be said that he is guilty of the whole offence in the county." In the present case the receipt of the money was in Yorkshire, and the three letters written in Yorkshire were evidence of the prisoner's intention to appropriate the money in Yorkshire, and therefore the whole offence was complete in Yorkshire. Lord Alvanley, C.J. then proceeds: "But, with respect to money, it is not necessary that the servant should deliver over to his master the identical pieces of money which he receives, if he should have lawful occasion to pay them away. In such a case as this, therefore, even if there had been evidence of the prisoner having spent the money on the other side of Blackfriars Bridge, it would not necessarily confine the trial of the offence to the county of Surrey. But here there is no evidence of any act to bring the prisoner within the statute until he is called upon by his master to account. When called upon by his master to account for the money the prisoner denied that he had ever received it. This was the first act from which the jury could with certainty say that the prisoner intended to embezzle the money. In this case there was no evidence of the prisoner having done any act to embezzle in the county of Surrey, nor could the offence be complete, nor the prisoner be guilty, within the statute until he refused to account to his master. We are, therefore, of opinion that the prisoner was properly indicted in the county of Middlesex." Here the first act—the receipt of the money—was in Yorkshire, and all the three letters, evidencing the intent to appropriate the money, were written in Yorkshire. The offence therefore, in my opinion, was complete in Yorkshire. This opinion is supported by the judgment of Maule, J. in Reg. v. Murdock. Lord Campbell, C.J. there said: "The jury may have thought that the story which the prisoner told of having spent the money was false, or that he had spent it in the town of Nottingham." Parke, B. said: "I think on consideration that there was evidence for the jury of an embezzlement in Nottingham by reason of the prisoner's not returning and accounting to his master in Nottingham as he ought to have done. The fact of his spending the money is not of itself a sufficient embezzlement." Maule, J. said: "I agree in the conclusion at which my Lord Campbell and my brother Parke have arrived; but I do not agree in the view which the latter has taken of the matter. It appears to me that there was evidence to go to the jury that the offence was committed when the prisoner met his master in Nottingham, and, being asked by him for the money, did not pay over the amount. The mere omission to account, if the prisoner never had returned to the town of Nottingham, would not in my view of the law have rendered him liable to be tried in Nottingham. Suppose that he had gone to Derbyshire and spent the money there, and stayed there six months, and had never returned to Nottingham, but had been afterwards apprehended in Derbyshire, according to my brother Parke's view the prisoner would have been indictable in Nottingham. But I cannot think that that can be the case. The man, when he went into Derbyshire, went upon a lawful errand: it was his duty to receive the money. If he never afterwards returned into Nottingham, he could not, I think, be guilty of embezzlement in Nottingham. The cases which say that non-accounting is sufficient evidence of embezzlement have all this fact, that the man is in the county in which he refuses to account." Martin, B. took the same view as Maule, J. in that case. In my opinion, therefore, the crime of embezzlement is complete the moment the servant intends to steal his master's money, and here that was shown to be in Yorkshire. In Reg. v. Davison it was held, and as I think correctly, that the non-accounting was no part of the crime of embezzlement. I think, therefore, that there was no jurisdiction in the county of Middlesex, and that the conviction cannot be sustained.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed on the ground that a material part of the offence, that is, the fraudulently non-accounting for the money, was committed in the county of Middlesex by the posting at Doncaster of the letter of the 21st April addressed to and received by and intended to reach the prosecutors in Middlesex. In that letter there was a fraudulent representation made in Doncaster, which continued until it reached the master of the prisoner in Middlesex. That was a fraudulent act, and a continuing act; and I am therefore of opinion that there was jurisdiction to try this indictment in the county of Middlesex.

MANISTY, J.—I am also of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The consequences would be very serious if we were to hold that a prisoner could only be indicted in the county in which the offence was first committed. Take the present case. The prisoner was arrested on the 2nd May in Newcastle; and there was evidence that he had then appropriated the money, and there was evidence of the embezzlement therefore in Newcastle. If he had been indicted there, could the prisoner have said, I committed the offence in the county of Middlesex by fraudulently stating I had not received the money, and therefore I ought to be tried there? Here he wrote from Yorkshire to his masters in Middlesex, which is just the same as if he in person had said it in the county of Middlesex.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Thursday, Nov. 22.

(Before BRAMWELL, BRETT, and COTTON, L.JJ.)

GOODHEW v. WILLIAMS. (a)

Qualification of vestryman—Acting without qualification—Action for penalty—Metropolitan Management Acts, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 6, 54; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, s. 4.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 6, no person can be elected or act as vestryman unless he be occupier of a house, &c., and rated or assessed at a certain rental.

By sect. 18, if there is a poll at an election of vestrymen, the inspectors of votes are to decide upon the persons duly qualified to fill the office.

By sect. 54, any person acting as vestryman without being qualified by rating and occupation as required by the Act, is liable to a penalty.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, s. 4, occupiers who claim to be rated, and pay or tender the rate, are entitled to have their names put on the rate, and if the overseers neglect to put the names on, the occupiers shall be deemed to have been rated from the period at which the rate was made.

Defendant occupied premises jointly with his father. A rate was made on the father only. Defendant asked to have his name put on the rate, which was not done. Afterwards defendant was nominated as vestryman. The inspectors declared him elected, and he sat and voted. Subsequently defendant demanded that his name should be put on the rate, which was done, and the rate was paid by defendant and his father jointly.

In an action for a penalty for acting as vestryman without being qualified;

Held (affirming the judgment of Manisty, J.) that defendant was not qualified when he acted, and was not to be deemed to have been rated under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, s. 4; that the decision of the inspectors that he was duly elected was not final, and therefore that defendant was liable to the penalty.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of Manisty, J. in an action in the Common Pleas Division.

The action was brought under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 54, to recover a penalty from the defendant for having acted as a member of the vestry of the parish of Rotherhithe without being qualified by rating and occupation as required by that Act.

The defendant and his father and brother became, in the year 1874, joint occupiers of certain premises in the parish, where they carried on business in partnership in the name of Williams and Son. The value of the premises was sufficient to qualify both the defendant and his father as joint occupiers under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 6.

On the 11th of April a rate was made on the defendant's father, the defendant's name not being then on the rate. Afterwards the defendant wrote to the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, requesting that his name should be placed upon the rate book as partner in the firm of Williams and Son.

On the 16th of May he was elected a member of the vestry. He was objected to, and the inspectors decided that he was duly qualified, and, on 17th May, made a return declaring him elected. In the same month (May) a demand of the rate was made on the defendant's father only. On the 6th June the defendant sat and voted as a member of the vestry. The defendant wrote to the churchwardens on the 5th July, and again on the 26th July, requiring the demand note to be altered. It was altered by the insertion of the words "and Son;" and in October the rate was paid by the defendant and his father jointly. The learned judge decided that the defendant was not qualified, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 6, to act as a vestryman, and was therefore liable to the penalty under sect. 54, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

The following are the statutory provisions on which the decision of the case turned:—18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 (an Act for the better local management of the Metropolis), s. 6:

The vestry elected under this Act in any parish shall consist of persons rated or assessed to the relief of the poor upon a rental of not less than 40*l.* per annum; and no person shall be capable of acting or being elected as one of such vestry for any parish unless he be the occupier of a house, lands, tenements, or hereditaments in such parish, and be rated or assessed as aforesaid upon such rental as aforesaid within such parish. Provided always, that in any parish in which the number of poor-rate assessments at 40*l.* or upwards does not exceed one-sixth of the whole number of such assessments, it shall not be necessary, in order to qualify a person to be a vestryman, that the amount of rental upon which he is rated or assessed as aforesaid exceed 25*l.* Provided also that the joint occupation of any such premises as aforesaid, and a joint rating in respect thereof, shall be sufficient to qualify each joint occupier in case the amount of rental on which all such occupiers are jointly rated will, when divided by the number of occupiers, give for each such occupier a sum not less than the amount hereinbefore required.

Sect. 15:

The rate collectors, or persons appointed by them, shall attend the churchwardens and persons presiding at elections under this Act, and inspectors of votes, to assist in ascertaining that the persons presenting themselves to vote are parishioners rated to the relief of the poor in the parish, or the respective wards thereof, and duly qualified to vote at the election.

Sect. 16:

On the day of election of vestrymen and auditors in any parish under this Act the parishioners then rated to the relief of the poor in the parish, or, where the parish is divided into wards under this Act, in the ward thereof for which the election is holden, and who are desirous of voting, shall meet at the place appointed for such election, and shall then and there nominate two ratepayers of the parish, or (if the parish be divided into wards) of the ward for which the election is holden, as fit and proper persons to be inspectors of votes; and the churchwardens, or, in the case of a ward election, such one of the churchwardens as is present thereat, or, where one of the churchwardens is not present, the person appointed by them to preside thereat, shall immediately after such nomination as aforesaid by the parishioners nominate two other such ratepayers to be such inspectors; and, after such nominations, the said parishioners shall elect such persons duly qualified as may be there proposed for the offices of vestrymen and auditors or auditor; and the chairman at such meeting shall declare the names of the parishioners who have been elected by a majority of votes at such meeting. . . .

Sect. 17:

Provided always that any five ratepayers may then and there, in writing or otherwise, demand a poll, which shall be taken by ballot. . . .

Sect. 18:

The inspectors for the parish or ward (as the case may be) shall forthwith meet together, and proceed to examine the said votes; and, if necessary, shall continue the examination by adjournments from day to day, not exceeding two days (Sunday excepted) until they have decided upon the persons duly qualified according to the provisions of this Act who may have been chosen to fill the aforesaid offices.

Sect. 19:

In case an equality of votes appear to the aforesaid inspectors to be given for any two or more persons to fill either of the said offices, the inspectors shall decide by lot upon the person to be chosen.

Sect. 22:

The inspectors shall, immediately after they have decided upon whom the aforesaid elections have fallen, deliver to the churchwardens, or to one of them, or other the person presiding at the election, a list of the persons chosen by the parishioners to act as vestrymen . . . and the said list, or a copy thereof, shall be published in the parish as herein provided.

Sect. 54:

. . . Any person who acts as a member of any such vestry as aforesaid, without being qualified by rating and occupation as required by this Act, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of 50*l.*, which may be recovered by any person who may sue for the same in any of the superior courts of law, with full costs of suit . . .

19 & 20 Vict. c. 112 (an Act to amend the last-mentioned Act), sect. 4:

It shall be lawful for any person occupying any tenement within any parish to claim to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect thereof in the rate for the time being, and in all rates to be thereafter made in respect of such tenement, whether the landlord be or be not liable to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect thereof; and upon such occupier so claiming by notice in writing left at the office or place of residence of the overseers of the poor of the parish, or one of them, and actually paying or tendering at such office or place of residence the full amount of the last-made rate then payable in respect of such premises, such overseers are hereby required to put the name of such occupier on the rate for the time being, and also, without further claim, to put his name upon every subsequent rate made during the time such occupier continues in the occupation of the same premises; and, in case the said overseers neglect or refuse so to do, such occupier shall nevertheless for the purposes of the said Act be deemed to have been rated to the said rate in respect of such premises from the period at which the rate for the time being in respect of which he so claimed to be rated as aforesaid was made, and thenceforth so long as he continues in the occupation of the same premises, provided always that every person so claiming as aforesaid shall in respect of every rate for the relief of the poor made after such claim as aforesaid, while he continues to occupy the same premises, be liable to the same extent and in the same manner as if his name had been put on such rate.

Philbrick, Q.C. and J. B. Wright for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable to the penalty, for he was qualified by assessment. Even if he was not in fact rated or assessed within the meaning of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 6, he was entitled to be deemed to have been rated by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, s. 4, and therefore this latter section has the effect of exempting him from liability to the penalty. Further the inspectors of votes are to decide on the qualification of candidates by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 18. They have given their decision in favour of the defendant, and that decision is final, and cannot be questioned in this action. They cited

Reg. v. Inhabitants of Hulme, 4 Q. B. 538;
Moss v. Overseers of St. Michael, Lichfield, 7 M. & G. 72;
Ex parte Ross; re The Vestry of St. Pancras, 26 L. J. 812, Q. B.

Joseph Brown, Q.C. for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 54. There is no mention of assessment in that section, and assessed in sect. 6 only means the same as rated. There is nothing in the Act to give power to the inspectors to pronounce a final judgment on the question of qualification. It can never have been the intention of the Legislature that a person who had once incurred a penalty by voting when he was not qualified should be able to get rid of that liability by anything that he might do afterwards.

Philbrick, Q.C. in reply.

BRAMWELL, L. J.—I am of opinion that this judgment ought to be affirmed. I think it is clear that the defendant was neither rated nor assessed to the relief of the poor when he acted as vestryman, and therefore was not capable of acting or of being elected. It seems to me that it is immaterial whether there is any difference between rating and assessing or not, but I think there is none. The words of the penalty clause (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 54) are remarkable. They are these: "Any person who acts as a member of any such vestry as aforesaid without being qualified by rating and occupation as required by this Act shall for every such offence be liable," &c. One might infer from these words that a person acting without election, if he were duly qualified by rating and occupation, would be exempt from the penalty; but it seems that the defendant was not properly elected, because he was not qualified by rating and occupation when he acted as a vestryman. Then it is said that by sect. 4 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112 the defendant may be deemed to have been rated for the purposes of the earlier Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and that if the events there mentioned took place after the defendant had been elected, after he had acted, and after the action had been brought—if he then did what is provided by sect. 4, he procured a pardon. I am not sure that the section means that the rate must actually be paid or tendered at the office of the overseer at the exact time of making the claim; but it is not necessary to decide this. Suppose the name of the occupier were put on the rate, no consequence is stated as following from his name being put on; and unless we are to suppose that he was to have some extra benefit from the overseers not doing their duty, he would only be in the same position, if he had done what is required by the section, and his name had not been put on the rate, as he would have been in if they had put his name on. If we look at the words of the different sections the defendant is liable to a penalty after he acts, and the clause in sect. 4 is not retrospective, but only enabling. Then, as to the other point, it is contended that the decision of the inspectors was final; but I cannot think it was. Whether they have power to inquire into the matter of qualification at all or not, I do not decide: but I am satisfied that their decision is not final. Their decision would only come in where there is a demand for a poll. By the words of sect. 16 it is manifest that there is no judgment without appeal to be given by them. There is no provision as to how the inspectors are to get information and adjudicate. The words of sect. 15 almost negative the contention put forward on behalf of the defendant. I think the judgment is right, and it ought to be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—It seems to me that the question as to the construction of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 54, is the principal question in this case, and I think the proper construction is, that if the person who acts as vestryman is not qualified at the time when he acts the penalty arises. But it is said that the defendant was qualified because he was assessed, and that raises the question whether the word "rated" and the word "assessed" in sect. 6 are different from one another in their meaning. The word "assessed" is left out in sect. 54, which is a strong circumstance to show that the two words mean the same in sect. 6. But this defendant was never assessed, because his name was never brought before the overseers. The only persons who can assess are the overseers, and therefore he was not, in fact, qualified. But it is said that he may be deemed to have been qualified, and this depends upon the meaning of sect. 4 of the second Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 112). I should be sorry to doubt that it is sufficient if a person claims to be rated, and afterwards tenders or pays the rate, or to suggest that this would not be within the section. But, assuming that payment or tender at a different time from the time when the claim is made is within sect. 4, a person is not in a position equivalent to being rated before he has either paid or tendered the amount of the rate. Under the Registration Acts the time fixed is the 31st July, and the question is whether the person claiming to be entitled to vote is qualified at that date. The inquiry usually takes place in September or October, but it has never been suggested that a claim and payment after the 31st July would show that the person claiming was properly qualified. A claim made before acting, followed by a payment made after acting, does not qualify, and therefore the defendant in the present case was not duly qualified, nor is he to be deemed to have been qualified at the time when he acted as vestryman. The question then remains whether the decision of the inspectors is final or not. I have great doubt whether the inspectors have power to inquire into the question of qualification at all. I rather think that they have only power to inquire as to whether the necessary formalities have been complied with; but, if they have power to inquire into the matter of qualification, I cannot see that their decision is final. They are not a court of exclusive jurisdiction on the status of individuals.

ASHWORTH v. HEBDEN BRIDGE LOCAL BOARD.

[CHAN. DIV.]

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the inspectors had not power to determine finally. There should be very clear words to exempt the defendant from the penalty, to which he would otherwise be liable under the Act. I think sect. 4 of the later Act does not exempt him. The judgment which has been given for the plaintiff must therefore be affirmed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Thursday, Nov. 29.

(Before MALINS, V.C.)

ASHWORTH v. HEBDEN BRIDGE LOCAL BOARD. (a)

Local board — Execution of arbitrary powers —

Injunction to restrain.

In July 1877 the justices of the peace made orders against the plaintiff and others, one of whom was L., for payment to the defendants of the expense of repairing a street. It was agreed that the order should not be enforced for three months, in order to abide the decision on a case to be presented by L. to the Queen's Bench upon a point of law. L. appealed to the Quarter Sessions, and, the order against him having been quashed on the ground of a technical error, he did not take a case to the Queen's Bench.

The plaintiff was not told of what had taken place, and in November following, her time for appealing having gone by, an order to levy the amount against her was obtained from the justices.

On motion by the plaintiff, and on her undertaking to assent to the statement of a case to the Queen's Bench on the point of law, and on her bringing the amount claimed into court,

The Court, considering the plaintiff had been misled by the defendants, restrained them from levying, unless or until she should have an opportunity of stating a case to the Queen's Bench.

This was a motion to restrain the defendants from levying a distress upon the goods of the plaintiff, or from taking any other proceedings, contrary to an alleged agreement, to enforce a certain order made by the justices of the peace of the West Riding of Yorkshire, at Halifax, against the plaintiff, or unless or until the plaintiff should have an opportunity of appealing, or should be held entitled to appeal against such orders.

In the month of May 1875 the defendants gave notice to the owners of certain houses fronting a street called Albert-street within their district, and among others to James Lister and the plaintiff, to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel Albert-*street within one month from the date thereof. These notices being disregarded, the defendants themselves executed the work, and on the 6th Nov. 1876 gave notice to the plaintiff that they had executed the works, the expenses of which amounted to 883*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*, and that in pursuance of sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 they thereby apportioned the sum of 229*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* as the proportion of such expenses to be paid by the plaintiff, and that the aforesaid apportionment would be binding and conclusive upon her unless within three months from the date of the notice she should by written notice dispute the same. The said James Lister was also assessed at the sum of 367*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* in respect of his apportionment of such expenses. Several other of the owners of the contiguous property were also assessed in various sums. No notice of objection within the statutory three months having been given, summonses were issued against the various parties in respect thereof.*

*Several of the summonses were heard before the magistrates on the 3rd July 1877, including those against the plaintiff and James Lister, but in many of the cases there was no dispute as to the amount of the apportionment, and there was no dispute on this account in the case of the plaintiff. The case of James Lister was taken first, when it was especially submitted on his behalf, as a point of law, that Albert-street, having been opened to the public eighteen or twenty years ago by the owners, and having been lighted and scavenged by the defendants, had become a highway reparable by the inhabitants at large, although there had been no formal adoption of the street. The justices, however, overruled the objection, and found that the street was not reparable by the inhabitants at large, and made an order against James Lister for payment of the 367*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.

After the justices had given their decision against Lister, his solicitor applied to them to grant him a case to the Court of Queen's Bench in order to determine the point of law whether or not Albert-street had become a highway reparable by the inhabitants at large, and the justices agreed to grant a case, and, as appeared by the affidavit of the clerk of the defendants, the justices agreed with the consent of the defendants to postpone the execution of the order for three months from that date, to abide the decision (if any obtained within that time) of the Court of Queen's Bench on that question.

*Subsequently the case of the plaintiff was called on, and an order was made against her for payment of the 229*l.* 18*s.* 5*d., and, as appeared by the affidavit of the clerk of the defendants, it was agreed in her case also that the order should not be enforced against her for three months, to abide the decision (if any obtained within that time) of the Court of Queen's Bench on the point of law raised by Lister.

There was some conflict of evidence as to the time during which the justices had agreed to postpone the execution of the order, it being alleged by affidavit on the plaintiff's behalf that the order against her was suspended generally to abide the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench.

On the 16th July 1877 Lister gave notice of appeal against the magistrates' order to the quarter sessions on various grounds, one of which (the 8th) was, that Albert-street was a public highway reparable by the inhabitants at large. The appeal to the quarter sessions was heard at Wakefield on the 17th Oct. 1877, when the order against Lister was quashed on the technical ground that it adjudged him to be imprisoned with "hard labour" in default of payment, instead of adjudging imprisonment only. Lister having succeeded on the technical ground, did not take the case to the Queen's Bench.

On the 2nd Nov. 1877 the clerk to the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff that he should apply to the magistrates on the following day for an order to enforce the order of the 3rd July, whereupon the plaintiff immediately instructed her solicitor to protest against such an order being made against her, on the ground that it had been decided that her case was to be governed by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lister's case.

The plaintiff by her solicitor attended before the magistrates on the following day, when they decided, "If the parties can agree upon any mode in which the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench can be taken on the point of law on which the case was granted on the hearing, without prejudice to the local board as regards time, the bench will be glad; but in the absence of any agreement to this effect the order will be enforced." They also stated that the distress warrant would be dated as of the 3rd Nov., and handed over to their clerk, who would adopt such steps as he should think fit in the matter.

The plaintiff by her affidavit alleged that, although the clerk of the defendants knew in July 1877 that Lister was appealing to the Court of Quarter Sessions instead of the Queen's Bench, it was not until after the appeal had been heard on the 17th Oct. 1877 that the defendant's clerk notified to her any objection to the course Lister was taking in going before the Court of Quarter Sessions instead of to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that she had no knowledge that this was the fact until the 20th Oct. 1877, and that in consequence her opportunity of appealing against the order of the 3rd July 1877 had passed by, and she was unable to get a case stated to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that had she not been so misled she should have either appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions against the order, or have taken a case to the Court of Queen's Bench, it being upon the faith of the arrangement made on the 3rd July 1877 that she had taken no steps either in stating a case to the Court of Queen's Bench or in appealing to the quarter sessions.

The writ in the action was issued on the 5th Nov. 1877, and on the day following the plaintiff obtained an interim order restraining the enforcement of the distress-warrant.

On the 12th Nov. 1877 the defendants' solicitor wrote to Messrs. Holroyd and Smith, the plaintiff's solicitors, as follows:

Todmorden, Nov. 12, 1877.

Dear Sirs,—Local Board of Hebden Bridge, against Ashworth. I beg to inquire whether your client is willing to abide a case to be stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, on the question whether the street in question is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, as was suggested by the magistrates at Halifax. An early reply will oblige, yours truly, Messrs. Holroyd and Smith. JOHN E. CRAVEN.

On the 13th Nov. the following reply was written by Messrs. Holroyd and Smith:

Halifax, 13th Nov. 1877.

Dear Sir,—Ashworth v. The Hebden Bridge Local Board.—We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th inst. Before replying to it we must ask you to give us distinct answers in writing to the following questions, so that there can be no misunderstanding what you and the board really do mean.

First, if the necessary courts can and will consent to it, is the board prepared at their cost to place Miss Ashworth in precisely the same position as Mr. Lister was, the order being made upon him on the 3rd July last, both as regards appealing to the quarter sessions and applying for a case to be stated to the Court of Queen's Bench?

Secondly, is the board prepared to pay the plaintiff's costs of the present Chancery proceedings?

Awaiting your reply, we are yours truly,

HOLROYD AND SMITH.

John E. Craven, Esq., Clerk to the Hebden Bridge Local Board, Todmorden.

On the 14th Nov. the defendants' solicitor wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors:

I am instructed by the defendants to agree to the magistrates who made the order stating a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the point upon which they granted a case on the 3rd July last. Both sides to abide the result of such case. Costs of this action, of stating such case, and of obtaining the opinion of the court thereon, to abide the event. Your client to pay into court, or otherwise deposit as may be agreed upon, the amount ordered by the magistrates to be paid by her, and such further sum as V. C. Malins's chief clerk shall name to cover the probable costs.—Yours truly,

JOHN E. CRAVEN.

To which the plaintiff's solicitors replied on the 14th Nov. 1877:

What Miss Ashworth requires is that she should be placed in precisely the same position in every respect as she was on the 3rd July last, and that the defendants' pay the costs of the present action. Is the board willing to do this?—Yours truly,

HOLROYD AND SMITH.

J. E. Craven, Esq.

No arrangement having been come to, the case now came on, on motion for injunction.

Glassey, Q.C. and Everitt for the plaintiff.—We ask that the defendants may be restrained from executing the order to distrain, on the ground that it was made subject to an agreement that it should abide the result of the decision by the Court of Queen's Bench on the point of law to be submitted by Lister. The plaintiff has been completely misled by what has taken place, and has been prevented from appealing against the order herself. The case is similar in principle to Paul's case (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 497), where, eleven shareholders in a company, having repudiated their shares, and actions being brought against them, one of them filed a bill to be relieved of his shares, and it was agreed that the other ten should not be prejudiced by their not taking proceedings during Ross's suit. A decree was made in favour of Ross, and affirmed on appeal (see Ross v. Estates Investment Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 682). Pending the appeal, and while the names of the ten shareholders remained on the register, a winding-up order was made against the company, and it was held that Pawle, one of the ten, was not liable as a contributory.

Tinkler v. The Wandsworth Board of Works, 30 L. T. Rep. O. S. 146; 31 Id. 27; 1 Giff. 412; 2 De G. & Jo. 261; and show how the court will restrain local boards in the exercise of their arbitrary powers.

Higgins, Q.C. and Brett for the defendants.

—We submit, in the first place, that there was no binding agreement as alleged; that the order for enforcing the apportionment against the plaintiff should be postponed to abide a decision to be given by the Court of Queen's Bench. [MALINS, V.C.—The plaintiff's case was to abide the result of Lister's case in the Queen's Bench.] There was no binding agreement to that effect. But we say also that the court has no jurisdiction. Tinkler v. Wandsworth Board of Works (ubi sup.) was a case where the board were exceeding their statutory powers, but the defendants in the present case are strictly within their powers. There is no case in which a magistrate's order for the enforcement of rates has been interfered with by this court. In Pavle's case (ubi sup.) there had been a binding agreement; but in Ashley's case in the same winding-up, Ashley, not having repudiated his shares before V.C. Wood's decision, was held a contributory:

Ashley's case, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 63; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 263. They referred also to Buckley on the Companies Acts, p. 109, 2nd edit.

Glasse, Q.C. was not called upon to reply,

MALINS, V.C.—Mr. Glasse, upon the whole I am inclined to give you relief to a certain extent. It appears that this local board has certain powers over property in Hebden Bridge, and in pursuance of those powers vested in them they made a rate, the amount of which, payable by the plaintiff (Miss Ashworth) in respect of houses she owns in that district, amounted to the sum now in question of about 230l. Amongst the persons rated was also Mr. Lister, who was rated for the sum of 360l. When the defendants were properly pursuing their powers, no complaint was made, nor could one be made, as to the course they adopted. Then an objection was made by Mr. Lister as to the validity of the rate. He, and as I understand the plaintiff, as well as the others, at the same time raised the question that this property was not rateable by the Hebden Bridge Local Board, on this ground, that the property was in a street or highway which had been opened to and dedicated to the public for eighteen or twenty years. They therefore said, as I understand, that it was a public highway which the public at large or the public in that district was bound to keep in repair, and that they were consequently not liable to be rated by the local board at all. Then Mr. Lister being the largest proprietor upon whom the rate had been levied, there was an understanding, if not a positive agreement, that proceedings should be suspended until he could take the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, although there was possibly no formal agreement—and I think Mr. Higgins is possibly right in saying there was no formal agreement—yet I think it is perfectly plain upon the whole of the evidence that there was a sort of understanding that Mr. Lister's case was to decide, certainly Miss Ashworth's case, and I think all the rest, and the point on which they wanted to take the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench was, whether the property was, for the reasons I have stated, rateable by the local board or not. This was in the month of July. There was no very formal agreement I admit, but there certainly was, in my opinion, an understanding among all parties, on the part of the magistrates, as well as of the persons represented, that this course was to be adopted. It then turned out that Mr. Lister found that he had a fatal objection to this order upon him without going to the Court of Queen's Bench, and that he had only to go to the quarter sessions, which was a much more rapid tribunal. He goes to the quarter sessions to quash the order. The merits of the case, as all parties agree, were not tried, and it had the go-by given to it, although nothing was decided. That having taken place on the 17th Oct., early in November proceedings were taken by the clerk of the board, Mr. Craven, to bring the parties before the magistrates, and the objection was then raised on behalf of Miss Ashworth: "I have not had any opportunity of appealing; I have been misled; I wanted to know through Mr. Lister, and Mr. Lister's case was to decide mine, whether this property is rateable or not." Miss Ashworth says she was misled by the magistrates or their clerk not telling her what was the course adopted by Mr. Lister, which I think they might with great propriety have done, because unquestionably I am satisfied there was that understanding in July last that this question as to the rate was to be raised. I think they might have told Miss Ashworth that Mr. Lister's case had gone before the quarter sessions, and the grounds on which it had failed, so as to give her an opportunity of doing something. This they did not do, but they persisted that the rate was now binding upon her, and accordingly said that within a limited time the rate would be enforced. Now, if there was, as I am satisfied there was, this sort of understanding that the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench was to be taken as to the validity of this rate, then, when Mr. Lister's case had failed upon this quibble about the order for hard labour, not upon the merits of the case, I think they ought to have given Miss Ashworth the opportunity of doing that which Mr. Lister had failed to do. I am bound to say that it appears that the justices took, as gentlemen of position might be expected to do, a reasonable view of the case before them, and said, "If you can agree upon any mode by which this question can be decided, we shall be perfectly ready to accede to it; but if you cannot agree, the order will be enforced." Then, perhaps with some precipitation, the lady, being alarmed that the justices were about to enforce the order, this being the result of the meeting of the 3rd Nov., comes to this court. The writ was issued on the 5th Nov. [After referring to the correspondence since the issuing of the writ, his Lordship proceeded:] It seems to me that, although Mr. Higgins may be right in stating that there is no agreement between these parties, there has been a course adopted on both sides which was calculated to mislead and has misled the plaintiff. If, then, she has been misled, and in consequence of having been misled is in this situation, that she is completely at the mercy of those by whom she has been practically misled,—that is, the board—if I refuse to interfere, this rate can be enforced; they can distrain upon her, and, if she cannot pay, put her in prison, and she is entirely without remedy. Now then, under these circumstances, the magistrates having suggested on the 3rd Nov. that this question should be decided, and the clerk of the board having suggested the same thing, that it should be decided by a case, what is the most reasonable thing under the circumstances to do? It appears to me that the reasonable course is to protect the lady, and not leave her at the mercy of the board, who, as far as I can see, intend to enforce their rigid rights against her according to their view, if I do not interfere or stay their hands, on the terms of having in court the amount of the rate in dispute, so that, if she fails, they will have their remedy like all other litigants in this court. But then it was strenuously contended by Mr. Higgins that the court has no jurisdiction. He says that not one of the cases cited on the other side has the slightest application. I cannot help thinking that the case of Tinkler v. The Wandsworth Board of Works has a very material application. That was a case which was considered of great public importance at the time, for it introduced a somewhat new principle. It was a case in which the local board of Wandsworth had a general power of abolishing privies, and substituting water-closets in all cases in which they might think it proper. Instead of investigating each particular case, they made a general order that there should be nothing but water-closets in the whole district. The plaintiff, who I think was the owner of a row of small houses down the Wandsworth-road, felt himself aggrieved by this, and said this general order was beyond their powers; that they ought to have investigated each case; and that, if they had investigated the case in his houses, they would have found such an order unnecessary. The result was that Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and afterwards the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Justice Knight Bruce and Lord Justice Turner, came to the conclusion that the general order was beyond their powers, and the Court of Appeal said, "This court must protect the plaintiff against the arbitrary acts of the board." Therefore I think that is a case which shows that this court will in a proper case interfere to prevent a local board, whether it consists of magistrates or of others, from acting in an arbitrary and unjustifiable manner, or doing anything which can in the slightest degree militate against or go beyond their authority. Then another case was cited by Mr. Everitt, which has also, I think, considerable application, namely, Slee v. The Corporation of Bradford. The point was that the corporation of Bradford—having great powers where buildings were to be thrown back and so on—had agreed with the plaintiff that a certain thing was to be done. He had submitted his plans to them, and they had agreed that if he pulled down he might rebuild according to those plans. When he had pulled down his buildings, they said, "Now, we will exercise our strict powers, and you must throw back your building a certain distance, or you will not build at all." What was the decision? That, inasmuch as they had misled him, they could not take advantage of their conduct and of their powers; and, therefore, the court granted an injunction to prevent them from interfering with the buildings according to those plans which they had originally approved. Now, there was no absolute agreement there, but there was an understanding by which the plaintiff had been misled, and the court would not allow the parties who had misled him to take advantage of having done so. In this case, therefore, if this lady has been lulled into security, and the result of all this is that she has been lulled into security by a course which she was warranted in believing the magistrates had agreed to take, I think it is impossible that the defendants should be permitted to exercise their extreme rights against her without her having the opportunity of doing that which the magistrates said they were perfectly willing should be done, and, I think, were desirous of having done, if the parties could find some mode of doing it. In this case, if the parties cannot for themselves find a mode of taking the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, I think I can find a mode for them. I will find a mode of doing that for them which the magistrates themselves on the 3rd Nov. said they were willing should be done; which the clerk who instructs Mr. Higgins to raise this contest to-day himself said he proposed should be done. I think the justice of the case will be met by securing that the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench shall be taken, and if they cannot settle the case themselves, I will endeavour to settle it for them. Therefore, the plaintiff must undertake, within a time agreed upon, to bring the amount of the rate into court, and upon her doing that I will grant an injunction.

The order was: [The plaintiff by her counsel undertaking to assent to the statement of a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the point raised by the eighth objection of Mr. Lister's appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions, and to concur in any application to the justices for that purpose] to restrain the defendants from levying the distress or continuing any other proceedings to enforce the order of the 3rd July against the plaintiff unless or until she should have an opportunity of appealing against the order, until the hearing of the cause, or until further order, with liberty to apply. The plaintiff undertaking to pay into court within fourteen days the amount of the rate. If not paid, the motion to stand dismissed with costs.

HUDSON v. TOOTH. (a)

Prohibition—Arches Court—Requisition of archbishop—Place of hearing—37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, s. 9—Appendix to rules, No. 13.

The respondent, the incumbent of a parish in the diocese of Rochester, was represented by three parishioners to the bishop under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, s. 8, for breach of the provisions of that section. Proceedings were taken under sect. 9 in the Arches Court of Canterbury, and the respondent was adjudged guilty, condemned in costs, admonished, inhibited, pronounced contumacious, imprisoned for contempt, and released, without either appearing or answering at any stage of the proceedings. He afterwards discovered that the requisition of the archbishop to the judge to hear the matter of the representation under sect. 9 was in the form contained in the Appendix to the Rules (No. 13) under the Act, and mentioned for the place of hearing only London or Westminster or the diocese of Rochester. The hearing actually took place at Lambeth, in the diocese of Canterbury, and the respondent applied for a prohibition to stay further proceedings.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKellar, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

HUDSON v. TOOTH.

[Q.B. Div.]

Held, that this Act created a new jurisdiction; that the conditions precedent must be strictly carried out; that, in consequence of disobedience to the requisition, the proceedings were coram non iudice; and that the respondent was entitled to have the rule for prohibition made absolute.

This was a rule nisi, obtained on behalf of the Rev. Arthur Tooth, clerk, calling upon the Right Honorable James Plaisted, Baron Penzance, the official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, and Robert Hudson, Samuel Gardiner, and Robert Gunston, complainants in a cause or matter in the said court, entitled Hudson and others v. Tooth, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to the Arches Court of Canterbury to prohibit the said court from further proceedings in relation to the said cause or matter, being one over which there was no jurisdiction.

It appeared from the affidavit of the Rev. Arthur Tooth, the respondent in the ecclesiastical suit, and the applicant for the rule, that he was and had been for some years incumbent of the new parish of St. James, Hatcham, which parish is partly in the county of Surrey and partly in the county of Kent, and wholly in the diocese of Rochester.

Some time in the month of March 1876 the applicant received a document purporting to be a representation made under the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), by Robert Hudson, Samuel Gardiner, and Robert Gunston, to the Lord Bishop of Rochester, with several declarations annexed.

At the same time also he received documents purporting to be a requisition from the Lord Bishop, requiring him to state whether he would submit to his directions without appeal, a form of such statement, and a form of acknowledgement of the receipt of documents.

Some time after that he received a document purporting to be a notice from Cyrus Waddilove, the Deputy Registrar of the Arches Court of Canterbury, that he had appointed a certain day for fixing what security for costs should be given by the said Robert Hudson, Samuel Gardiner, and Robert Gunston.

On or about the 15th June 1876 he received a document purporting to be a notice from the said deputy registrar, that the judge had appointed eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the 13th July then following, in the public library at Lambeth Palace, to hear the matter of the above-mentioned representation.

The applicant was informed, and believed, that the matter of the above-mentioned representation was heard on the 13th July 1876 in the public library at Lambeth Palace, and that the judge was attended by the said Cyrus Waddilove, Deputy Registrar of the Arches Court of Canterbury, and that the Diocesan Registrar of Rochester was not present, and did not attend the judge.

The applicant was not present at the hearing. He did not then, either personally or by any person on his behalf, appear; nor has he before or since, either personally or otherwise, appeared or entered an appearance in the court.

Lambeth Palace, as he was informed and believed, is situate in the county of Surrey, and is not within either of the cities of London or Westminster. It is, as he was informed and believed, situate within the diocese of Canterbury, and is not within the diocese of Rochester.

On or about the 30th July 1876 the applicant was served with a document purporting to be a monition, or copy of a monition, by the Right Hon. James Plaisted, Baron Penzance, Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, reciting the hearing of the matter of the above-mentioned representation, and admonishing him to abstain from certain practices, acts, matters, and things, and to remove certain articles condemned at the said hearing.

On or about the 25th Nov. he was served with documents purporting to be a summons to show cause why an inhibition should not issue to enforce obedience to the said monition, and copies of three affidavits showing that he had not obeyed the said monition.

On or about the 17th Dec. 1876 he was served with a document purporting to be an inhibition or copy of an inhibition.

On or about the 12th Jan. 1877 he was served with documents, one purporting to be a summons or notice of motion to pronounce him contumacious and in contempt for not obeying the said inhibition, and to signify the same in the manner heretofore used by ecclesiastical courts, and the others purporting to be copies of three affidavits showing that he had not obeyed the said inhibition.

On the 22nd Jan. 1877 the applicant was arrested under a warrant issued by the sheriff of Surrey, reciting a significavit from the said Right Hon. James Plaisted, Baron Penzance. He was on the same day lodged in Horsemonger-lane Gaol, where he remained till the 17th Feb. 1877, when he was released in virtue of an order made, he believed, on the application of the said Robert Hudson, Samuel Gardiner, and Robert Gunston. He made no application for his own release. He was released before the return day of the writ, which was, he believed, the 16th April 1877.

The applicant had not yet received a document purporting to be a bill of costs incurred in the matter of the said representation on behalf of the said Robert Hudson, Samuel Gardiner, and Robert Gunston, nor a notice fixing the time for taxing this bill of costs, but he anticipated being called on to attend such taxation forthwith.

The said inhibition is still in force, and the applicant is kept out of the church of St. James, Hatcham, and other clerks in holy orders have officiated, and are now officiating therein, against his will, and he anticipated the profits of his benefice would shortly be sequestered to raise a stipend or stipends for such other clerks, in alleged accordance with the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874.

About the end of June or beginning of July 1877 he was informed that the Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale, a clerk beneficed in the diocese of London, against whom a representation under the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 had been preferred, and who had been admonished and inhibited in the course of the proceedings upon that representation, had upon the 29th June 1877 obtained a prohibition to the Right Hon. James Plaisted, Baron Penzance, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and that one of the grounds on which such jurisdiction had been impugned had been that the said Lord Penzance had heard the matter of the representation at

HUDSON v. TOOTH.

[Q.B. Div.]

Lambeth Palace aforesaid, and that Lambeth Palace was not within either of the cities of London or Westminster, or within the diocese of the said Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale, within one of which places the said Lord Penzance had been required by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury to hear it. He was also informed that the learned judges of the Queen's Bench Division who granted the prohibition, while granting it on the ground of another defect in the jurisdiction, and therefore deemed unnecessary to decide upon this ground, had expressed their opinion that the point was one deserving of serious consideration. He thereupon caused his solicitors, Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, and Co., to search among the papers in the Registry of the Court of Arches for the requisition from the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury to the said Lord Penzance to hear the representation against him, which requisition neither he nor any person on his behalf had till then seen. On the 9th July 1877 he was for the first time informed by his said solicitors, and he believed it to be the fact, that the said requisition had been seen by them, and that it required the said Lord Penzance to hear the matter of the said representation at some place in London or Westminster, or in the diocese of Rochester.

A. J. Stephen, Q.C. showed cause against the rule on behalf of the complainants.—The requisition of the archbishop, provided for in sect. 9 of the Public Worship Act 1874, was here admittedly in the form contained in the appendix to the rules authorised by the Order in Council relating to that Act; the words of the last paragraph of the form of the requisition (No. 13) are: "Now we, the archbishop aforesaid, do hereby require you, the judge aforesaid, to hear and determine the matter of the said representation at any place in London or Westminster, or within the said diocese of B., as you may deem fit;" but the words of the 9th section of the statute relating thereto are, "and the archbishop shall forthwith require the judge to hear the matter of the representation at any place within the diocese or province, or in London or Westminster." The representation in this case was heard within the province according to the statute; but not according to the Order in Council, unless London may be taken to include Lambeth. This is, no doubt, the popular meaning of London, and it has been so adopted in a court of law, and also by the Legislature. In Wallace v. Attorney-General (38 Beav. 384), Romilly, M.R. had to define the London hospitals included in a bequest "aux hospices de Paris et de Londres," and he adopted as the principle of his decision (p. 392) an expression of Sir William Petty in his "Essay on Political Arithmetic" of the time of James II., "What is meant by London? By the City of London we mean the housing within the walls of the old city, with the liberties thereof, Westminster, the borough of Southwark, and so much of the built ground in Middlesex and Surrey, whose houses are contiguous unto or within call of those aforementioned." So the Bishopric of St. Albans Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 34) treats expressly of South London and the district situate to the south of the Thames, thereby including Lambeth in London. [LUSH, J.—But here London and Westminster are coupled together; how can either mean anything but the city so named?] If that be so, it may be contended that the form of the requisition is not essential to the validity of these proceedings; it was intended evidently by the statute to extend the power to sue beneficed clerks, which was limited by the Citations Act to their own respective dioceses; the form, by omitting the word province is contrary to the intention of the Act, and is invalid. The word "forthwith" in the 9th section shows that the duty of the archbishop with respect to the requisition is merely ministerial, and therefore, as there was no breach of the statute, the sitting of the Court at Lambeth was a mere irregularity which could not destroy the court's jurisdiction: (Reg v. Castro, L. Rep. 9 Q.B. 350, 356.) At all events there is a remedy by appeal, and this court may exercise its discretion by discharging the rule for prohibition.

Benjamin, Q.C. followed on behalf of Lord Penzance.—This was an Act of Parliament dealing with procedure only, as appears from the title and preamble, and the express provision of sect. 5. The appointment of Lord Penzance to be Official Principal of the Arches Court under sect. 7 had taken place before this case came on to be heard, and in that capacity he exercised the jurisdiction previously vested in that office. The only alteration in the procedure under sect. 9 is that, whereas before this Act similar cases came before the Dean of Arches only upon appeal or by letters of request from the bishop of a diocese (if in the province of Canterbury), now they come immediately before that court with the bishop's consent. This requisition of the archbishop amounts only to a choice of venue for trial, and is no condition precedent to the judge's jurisdiction; the 9th section and the form together cannot have any greater effect than the statutory requirement that judges shall hold assizes at the principal town of each county. Hale says, in Pleas of the Crown, part II., chap. 5, § 23 (vol. 2, p. 39): "By the statute of 6 R. 2, c. 5, they are to hold their sessions in the principal towns, where the county court is held; but this is but directive, not coercive, for the judges may, and usually have, appointed their sessions at their pleasure in other places." Suppose a respondent under these circumstances had pleaded to the jurisdiction, he must have proceeded to point out the court which had jurisdiction. [LUSH, J.—It would be sufficient if he said that jurisdiction existed in Westminster.] If so, the objection is not to the jurisdiction, but to the place of trial only. Lord Campbell said, in Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (30 L. J. 370, Ch.): "No universal rule can be laid down for the construction of statutes, as to whether mandatory enactments shall be considered directory only or obligatory, with an implied nullification for disobedience. It is the duty of courts of justice to try to get at the real intention of the Legislature by carefully attending to the whole scope of the statute to be construed." It cannot be contended here that the Legislature has intended to make the place of trial an important condition to the application of this Act of Parliament. So it was held in Margate Pier Company v. Hannam (3 B. & Ald. 266) that the swearing in of a justice of the peace is not essential to the validity of his acts.

Charles, Q.C. and Phillimore supported the rule.—The Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 created an entirely new jurisdiction from any

Q.B. Div.]

HUDSON v. TOOTH.

[Q.B. Div.]

which previously existed, and, if any condition precedent of that jurisdiction be omitted, the whole proceedings must be coram non judice. Under the previous Act for the better enforcing church discipline (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), proceedings could be initiated only by a person authorised by the bishop, and after a preliminary inquiry the bishop had to hear and determine the matter, or send it to the Arches Court by letters of request. It was only by that means, or by appeal from the bishop, that before this Act the Dean of the Arches could have had jurisdiction. Now, besides some new preliminaries, the matter is heard by the judge of the new court in the first instance upon requisition of the archbishop. If the judge holds his court in a place not authorised by the statute, he cannot exercise this new jurisdiction. As to the other points, whatever may be the popular meaning of London, when coupled with Westminster, it can refer only to the city, just as the words London and Middlesex together can only mean the two counties. Also it has been held that a right of appeal does not bar a prohibition:

Burder v. Veley, 12 A. & E. 233;
Reg. v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 6 E. & B. 546;

Darby v. Osense, 1 T. Rep. 553;
Vaus v. Vollans, 4 B. & Ad. 525.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I have arrived at the conclusion that there must be a prohibition, but I arrive at that conclusion with extreme regret; for it is clear that it is an objection of the most technical character, which has nothing to do with the merits of the case, which are of essential importance as regards the functions of the clergy and the administration of the worship of the Church of England. The merits of the case have not, however, come into question, the objection taken being of the most technical character, which might have been obviated in a few minutes if it had been taken before the hearing, simply by having the case heard on the other side of the water. But no objection being taken, it was assumed that the proceedings were regular, and thus an opportunity was afforded of undoing the whole of the proceedings. Nevertheless, though we see that it is a matter of the purest technicality, if it goes to the root of the jurisdiction we are bound to act upon it. The form of the archbishop's requisition to the judge was to hear the case in any place in the diocese of Rochester or in London or Westminster; but the case was heard at Lambeth, which is not within the diocese of Rochester, nor in London or Westminster, though it is within the province of Canterbury. It was contended, in the first place, that London must be understood in its popular sense, in which it would include Lambeth, with all the precincts or suburbs, which, though not forming any part of London, are included in it in the popular acceptation of the word. But it is impossible for us to give such a construction to the requisition. Even if the word had been London simply, I doubt very much whether it would not have been going too far to say that London could be taken in that large popular sense in which it is sometimes understood. But when I find that London is used in contradistinction to Westminster—which, according to Dr. Stephen's argument, would be included in London—this contention utterly fails. My own conviction is, considering all the circumstances, that it was intended that the archbishop in giving his authority to the judge should exercise his discretion as to the place in which the matter should be heard. It might in his judgment be inexpedient that the matter should be heard in the diocese, on account of some prejudice existing, and therefore he might think it desirable to take it into the larger sphere of the province, or it might be desirable to send it into the diocese where all the parties resided, in order that it might be heard with the least possible expense and with the greatest possible facilities for the ascertainment of the truth. Or it might be indifferent whether it was heard in the diocese, and it might be convenient that it should be heard in the metropolis, and in such a case the words "London or Westminster" are used, probably because the Dean of the Arches sat at one time in the City of London and might on the removal of the courts sit there again, though he has in recent times sat at Westminster; and therefore both the words, "London or Westminster," are used. But both words having been used, and in contradistinction to each other, it is impossible that we can understand "London" as including Westminster, nor as including any place beyond London itself in its strict and proper sense. Then, it is said, that the case having, in fact, been heard within the province of Canterbury, that is sufficient. But as to this I quite concur with the argument of the counsel for the applicant, that the statute created a new jurisdiction, and the mere fact that the Dean of the Arches, as connected with the province of Canterbury, existed long before the Act, does not touch the question. It is not as Dean of the Arches that the judge exercises this jurisdiction. It is a mere accident that the judge happens to be the Dean of the Arches. The jurisdiction is the creation of the statute, and when the statute was passed it was to be vested in some barrister of a certain standing, with this proviso—possibly to induce a most distinguished person, Lord Penzance, to accept an office which otherwise might have appeared offensive and derogatory to one who had already filled such high judicial offices—that is, that as soon as the office of Dean of the Arches should be vacated, it should be vested in him—a most satisfactory bargain for the public, as it insured the acquisition of a most distinguished man to execute the delicate and difficult duties of this office. But it is undoubtedly to my mind an entirely new office, and one with which no former Dean of the Arches had anything to do. It is a new function in the Archbishop of Canterbury and a new jurisdiction and authority vested in him. Before the Act was passed the complaint was to the bishop, who, no doubt, might refer it to the archbishop, but might hear it subject to appeal; and now a new jurisdiction is created under which, unless the parties accept the bishop's decision as absolute and without appeal, the case must go to the archbishop. That is an entirely new authority and jurisdiction, and it must be exercised entirely in accordance with the statute which creates it. The archbishop is to exercise it by referring the matter to the judge, not generally leaving it to his discretion where the case shall be heard, but requiring the judge to hear it "at any place within the diocese or province, or in London or Westminster." There was a faint attempt to argue that it was not necessary that the archbishop should require the judge to hear the matter, but that he might leave it to the discretion of the judge. But that is a most erroneous reading of the Act, for it is not that the archbishop shall require the judge to hear the case, but that he shall require him to hear it in a particular place—that is, at such place as the archbishop thinks most convenient. That being so, it is essential to the jurisdiction, and it is not competent to the judge to substitute for the place specified any other. It is part of the conditions of the jurisdiction that the place shall be appointed, and it is an essential part of the exercise of the archbishop's authority. It is said, indeed, that the word "province" was meant to be inserted in the form given in the rules; that its omission was a mere accident—a mere blunder; that it ought to be there, and that it is to be read as though it were there, and that it is sufficient that the judge has, in fact, exercised his jurisdiction in the province. But this argument is shattered by the facts. The only jurisdiction which the judge could exercise is the jurisdiction given by the archbishop's requisition; and the archbishop, in his requisition, omits the word "province." It is not for me to say that it was a mere accident or blunder, or that it was not done intentionally. Suppose it was done intentionally—suppose the archbishop thought that it was fitting that the case should be heard either within the diocese of Rochester or in London or Westminster—can we say that it was not so intended? To do so surely would be to speculate on a mere suggestion without any satisfactory foundation. The omission of the word "province" therefore is fatal to the exercise of jurisdiction within the province of Canterbury, and the jurisdiction has been exercised at Lambeth without any lawful authority. Then the question is whether this is a mere irregularity, or whether this objection goes to the jurisdiction. I am of opinion that it is more than a mere irregularity and that it goes to the root of the jurisdiction. It was intended that the archbishop should direct the place where the case should be heard. That is an essential condition of the exercise of jurisdiction, and therefore, though I regret to be obliged to give effect to such an objection, it is one which goes to the root of the jurisdiction, and is an absolute bar to its exercise.

MELLOR, J.—I have had the advantage of hearing the question twice discussed, and I confess that the advantage has been considerable in enabling me to come very clearly and conclusively to the same opinion. When we reflect how this Act came to be passed and the circumstances under which it went through Parliament, the criticisms it was exposed to, and the safeguards by which it was supposed to be accompanied, I cannot doubt that this, among others, was one of the protective provisions which were engrafted on the Act. The Act was for improving the administration of the law as regarded public worship. We know it was passed with reference to certain practices which had been supposed to have crept into the services of the Church, and we know the sort of feeling which prevailed throughout the country at the time, and I cannot doubt that it had occurred to Parliament that the existing law and tribunals were not sufficient to meet the exigencies of the case, and that what was to be done was not merely to improve and extend the jurisdiction of the Dean of the Arches, but to erect an entirely new tribunal, which has no relation at all to the office of Dean of the Arches. It is only a question of procedure so far as the procedure regulates the practice of the new court which is constituted by the Act of Parliament, and which prescribes the way in which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. The provisions in the Act take away from the bishop the old mode of proceeding. For it is provided that, unless the parties agree to accept the decision of the bishop as final and without appeal, the case is to be sent to the archbishop, who is invested with authority to send it to the judge, but with a requisition prescribing the place where it is to be heard. And this requisition is by the statute made the condition of the exercise of the jurisdiction. In this case by the requisition the hearing was to be in London or Westminster or the diocese of Rochester. London in any such statute, as in the Judicature Act, has always been understood to mean the City of London, and certainly when it is named as contradistinguished from Westminster, there are reasons why it should not be allowed to the judge to hear the case in any other place than that appointed. It is not a mere question of procedure; a discretion is to be exercised by the archbishop. It is a new jurisdiction, and the procedure is adapted to the jurisdiction. On these grounds I have come clearly and satisfactorily to the conclusion that the question being one of jurisdiction, the jurisdiction has not been well founded, and that therefore the proceedings which went on in the absence of Mr. Tooth, were invalid, and that, in consequence, a writ of prohibition must be issued.

LUSH, J.—I also concur, though I extremely regret the necessity I am under of upholding this objection. It is one of a purely technical character, but there is nothing to show that the defendant has precluded himself from raising it; and that being so, we are bound to give effect to it, though, considering the time which has elapsed, it does not come with a good grace. I cannot agree that the Act is one which has merely altered the procedure. On the contrary, it initiates new and summary proceedings against clergymen charged with certain breaches of ecclesiastical law. It also enlarges the authority of a new tribunal over them; for, whereas before the Act the clergyman could not be cited out of his diocese, the Act authorises his being summoned anywhere in the province. The authority is not given to the judge, but to the archbishop, who is to direct where the case is to be heard. This alone is a material extension of the power which existed before the Act. In the present case the requisition—in the form given under the Act—did not include the "province;" but the rule or the form was not binding on the archbishop, and he might have specified any place in the province, according to the words in the Act. He, however, only specified the diocese, or London, or Westminster, and the judge sat neither in the diocese nor in London nor Westminster, but in Lambeth, where he had no authority to sit. The defendant did not appear, nor was he bound to appear. It is said that London may mean the metropolis at large, and so it may, but not when it is mentioned as contra-distinguished from Westminster. Therefore it must be taken that the archbishop authorised the judge to sit in the City of London or in Westminster, but he sat in neither, and sat at Lambeth, which is not in the diocese. The defendant was not bound to attend there, and did not attend. The judge proceeded against him in his absence. It is impossible that such a proceeding can stand, and there is nothing to prevent the defendant from taking advantage of it. We are bound, therefore, to give effect to the objection and to let the writ of prohibition go. The same point was raised before us in the case of Mr. Dale, but as there was another objection there which in itself was fatal we did not decide this point, but merely observed that it was one of a very serious character. We have now had the benefit of a full argument, and I confess that the view I had entertained has been strengthened by this additional argument, and that I decide without any doubt that the whole proceeding was coram non iudice, on the ground that Lord Penzance was not authorised to sit where he did, and that the defendant did not appear; and that, therefore, there was no authority to proceed against him in his absence.

Agreement to oust jurisdiction of a court of justice—Conductor of tramway—Certificate of manager—6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 22.

The respondent entered into an agreement to serve the appellants as a conductor, and deposited 5*l.* as security for the due discharge of his duties; amongst which he was to punch a ticket upon receipt of every passenger's fare according to certain rules of which he had a copy. It was agreed also that the appellants' manager should be the sole judge between the company and the conductor whether the company was entitled to retain the whole or any part of the deposit; and his certificate in writing should be binding and conclusive evidence between the parties in all courts of justice, and should bar the conductor of all right under any circumstances to recover the same. The agreement expressly excluded its application from criminal offences, and one of the rules stated that failure to punch on receipt of a fare was to be evidence of an attempt at embezzlement, and the act of failure would be dealt with accordingly.

The appellants' manager certified that the company were entitled to retain the whole of the respondent's deposit on the ground that he had received certain passengers' fares without punching the tickets according to the rules. The respondent applied to a stipendiary magistrate to recover this amount under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 22, and the magistrate decided that this agreement was not binding.

Here, upon a case stated, that this agreement did not oust the jurisdiction of a court of justice, but merely rendered the certificate a condition precedent to the company's right to retain the deposit; and that the rule as to evidence of embezzlement was nugatory. The agreement was therefore valid, and the case was sent back to the magistrate.

THIS was a case stated by one of the magistrates of the metropolitan police district, pursuant to sect. 2 of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice:—

On the 29th June 1877 I heard a summons which had issued from the Southwark police-court on the complaint of George Bailey, herein called the complainant, to the London Tramways Company, herein called the defendants, under the 22nd section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, for the purpose of having determined by the magistrate what, if any, sum was due from the defendants to the complainant in the matter of his complaint. The section in question is as follows:

And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to hear and determine all matters of complaint between any proprietor of a hackney carriage or metropolitan stage carriage, and the driver or conductor of the same respectively, and to order payment of any sum of money that shall appear to be due to either party for wages or for the earnings in respect of any such carriage, or on account of any deposit of money, and to order compensation to the proprietor in respect of damage or loss, which shall have arisen through the neglect or default of any driver or conductor, to the property of his employer intrusted to his care, or in respect of any sum of money which such proprietor may have been lawfully ordered by a justice of the peace to pay, and which has been actually paid pursuant to such order, on account of the negligence or wilful misconduct of the driver or conductor, and to order such compensation to either party in respect of any other matter of complaint between them as to such justice shall seem proper.

A tramway car is a metropolitan stage carriage, and the complainant was a conductor in the service of the defendants. He was by them discharged on the 21st June, after about three months' service. On entering the service he had received a copy of the company's rules, and had signed an agreement (copies of both which accompanied this case) and had paid into the defendants' hands the sum of 5*l.* as a deposit, under the 5th clause of the agreement. On the day of his discharge, besides this deposit money, there had accrued, as wages due to him, the further sum of 25*s.* This entire sum of 6*l.* 5*s.* the manager of the company declared forfeit to the defendants (clause 6 of the agreement), and informed the complainant that he was discharged for omitting duly to punch or register fares received by him from passengers, in violation of rule 157. The manager refused to inform the complainant on what information he grounded his charge, or in any way to support it.

At the hearing before me the complainant denied on oath that he had ever omitted to punch or register the fares, or in any way violate the company's rules. He further swore that, although the agreement had been read over to him, it had been read so fast that he did not understand its full force and effect at the time of signing it.

For the defendants no evidence at all was offered. They put in at the opening of the case, and entirely relied on, the accompanying certificate, bearing their manager's signature, objected to my receiving any evidence outside of it, and urged that I was precluded from deciding the case otherwise than in accordance with it (clause 7 of agreement).

I was of opinion—

1. That it was not competent to the parties, by contracting themselves out of the provisions of an important public general Act of Parliament, to preclude a justice of the peace from exercising the full jurisdiction therein conferred upon him; and that I ought in no way to be bound by the contract, which seemed to me to be opposed to the general policy and intent of the statute, and therefore illegal and invalid. I accordingly declined to accept the certificate as evidence of the facts therein stated. I also considered the agreement grossly unreasonable and inequitable, and that the possible operation of it had not been fully understood by the complainant.

2. Further, I was of opinion that, if the agreement be not absolutely illegal and void, and if I am compellable to receive this certificate as conclusive evidence against the complainant that he has committed the offence therein alleged, then such offence is an offence under 174 of the company's rules, which must be read with the agreement. Rule 174, "Failure to punch on receipt of a passenger's fare will be evidence of an attempt at embezzlement, and the act of failure will be dealt with accordingly." That, as an attempt at embezzlement is a criminal offence, and as such offences (under clause 8 of the agreement) are especially excepted from the operation of clauses 5, 6, 7, under which the moneys in question were withheld, the provision making the certificate conclusive evidence of the facts did not apply to this case, and that thus, under the agreement itself, the defendants were not justified in declaring the complainant's money forfeit.

And I accordingly ordered the defendants to pay the complainant the sum claimed, with the ordinary costs. Whereupon the defendants, being dissatisfied with my determination as being erroneous in point of law, made the necessary formal application to me to state and sign this case.

If this honourable court should be of opinion that upon none of these grounds stated my decision should be supported, but that the agreement between the parties is a bar to my making an award upon the merits, then I pray them to send the case back to me, with such directions as to them may seem fit.

The rules and form of agreement were printed together in a small book, a copy of which was given to the respondent, as to every servant of the company.

By rule 157:

For fares paid in money for journeys made in one car only the conductor (except on routes on which one uniform fare is charged for all distances) will carry with him separate single journey tickets for each separate rate of fare. The ticket for each rate will be distinguished by a different colour. On receiving a fare of any one of these rates the conductor must (before collecting any other fare), and in the immediate view of the person paying, punch from a single journey ticket for the rate of fare received, the figure denoting the amount of such fare, and deliver that ticket to the passenger paying such fare, and collect the ticket again from him just before the passenger leaves the car.

By rule 174:

A breach by any conductor of any of the foregoing rules will insure his instant dismissal, and the retention by the company of all money held by the company as security according to agreement. Failure to punch on receipt of a passenger's fare will be evidence of an attempt at embezzlement, and the act of failure will be dealt with accordingly.

The agreement between the company and the conductor provided, amongst other things:

4. The conductor will faithfully fulfil all his duties as a conductor on any route on which the manager from time to time directs him to perform his services, and faithfully account for and pay over to the company daily, and as much oftener as he may be required, all money which he receives for or on behalf of the company, and especially will observe and be bound by as well all the clauses of the rules and regulations aforesaid, which relate to conductors, and also all alterations from time to time of these rules and regulations, or any of them.

5. The conductor will on the signing hereof pay to the company 5*l.*, to be retained by the company together with any such interest thereon as is hereinafter mentioned, and with all wages for the current week, as security for the due discharge of his duties as conductor, and for the due accounting for and paying over to the company all money received by him for or on behalf of the company, and for the due observance by him of the rules and regulations aforesaid, and all alterations thereof, and for the payment of all damages and loss occasioned to the company or their property by him, and all damages, fines and penalties, to which the company may become or be made liable by reason of anything wrongfully or negligently done, omitted, or suffered by the conductor, and for the payment of all moneys for which he is made liable, and the satisfaction of all things for which he is made responsible by any of the clauses of any of the said rules and regulations, or any alterations therein.

6. In case of any breach by the conductor of any of the said rules and regulations, or any alterations therein, the company may retain the whole of the said 5*l.* and any interest thereon, and the conductor's wages for the current week, as liquidated damages for such breach. In any other case the amount for the payment or satisfaction of which the said 5*l.* and any interest thereof, and the conductor's wages for the current week are hereby made a security, may also be retained out of the same sum and interest, and wages by the company as liquidated damages.

7. The manager of the company shall be the sole judge between the company and the conductor, whether the company is entitled to retain the whole or any part of the said 5*l.* and interest, and wages for the current week as liquidated damages. And his certificate in writing that the same or any given part thereof stated in such certificate are to be so retained, and of the cause of such retention shall be binding, and conclusive evidence between the parties in all courts of justice civil and criminal, and before all stipendiary and police magistrates and justices of the peace, both that the amount thereby certified as the amount to be retained is the true amount to be retained, and has become and is liable to be so retained by the company, and that that has happened which in such certificate is certified to be the cause, and that it is a lawful and sufficient cause for such retention, and such certificate shall bar the conductor of all right under any circumstances to recover the moneys so certified to be retained or any part thereof.

8. Provided always that no act or omission of the conductor amounting to a criminal offence for which he would or might be liable to be convicted either upon an indictment or by any stipendiary or police magistrate, or justice or justices of the peace in a summary way is or shall be deemed to be within the meaning of the provisions of clauses 5, 6, and 7 hereof, or any of them.

9. On the termination in any manner of the service and hiring hereby contracted for, and if and as soon as, but not unless the manager certifies in writing that, any part of the said 5*l.* remains unapplied and free from any liability to be applied as aforesaid, the amount which he so certifies to be so unapplied and free will be paid to the conductor and subject to the other parts of this agreement; interest at 5 per cent. per annum will also be allowed to the conductor upon so much of the said 5*l.* as the manager shall certify to have from time to time been unapplied and free from liability to be applied as aforesaid.

the authority in this behalf, vested in me by an agreement made the twelfth day of April 1877, made between the London Tramways Company (Limited), and George Bailey, as a conductor on the tramways of that company, and of every other authority vested in me, do, by this my certificate in writing, certify as follows, that is to say:

That the said company is entitled to retain as liquidated managers, and for the cause herein mentioned, the whole of the sum of five pounds paid by the said George Bailey to the said company, as in the said agreement is mentioned, and all interest thereon in the said agreement referred to [and the sum of one pound five shillings, which I certify to be the amount of the wages of the said George Bailey, under the said agreement for the week current at the time of his dismissal from the service of the company, which took place on the 20th day of June 1877, and] that the said sums and interest are to be so retained by the company for the cause herein mentioned.

And that the cause of such retention as aforesaid is that the said George Bailey, on the 18th of June 1877 committed a breach of the "rules and regulations for the officers and servants of the London Tramways Company (Limited)," in the said agreement mentioned, in that on the said 18th of June the said George Bailey did, between Brixton and Blackfriars, in the county of Surrey, receive from seven passengers then riding in and upon a tramway car of the said company, their fares of one of the rates mentioned in rule 157 of the said rules and regulations, and did not, before collecting any other fare, and in the immediate view of the persons paying punch from single journey tickets for the rate of fares received the figures denoting such fares, contrary to 157 of the same rules and regulations. Dated this 28th day of June 1877.

Manager of the London Tramways Company (Limited).

Kemp, Q.C. (with him John Humphreys) argued for the appellants, the complainants.—The magistrate seems to have thought that the effect of the agreement was to oust the jurisdiction of the courts, and to be invalid under the decision of the House of Lords in Scott v. Avery (5 H. of L. Cas. 811); but it really only provides that the manager's certificate shall be a condition precedent to the company's right to keep the money deposited, just in the same way as building contracts are made dependent upon certificates of the architect. The agreement excludes criminal offences, but the certificate is entirely consistent with an omission to punch not amounting to criminality; and the 174th rule does not necessarily render such an omission criminal. [LUSH, J.—It cannot possibly do so, and may therefore be treated as a nullity.] Exactly.

W. Wright (with him Safford) for the respondent.—Jurisdiction is given to a magistrate in a case of this kind by the section of the statute set out in the case, and no agreement to oust that jurisdiction can be valid. In Scott v. Corporation of Liverpool (3 De G. & J. 334), Lord Chelmsford, L.C. referring to cases of this kind, where the parties have agreed upon a particular private tribunal which shall adjust the right to a debt or obligation for them, says (at p. 360): "A right of action has accrued, and it would be against the policy of the law to give an effect to an agreement that such a right should not be enforced through the medium of the ordinary tribunals." Here the 7th paragraph of the agreement makes the manager the sole judge between the parties, and renders the whole agreement of no effect: (Horton v. Sayer, 4 H. & N. 643.) Moreover, the agreement itself expressly excludes from its application anything criminal, and the rules render this alleged act of the respondent evidence of embarrassment. [LUSH, J.—That is merely nugatory.] Here was evidence that the respondent had committed no breach of the rules.

Kemp, Q.C. was not heard in reply.

MELLOR, J.—It appears to me to be highly advisable that the company should take out the absurd expression in the rules with respect to evidence of embezzlement; but we cannot say that this agreement is illegal, nor can we entertain the objection made before the magistrate that the man did not understand the contract which he signed. It is said that the magistrate's jurisdiction is ousted by the terms of this agreement, and in one sense this is true; but the effect of it, as it appears to me, is merely to make the manager's certificate conclusive evidence of the respective rights of the company and the conductor to the money deposited. So where money is intrusted to a stakeholder in order that he may give it to the person he considers entitled, or where a builder is to be paid only upon an architect's certificate, such an agreement without fraud is binding on the parties. The 5*l.* deposited is the stipulated amount of damages for a breach of the agreement, and the manager is to be the sole judge of the company's right to keep it. His certificate is to be a condition precedent to that right, and to be conclusive evidence of the facts certified. There is nothing in this contrary to law or policy, and it is binding between the parties. I think the magistrate was wrong, and the case must go back to him.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a civil contract, and we must enforce it. The conductor leaves to the company's manager to determine whether he forfeits the money deposited with the company. Such an arrangement constantly occurs in building contracts, and I see no reason why it should not be binding in this case.

Libel—Newspaper—Authority to editor—Protection of proprietor—6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7.

Upon a criminal information for libel it was proved that the three defendants, the proprietors of the newspaper in which the libel appeared, took an active part in the management of the paper, but had given a general authority to a competent editor to publish whatever he thought proper in the literary part of it. At the trial evidence was tendered by the defendants to prove that the libel was published without their authority, consent, or knowledge, and without want of due care or caution on their part, within the meaning of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 7. The judge refused to hear this evidence, and directed the jury that the section did not apply. Upon a rule for misdirection,

Held, by Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J. (dissentiente Mellor, J.), that notwithstanding the authority to the editor it was a question for the jury whether the protection given by this section applied to the defendants; and that there must be a new trial.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKellar, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. HOLBROOK.

[Q.B. Div.]

THIS was a criminal information for libel, tried at Winchester before Lindley, J. and a special jury, a verdict of guilty having been found against the defendants, who are the proprietors and publishers of the Portsmouth Times and Naval Gazette.

The information had been granted at the instance of Mr. John Howard, the clerk of the peace for the borough of Portsmouth, who, in effect, had been charged by an article in that newspaper with having packed a grand jury at the borough quarter sessions, for the purpose of improperly dealing with an indictment for personation at a municipal election.

The defendants, who pleaded Not Guilty only, were proved to be the publishers of the paper and to be actively engaged in the management. It appeared, however, that they employed a competent editor to superintend that part of the paper in which the libel appeared, and he had general authority to publish whatever he thought proper. The defendants then tendered evidence to show their exemption from liability under the 7th section of Lord Campbell's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96). This evidence the learned judge refused to admit, and he directed the jury that the defendants were not in a position to avail themselves of that section.

The words of the 7th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, are,

That whensoever upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on his part.

On the 3rd Nov. Cole, Q.C. obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on behalf of the defendants, on the ground of misdirection in the judge's statement that the defendants were criminally responsible for the publication of the libel, although they had appointed a competent editor to conduct the newspaper, and that the publication was made without their actual authority, consent, or knowledge, and did not arise from want of due care or caution on their part.

Charles, Q.C. and A. L. Smith now showed cause for the prosecution.—Here the evidence established an actual publication under the general authority given to the editor by the defendants, and therefore this was not the mischief aimed at by the remedy given in this section. It was held by the Exchequer Chamber in Parkes v. Prescott (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 169) that the criminal liability for a libel published by authority was more extensive even than the civil liability. No doubt as far back as 1770 we find it stated that prima facie evidence of publication, such as public exposure for sale and selling at the defendants' shop, might be rebutted by evidence in exculpation (Rees v. Almon, 5 Burr. 2686), but there is no subsequent case in which that dictum has been acted upon. From that time the law and practice concerning libel seems to have become more stringent against publishers, except so far as Mr. Fox's Libel Act (32 Geo. 3, c. 60) relieved them by empowering the jury to give a general verdict upon the whole matter in issue, and abolished the previous limitation of their right to consider the publication only, which was the law as laid down in Rees v. The Dean of St. Asaph, reported in a note to Rees v. Withers

(3 T. Rep. 428). In 1819 (Rees v. Walter, 3 Esp. 21) Lord Kenyon said at Nisi Prius, "he was clearly of opinion that the proprietor of a newspaper was answerable criminally as well as civilly for the acts of his servants or agents for misconduct in the conducting of a newspaper. That was not his opinion only, but that of Lord Hale, Powell, J., and Foster, J.: all high law authorities, and to which he subscribed. This was the old and received law for above a century; and was not to be broken in upon by any new doctrine upon libels." This ruling was followed by Lord Tenterden at Nisi Prius in Rees v. Gutch (Moo. & Malk. 433), who, in summing up the second trial of the same defendants, said (p. 438): "I tell you to-day, as I thought myself bound to tell the jury yesterday, that the proprietor of a newspaper is criminally answerable for what appears in it; I do not mean to say, nor ever did mean to say, that some possible case may not occur in which he would be exempt, but generally speaking he is answerable." So in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, Bk. 1, ch. 28, sect. 10, we find, "And it is said not to be material whether he who disseminates a libel knew anything of the contents or effect of it or not." There are also dicta of Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., and Alderson, B., in Colburn v. Patmore (1 Cr. M. & E. 73), which adopt this view of the law. The former said (p. 77): "There is this distinction between the case of libel and that of other acts committed by servants, that whether the libel be published negligently or wilfully, the master is responsible, but in other cases he is answerable only where the act is negligent." Alderson, B. added: "A master is presumed to authorise the insertion of a libel; in other cases the master is not presumed to authorise the wilful act of his servant in committing a tort. Does not the proprietor of a newspaper give authority to the editor to publish everything, libellous or not? Does not such a general authority cover the publication of a libel?" In the case above mentioned (Rees v. Gutch) the defendants were proved to be proprietors of the newspaper in what is said to have been then the usual manner, by their affidavit filed at the Stamp office, and no evidence on the point was offered. Similar evidence by declaration and certified copy was made conclusive against the publisher by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 7; and although that section was repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, it was the law at the time Lord Campbell's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), was passed, and that evidence must have been intended by the description of "evidence which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant," contained in the 7th section. To meet this presumption created by the registration, that section provides a protection for a publisher if he can prove that the libel was published without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and without want of due care or caution, as by the insertion of a libel by an unauthorised person. It was not, however, intended in any way to apply to a case like the present where the publisher's general authority to the editor is proved, nor where the publisher is the manager of his own paper, and no libel can appear in it if due care and caution be exercised. This is implied by the note to this section contained in Chitty's Statutes, vol. 2 (3rd edit. 1865), p. 1254. That a general authority of this kind should render the defendants liable here is supported by the decision to that effect with respect to a fraudulent misrepresentation in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 259). [LUSH, J.—That is with respect to civil liability.] It was similarly held upon an indictment for a nuisance in

Reg. v. Stephens, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 702.

Oole, Q.C. and Folkard supported the rule.—The last case cited (Reg. v. Stephens) was expressly determined on the ground that there was no other remedy but an indictment, and that it was in the nature of a civil proceeding. In all cases of criminal liability except libel, the rule is and has always been admittedly that a person cannot be responsible without knowledge and consent for the illegal act of his servant or agent. Even at the time of Rees v. Almon, in the year 1770, it was possible to rebut the exception to this rule with respect to libel. The presumption against the publisher, although strengthened by the course of practice before Lord Campbell's Act, was always regarded as an anomaly; and it was to put an end to this anomaly, and not merely for the purpose of abolishing a particular mode of proof, that the 7th section was enacted. This is a case to which that section is exactly applicable, and the defendants ought to have been allowed to adduce the evidence which they tendered at the trial.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The facts, as I understand them, show that the defendants are the three joint proprietors of this newspaper; but it appears that, when not absent from Portsmouth, the duties of conducting the paper are divided between four persons, viz., the three defendants and an editor appointed by them to manage the literary department. The defendants undertake respectively the commercial, the advertising, and the publishing duties. At the time of the publication of this libel one of the defendants was absent in Somerset on account of his health, and he clearly was not cognisant of the publication. The others were present, and discharging their ordinary duties, but, as the editor had full discretion to publish whatever he thought proper in that department which issued the libellous publication, without consulting them, all the defendants must be taken, for the purpose of this rule, to have known nothing of the insertion of the article complained of. The question is whether the defendants, or either of them, are criminally responsible. It is an undoubted principle of law that a man is responsible criminally only for his own acts, or those authorised expressly by him through his appointed agent. It is not to be implied or inferred, from the fact that the defendants gave their editor a general authority to manage the paper as he thought proper, that they authorised him to do what was unlawful in the conduct of his ordinary business. Although this is the rule of law, there seems to have been introduced an exception with respect to libel. Lord Tenterden, at Nisi Prius, in 1829, following a previous direction of Lord Kenyon, and a statement of the law in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, laid down that a proprietor of a newspaper was criminally responsible for a libel, although he took no part in the publication of the newspaper, nor of the libel in question. He further proceeded to justify this ruling, and expatiated upon the danger to the public which its modification might cause. It is not necessary to say how far we dissent from that doctrine; it was considered an anomaly by high authority at the time, and I cannot doubt that the 7th section of Lord Campbell's Act was passed to put an end to it. It has been suggested that the object of this legislation was only to get rid of the presumption from particular evidence created by previous statute, or to apply to a case where the libel has been inserted by some one who had no authority to interfere at all with the publication. The answer to both these suggestions is that the section was unnecessary for the accomplishment of either of these objects, and I can come to no other conclusion than that it was intended by these words to reverse this anomaly, and to render libel subject to the general law. If then, as I think, this provision was designed to protect the proprietor of a newspaper from criminal responsibility for the act of another person, committed through no fault of his and without his authority, does not the case here come within its application? As to the defendant who was absent, he clearly is protected unless the prosecution can show that his general authority to the editor expressly included power to publish libels. As to the other two defendants, the section provides protection from liability for a publication made without a publisher's authority, consent, or knowledge, if he has exercised due care and caution: it would then be a question for the jury looking at all the circumstances, whether those defendants can show themselves entitled to that protection. If the jury should be in the defendants' favour on these points they can neither of them be criminally liable. I say nothing about their position civilly, but it seems to me that the section can have no application at all if it does not apply to this case. It is not for us to say whether it is expedient or desirable that proprietors of newspapers should be freed from liability under such circumstances, and I do not consider that question. Simply this section is, in my opinion, applicable to the facts upon which this rule has been granted; I think it must be made absolute, and the case must go back for a new trial.

MELLOB, J.—I regret much that I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Lush in their view of this matter. I dissent with the greatest diffidence, but I cannot think that the Legislature intended to apply sect. 7 of this Act to persons situated as these defendants are. They do not in the ordinary way live at any distance from the publishing office, they do not keep away from the general management of the paper, and the whole business is conducted for their profit and by their authority. The editor might by inadvertence have published this libel, but the want of care would then deprive the publication of the protection given in the Act. I think, too, that the absent partner is in the same position as the other two; they all gave their editor a general authority to do what he liked; they vested their discretion in him, they put themselves in his hands, and they must be taken to have authorised whatever he has done. The 7th section requires not only the absence of authority, consent, and knowledge, but also the presence of care and caution. I quite agree that, upon the evidence adduced at the trial, this libel, must be taken to have been published without the knowledge of the defendants; but, to be exempt from liability, they must further prove that it was beyond the authority they had given to their editor, and that they were duly careful and cautious in respect of its publication. If my brother Lindley took the view that the statute did not apply because the defendants could not show all or some of these conditions of exemption, he seems to me to have been right in his summing up and refusal to hear the evidence tendered. Proprietors who take part in the management of their paper, but commit themselves to the discretion of an editor who is careless, cannot escape responsibility; but if the failure in care is not due to the proprietors themselves, or to the person whom they trust, then it may be that this clause applies. The defendants here take various parts in managing their paper, and the learned judge was right, in my opinion, if he said upon the evidence before him that the libel was published with the defendants' authority and consent, if not with their actual knowledge, and that the protection given by this section did not cover them unless they showed no want of care on the part of the editor. The case, however, must go for a new trial upon the judgment of the majority of the court.

LUSH, J.—There are two questions for our consideration; one as to the construction of the 7th section of Lord Campbell's Act; the other, whether the evidence adduced at the trial was sufficient to justify the direction that this section did not protect the defendants. And, first, what was the object of this section? The Act professes to amend the law of libel, and to understand this particular provision we must consider what was the state of the previous law. We find that a proprietor was then liable criminally for the publication of a libel in his paper without his knowledge or authority. This was admitted to be an anomaly and felt to be a hardship. The nuisance case cited is quite a different matter; that was a public injury for which there was no private remedy, whilst a libel is a private injury for which a public remedy has been added to the existing private one. I do not feel at liberty to apply to this section the limited interpretation which has been suggested. What is the fair meaning of the words? They seem to me to exactly apply to a proprietor whose editor admits into the paper libels without his authority. The last part of the section must mean that a proprietor is bound to exercise proper care and caution in his appointment of an editor; and, if he does that, he is not responsible for the editor's acts done without his authority, consent, or knowledge. This is the remedy which the Legislature would naturally apply to such an admitted anomaly as this rule of law was. There is ample protection for the public without injury to the proprietor. The evidence tendered in this case ought to have been admitted; and it might have been sufficient, as it seems to me, to have justified the jury in finding for the defendants.

CURTIS (app.) v. Buss (resp.) (a)

Appeal to Quarter Sessions—Notice to court of summary jurisdiction—Service—Address—Conviction for being found drunk—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, ss. 12, 52.

The appellant was convicted by justices of the Cinque Ports, sitting at Ramsgate, of being found drunk under the Licensing Act 1872, s. 12. Five days afterwards he served upon the clerk to the justices, sitting at Ramsgate, a notice of appeal purporting to be in accordance with sect. 52, subsect. 2 of that Act, but addressed generally to the Justices of the Cinque Ports and the respondent. Neither of the justices who heard the complaint received any notice of appeal. The Recorder at Quarter Sessions held the notice bad, and did not proceed on the merits. He granted a case, however, on the sufficiency of the notice of appeal.

Held, on rule for mandamus to the recorder to hear the merits, that this was not notice to the court of summary jurisdiction of the appellant's intention to appeal, within the words of the said sub-section; and that the recorder was not bound to hear the merits if he considered he had no jurisdiction.

THIS was a rule nisi calling upon the deputy recorder of the borough and Cinque Port of Sandwich in the county of Kent, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to him commanding him to enter or cause to be entered continuances from session to session to the next general quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden in and for the said borough and cinque port, upon the appeal of Horace Curtis against a certain conviction bearing date on or about the 16th of April last, whereby the said Horace Curtis was convicted of having been found drunk on certain premises situate in the liberty of Ramsgate, licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail; and at such next general quarter sessions of the peace to hear and determine the merits of the said appeal.

The appellant, the said Horace Curtis, was charged, on the said 16th April, in the Town Hall, Ramsgate, before seven justices of the Cinque Ports (of which Ramsgate is a liberty), sitting in petty sessions, under the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 12, with having been found drunk, on the night of the 4th April, in certain premises in Ramsgate licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail. The charge was made against the appellant by Edward Buss, superintendent of the Ramsgate police, who was respondent in the said appeal; and the said justices convicted the appellant and fined him 10s. and costs.

Two only of the said seven justices signed the conviction.

On the 21st April the following notice and grounds of appeal, signed by the appellant's solicitor, were served upon the respondent, and also upon the clerk to the justices who sit in petty sessions at Ramsgate; but no notice of appeal was received by any of the seven justices who were on the bench when the appellant was convicted:

"To Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the liberties of the Cinque Ports, and to Edward Buss, chief officer of police in the parish of Ramsgate.

"I hereby, on behalf of Horace Curtis, who was convicted at the Town Hall, Ramsgate aforesaid, on the 16th day of April instant, of being found drunk on certain premises, licensed for sale of intoxicating liquors by retail, there situate, and in the occupation of one John Overy Eve, give you and each of you notice that it is the intention of the said Horace Curtis to appeal against such conviction at the next general quarter sessions to be held at Sandwich, on the ground that such conviction was against the weight of evidence produced at the hearing and trial of the complaint and information upon which the said conviction was made.

"Dated the 21st April 1877.

"H. W. DORMAN,

"Solicitor for the said Horace Curtis."

On the 23rd April the appellant and two sureties duly entered into recognisances to prosecute this appeal; and the bond recited the conviction as having been made by the two justices who signed it, giving their names in full, and describing them as "two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the liberties of the Cinque Ports."

At the hearing of the appeal at quarter sessions, the Deputy Recorder, upon the application of the respondent's counsel, held that service of notice of appeal upon the clerk to the justices only, and not upon any of the justices, was an insufficient notice to the court of summary jurisdiction, within the meaning of sect. 52, sub-sect. 2, of the said Licensing Act 1872, and that he had therefore no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. He, however, granted a special case for the consideration of the point of law by the Queen's Bench Division. A special case raising the question was accordingly settled by the parties; but their attention being called to Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 153), the appellant moved this rule, instead of proceeding therewith.

By sect. 52 of the said Act it is enacted that:

If any person feels aggrieved by any order or conviction made by a court of summary jurisdiction, the person so aggrieved may appeal therefrom, subject to the conditions and regulations following,

(2) The appellant shall, within seven days after the cause of appeal has arisen, give notice to the other party, and to the court of summary jurisdiction, of his intention to appeal, and of the ground thereof.

Kingsford showed cause against the rule on behalf of the respondent.—The two objections to this notice are, (1) that its address to the justices of the Cinque Ports is too wide; it should have been limited to those who convicted the appellant; and (2) that its service upon the clerk to the justices was no service upon the court of summary jurisdiction. No judicial interpretation has yet been put upon the required notice to the court of summary jurisdiction; but it has been held under words requiring a person, aggrieved by an order or conviction made by any justice, to give notice in writing to such justice that it was not enough, in the case of a conviction under the General Highway Act by two justices, to serve a notice only on one although addressed to both, and although it was proved that the justice who received the notice passed it on to the clerk of the justices. The validity of the notice in this present case is not affected by Reg. v. Eaves (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 75), where it was held that service upon the clerk in the presence of the justices was service upon the justices. Similar words are used with respect to notice upon the court of summary jurisdiction in 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32, s. 3, sub-sect. 2; but the effect of them has not been considered, although Reg. v. Goodall (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 559) was decided upon other provisions of the Act.

Deane supported the rule.—The effect of Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 153) is that this appeal must be heard at the quarter sessions upon the merits before the preliminary objection to the notices can be brought before this court. This rule, therefore, must be made absolute. [LUSH, J.—The rule is, that the quarter sessions may hear and determine the appeal. How can we direct that court to determine a matter in which it may have no jurisdiction? COCKBURN, C.J.—We must decide the validity of the notice of appeal first.] The question on that point is whether the words requiring notice to the court of summary jurisdiction mean that the appellant must serve notice upon each magistrate who was on the bench during the hearing. The appellant is allowed seven days in which to make his appeal, and before that he may be unable to find out who or where those magistrates are. [LUSH, J.—At all events the appellant here had the names of the justices who signed the conviction in his recognisances within the time allowed.] The 2nd sub-section of this 52nd section does not require notice in writing, therefore the clerk's verbal information to the justices is sufficient.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This rule must be discharged on the ground that the deputy recorder was right in refusing to hear the appeal. It was quite within his jurisdiction to decide that the notices of appeal were not valid, and upon that decision his jurisdiction was ousted. It might be a question whether, upon the authority of Reg. v. Sutton Coldfield, we could consider the propriety of this decision upon a special case, even if the merits of the appeal had been afterwards heard. It is not necessary, however, to allude to it, because the point of law whether there was jurisdiction to hear the appeal upon these notices is more properly raised by this rule. One object of the 52nd section of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94 is, that an appeal against a conviction by justices should be brought to the knowledge of those justices who took part in it. It is certainly not sufficient to serve a notice under the 2nd sub-section upon the clerk to the bench in the absence of the justices who heard the complaint. It should not only be served upon those justices in person, but I think it ought to be addressed to the particular bench of the division or borough which formed the court of summary jurisdiction. It is clear that this notice of appeal was bad, and therefore this rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—It turns out that this notice was clearly insufficient, and the deputy recorder has rightly decided not to hear the appeal. If it had been otherwise, and the notice were good, we could have interfered by mandamus, and directed the hearing on the merits. This would be useless, however, until the preliminary question is decided.

LUSH, J.—This being a rule for mandamus, we must decide the preliminary question, whether the notice of appeal was good. Clearly, this was not a proper service; it is no duty of a justice's clerk to serve such a notice upon the members of his bench, and the justices who heard the complaint ought to have an opportunity of opposing the appeal.

TEBB (app.) v. JONES (resp.) (a)

Vaccination—Previous conviction—Notice to vaccinate—30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, s. 31—34 & 35 Vict. c. 92, s. 11.

The appellant was ordered by a magistrate, under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867, to cause his child to be vaccinated upon a notice from the vaccination officer headed Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871, and reciting that appellant was in default under the above Acts in respect of his said child; the notice proceeded to require the appellant to have the child vaccinated within fourteen days, and do all other things the law requires touching the said vaccination; failing which it would be the vaccination officer's duty to report the case in order that proceedings should be taken as the law directs.

The appellant had been twice before fined in reference to the vaccination of the said child, who was two years old.

Held, upon a case stated, that there was nothing in the Vaccination Act of 1871 to prevent a repetition of a conviction for breach of the 31st section of the Act of 1867, and that this notice was well adapted to that section's requirements.

On the 25th May 1877 William Tebb, the appellant, appeared before one of the magistrates of the police courts of the Metropolis sitting in the Marylebone Police Court, in answer to a summons to show cause why an order should not be made directing Beatrice Hewetson Tebb (a child of the appellant, hitherto not successfully vaccinated, under fourteen years of age, and being within the said parish) to be vaccinated.

It was given in evidence by the respondent that the said child was two years of age, and that he had received no certificate that she had been vaccinated.

That on the 15th March last he had served notices at the residence of the appellant, copies of which were annexed.

That he did not know whether the child was now in the parish, and that the appellant had twice been fined in reference to the vaccination of the same child.

No evidence was offered on behalf of the appellant, but his counsel objected:

1. That the notice proved to have been served on the appellant, the neglect of which forms the ground for this information, is not the notice required by the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, s. 31.

2. That the appellant has already been convicted of neglect to attend to the notice required by the above-named section, and cannot be again proceeded against for the same neglect, nor can that notice be repeated.

3. That the limitation of time prescribed by the Act 34 & 35 Vict. c. 98, s. 11, is a bar to the present proceeding, the child being beyond the age of fifteen months.

The further hearing of the case was then adjourned till the 15th June, and, being of opinion that the above-mentioned objections were not in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the said Acts, the magistrate made an order that the said child should be vaccinated.

The appellant being dissatisfied with this decision, as being erroneous in point of law, duly gave the magistrate notice in writing to state a case for the opinion of this honourable court, and duly entered into the recognisance required by the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The following are the notices referred to:—

Parish of Saint Pancras,
Vestry Hall, St. Pancras, N.W.,
15th March 1877.

Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871.

Whereas you are in default under the above Acts respecting your child Beatrice Hewetson Tebb, I hereby require you to have the said child vaccinated within fourteen days from the date hereof, and do all other things the law requires touching the said vaccination, failing which it will be my duty to report your case in order that proceedings may be taken as the law directs.

W. T. JONES,
Vaccination Officer.

To Mr. William Tebb.
Mr. Claremont, M.B.C.S., Milbrook House, Hampstead-road, public vaccinator for St. Pancras, attends, &c., to vaccinate without charge children or other persons resident in the parish.

If the child be vaccinated at one of the above-mentioned stations, the public vaccinator is responsible for the transmission of the certificate to me, otherwise it devolves upon yourself to send me the certificate.

N.B.—This is the last notice; a summons will be issued at the expiration of fourteen days from this date.

If the child is unfit for vaccination it is necessary to forward a medical certificate of postponement.

A form "B." for the purpose will be found on the paper furnished by the registrar.

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84 (the Vaccination Act of 1867), s. 31:

If any registrar or any officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that any child under the age of fourteen years, being within the union or parish for which the informant acts, has not been successfully vaccinated, and that he has given notice to the parent or person having the custody of such child to procure it being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, the justice may summon such parent or person to appear with the child before him at a certain time and place, and upon the appearance if the justice shall find, after such examination as he shall deem necessary, that the child has not been vaccinated, nor has already had the smallpox, he may, if he see fit, make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time; and if at the expiration of such time the child shall not have been so vaccinated, or shall not be shown to be then unfit to be vaccinated or to be insusceptible of vaccination, the person upon whom such order shall have been made shall be proceeded against summarily, and unless he can show some reasonable ground for his omission to carry the order into effect shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s.

Provided, that if the justice shall be of opinion that the person is improperly brought before him, and shall refuse to make any order for the vaccination of the child, he may order the informant to pay such person such sum of money as he shall consider to be a fair compensation for his expenses and loss of time in attending before the justice.

The only form of notice in the schedule to this Act requires vaccination within three months from birth, according to sect. 15, which requires the notice to be delivered by the registrar to the parent, for the purposes of being filled up, within seven days of the registration of birth.

By 34 & 35 Vict. c. 98 (the Vaccination Act 1871), s. 11 :

Proceedings under sect. 31 of the principal Act (the Vaccination Act of 1867) may be taken and proceeded with with respect to any child who is not within the union or parish for which a vaccination officer acts, if either the child or its parent was within such union or parish at the time of the information being given by such vaccination officer.

Where any parent of a child fails to produce such child when required so to do by any summons under the principal Act, such person shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 20s.

Any complaint may be made and any information laid for an offence under the Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871 at any time not exceeding twelve months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information arose, and not subsequently.

When a person is charged with the offence of neglecting to take or cause to be taken any child to be vaccinated, and on the defence made by such person it appears to the justices having cognisance of the case that such person is not guilty of such offence, but has been guilty of the offence of not transmitting any certificate required by the principal Act or this Act with respect to the vaccination of such child, the justices may convict such person of the last-mentioned offence in like manner as if he had been charged therewith.

The defendant in any proceedings under the principal Act or this Act may appear by any member of his family or any other person authorised by him in this behalf.

Baker argued for the appellant.—Under the 31st section of the Vaccination Act 1867 it was decided, in Allen v. Worthy (L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 163), that a parent might be proceeded against a second time for non-vaccination of his child; but sect. 11 of the Act of 1871 forbids any complaint or information after a year has expired since the offence. Now the offence, as provided by the form in the schedule, can only be non-vaccination in the first three months of life; the child here being two years old cannot therefore be within the compulsion of the former Act.

Francis appeared for the respondent, but was stopped by the Court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This case is very clear, and I do not understand why the magistrate stated it. There has been here a complete compliance with the 31st section of the Act of 1867. The argument that a man cannot be punished twice for persisting in refusing to have his child vaccinated was considered and held to be of no avail under this section in Allen v. Worthy. There is nothing in the Act of 1871 to alter the law as determined by that case. If this notice were invalid merely because there is no form like it in the schedule to the Act, legislation on many subjects would be abortive. There is nothing in either statute to prevent a repetition of a conviction for breach of the 31st section of the earlier Act, and this notice is well adapted to that section's requirements.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to protect the public from smallpox, the object of these Acts is clearly to enforce successful vaccination. This is a notice in accordance with the terms of the 31st section of the Act of 1867, and the conviction must be affirmed.

WATKINS (app.) v. PRICE (resp.) (a)

Game—Close time—Kill or take—Object of removal—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 3.

Respondent, in the month of May, finding a pheasant caught accidentally in a rabbit wire set upon land occupied by him, picked it up and took it away, the pheasant being alive.

Justices upon these facts refused to convict him of killing or taking the pheasant between the 1st Feb. and the 1st Oct. under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 3.

Held, upon a case stated, that the justices must find as a fact the object with which he carried off the pheasant; and that, if he meant to appropriate it, he ought to have been convicted.

THIS was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Monmouth, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter mentioned.

At a petty sessions holden at Abergavenny, in the county of Monmouth, on Wednesday, the 30th May 1877, an information preferred by David Watkins (hereinafter called the appellant) against James Price (hereinafter called the respondent) under sect. 3 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging for that he said respondent, on the 1st May 1877, at the parish of Cwmoy, in the county of Monmouth (the same day being between the 1st Feb. and the 1st Oct.), unlawfully did take one pheasant there, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being present, and represented by their respective solicitors.

At the hearing of the said information the justices dismissed the charge against the respondent, without costs, and the appellant being dissatisfied with this determination, as being erroneous in point of law, and not in conformity with the intent and meaning of the Act 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, applied to them in writing, within three days after the determination, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination as aforesaid, for the opinion thereon of this court, and duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf. Therefore the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, stated and signed the following case:—

By sect. 3 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, so far as is material to this case, it is enacted "that if any person whatsoever shall kill or take any pheasant between the 1st Feb. and the 1st Oct. in any year, every such person shall, on conviction of any such offence before two justices of the peace, forfeit and pay for every head of game so killed or taken such sum of money, not exceeding one pound, as to the said justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction."

Sect. 2 of the said Act 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, so far as is material to this case, enacts that the word "game" shall for all the purposes of this Act be deemed to include pheasants.

Upon the hearing of the said information, the appellant, who is a gamekeeper, appeared with his

PRENTICE (app.) v. HALL (resp.)

solicitor, and the respondent appeared with his solicitor, and the following facts were proved.

It was proved by and on the part of the appellant and found as facts, that he the said appellant was keeper to Mr. Lilburn Rosher. That on Tuesday morning, the 1st May 1877, a little after four o'clock, he saw a cock pheasant in a wire snare upon land occupied by the respondent; appellant concealed himself, and watched until about half-past seven a.m. when the respondent came and looked over the fence where the pheasant was; the respondent then seemed to be looking if anybody was about, and went away a short distance and then returned, picked up the bird, put it under his arm and took it away, the pheasant being then alive.

Appellant then called out to the respondent, but he did not seem to take any notice, when appellant went over the fence and across the field to him; respondent said, "Now, Watkins, you have put this one in for me, but I know I am in for it;" when appellant got up to him the bird dropped its head, and the respondent put it on the ground, when it moved, but could not get away. The appellant told the respondent that he might as well kill the bird as punish it; respondent did not kill it, but picked it up again and went off with it.

The solicitor for the appellant contended that respondent should be convicted.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the respondent, who has the right to do so, set his wires to kill rabbits, which are in such numbers that they eat up all his corn and vegetables. That the wire by which the pheasant was held was a triple wire, not such as would be set for pheasants (a wire for a pheasant is generally a single one), and that it caught the pheasant wholly by accident and against the respondent's will. That the pheasant was not killed, the respondent refusing to kill it, and that it was not taken, but that it was simply moved from where it was found, in order to its restoration to health; that it was so restored, and that it was again set at liberty, and that the respondent had not committed any offence within the meaning of the statute. The respondent's solicitor alleged that the wire was such a one as is used for taking rabbits, but it was not produced. A live pheasant was produced in court by the respondent, who stated that it was the pheasant found in the wire, and it was suggested by the respondent's solicitor that it should be restored to liberty at the place where it was caught in the presence of witnesses. It was taken away by the respondent.

The justices, being of opinion that the respondent had the right of setting wires in the fence referred to for the purpose of destroying rabbits, and that he did set the said wire solely for the purpose of destroying rabbits, and not with the intention of catching pheasants, and being of opinion that the catching of the pheasant in the wire was accidental and not intentional on the part of the respondent, decided that it was not an unlawful taking within the object and meaning of the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, and dismissed the case.

Whereupon the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division was asked whether, upon the facts and under the circumstances hereinbefore stated, and the law applicable thereto, the said justices were correct in their determination as aforesaid.

If the Queen's Bench Division should be of opinion that they were correct, the information was to stand dismissed.

If the court should be of opinion that they were not correct, it was to be sent back to the justices to be dealt with accordingly.

Pritchard argued for the appellant, the complainant.—There is no such word as "wilfully" or "wrongfully" in the 3rd section of this Act, therefore any taking of a pheasant is an offence. Here, although the catching in the trap was accidental, there was a clear "taking" by the respondent within the meaning of the Act, if not from the trap itself, at all events afterwards when he picked it up from the ground and went off with it.

Bosanquet supported the decision of the magistrates on behalf of the defendant.—The only question, apparently, which is reserved, is whether an accidental taking is a breach of the Act. The justices, upon the whole of the evidence, have found for the respondent, thereby ignoring any unlawful or improper intention on his part.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The justices have omitted the important part of their finding. The only material fact is the object with which the respondent carried away the pheasant with him. We cannot decide that point, but must remit the case to the justices. If they are satisfied that he did not mean to appropriate the bird, there should be no conviction; but unless he meant to restore it to health and release it, he has taken the bird within the meaning of the Act.

MELLOR and LUSH, JJ. concurred.

Case remitted.

PRENTICE (app.) v. HALL (resp.) (a)

Coal mine—Check-weigher—Misconduct—Intimidation—Order of removal—35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, s. 18.

The appellant, a check-weigher, stationed by the persons employed in the respondent's mine to take an account of the weighing of the mineral gotten by them, under sect. 18 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, had been convicted and imprisoned for intimidating one of the workmen with a view to compel him to abstain from working as a waggon-rider in the respondent's employment. Respondent applied to justices for a summary order for the appellant's removal, under the provisions of that section, and the justices, although it did not so appear on the face of the conviction, admitted evidence to show, and found as a fact, that the said intimidation took place on the respondent's premises, where the appellant had no right to be, except in his capacity of check-weigher. It did not appear that this intimidation caused any impediment or interruption of the working of the mine, but the justices made the order of removal.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant had misconducted himself within the meaning of the section, and that the justices were justified in making the order.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Durham, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with their determination upon the questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated, on the 18th Aug. 1877, at the police-court in Bishopwearmouth, in the said county, the appellant having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

Upon the hearing of a certain complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellant, under sect. 18 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, "That the appellant, being a check-weigher, under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulations Act 1872, on behalf of the men employed at the mine known as the Ryhope Coal Mine, in the township of Ryhope, in the Sunderland division of Easington ward, and county of Durham, did unlawfully misconduct himself in the manner following: that is to say, he the appellant, on the 5th May 1877, at Ryhope, in the county aforesaid, unlawfully, wrongfully, and without legal authority, did intimidate one John Goodman, with a view to compel him to abstain from working as a waggon-rider in the employment of the said Ryhope Coal Company (Limited), for which offence he the appellant was, on the 2nd July 1877, indicted at the General Quarter Sessions of the peace holden at Durham in and for the said county of Durham, and thereof was duly convicted, and thereupon was ordered and adjudged to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the House of Correction at Durham aforesaid for the term of one month, which conviction was not in the least reversed, annulled, or made void, as appears by the record of the court. And the respondent, as manager and agent of the said Ryhope Coal Mine, prayed that the appellant might be called upon to show cause why he should not be removed from his said position as check-weigher as aforesaid.

The Justices made an order for the removal of the appellant from his office as check-weigher as aforesaid, but they made an order as to the costs of the proceedings.

The following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties:—

1. That on the said 5th May 1877 the appellant was check-weigher under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, on the behalf of the persons employed at the said Ryhope Coal Mine.

2. That the respondent was the registered agent, under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, of the Ryhope Coal Company, and of its owners, the Ryhope Coal Company (Limited).

3. That the Ryhope Coal Mine is situate within the township of Ryhope, in the Sunderland division of Easington ward and county of Durham.

4. That the Ryhope Coal Company (Limited) is a company incorporated and registered under the provisions of the Companies Acts.

5. That on the said 5th May 1877 the said John Goodman was a person employed by the Ryhope Coal Company (Limited).

6. That, in accordance with the custom at Ryhope Colliery (the said 5th May 1877 being Saturday) only a few "banksmen" were at work, and those were not in the pit, but at the surface of the colliery, and on the premises of the colliery.

7. That the said John Goodman was one of these banksmen (being a waggon-rider), and was on the 5th May 1877 on the "branches" of the colliery in his proper employment.

8. That on the said 5th May 1877, and whilst the said John Goodman was in his proper employment as before set out, the appellant unlawfully, wrongfully, and without legal authority, did intimidate him the said John Goodman, with a view to compel him to abstain from working in the employment of the Ryhope Coal Company (Limited).

9. That for the said offence the appellant was, on the 2nd July 1877, indicted at the Midsummer General Quarter Sessions of the peace, held at Durham in and for the said county of Durham, and thereof was convicted and ordered and adjudged to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the house of correction aforesaid for the term of one month.

10. That the appellant suffered such term of imprisonment for the said offence.

11. That a certified copy of the said conviction, produced at the hearing of the complaint, was a true copy; and that the said William Prentice therein named is the appellant.

12. That the said appellant was not the servant of the Ryhope Coal Company (Limited); and, except in his capacity as check-weigher on behalf of the persons employed at the colliery, he had no right on the colliery premises, but was a trespasser.

13. That the intimidation took place on Ryhope Colliery premises.

14. That there was no work done at the colliery on Monday, the 7th May 1877; but on Tuesday, the day following, the said John Goodman worked there under the protection of the police as such waggon-rider as aforesaid, and was so employed at the hearing.

On the part of the appellant it was contended:

1. That neither the written complaint, nor the office copy conviction produced, disclosed that the intimidation of the said J. Goodman occurred at the Ryhope Colliery, and on its works; and a question asked on the behalf of the respondent as to the locality, whether it was or was not a part of the colliery premises, was objected to by the appellant, the objection being overruled by the justices, but was noted at the request of the appellant.

2. It was further contended on the part of the appellant that, if there were general words in a statute, or section of a statute, the construction of such words was limited by particular words preceding or following them (Sandiman v. Breach, 7 B. & C. 96, quoted in support); and that in this case the general words "or has otherwise misconducted himself" (sect. 18 of the Act 35 & 36 c. 76) must be taken in connection with and are limited by those particular words preceding the general words in the same section. The following are the words of sect. 18:

The persons who are employed in a mine to which this Act applies, and are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, may, at their own cost, station a person (in this Act referred to as "a check-weigher") at the place appointed for the weighing of such mineral, in order to take an account of the weight thereof on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed. The check-weigher shall be one of the persons employed either in the mine at which he is so stationed or in another mine belonging to the owner of that mine. He shall have every facility afforded to him to take a correct account of the weighing for the persons by whom he is so stationed; and if in any mine proper facilities are not afforded to the check-weigher as required by this section, the owner, agent, and manager of such mine shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he prove that he has taken all reasonable means by enforcing to the best of his power the provisions of this section to prevent such contravention or non-compliance. The check-weigher shall not be authorised in any way to impede or interrupt the working of the mine, or to interfere with the weighing, but shall be authorised only to take such account as aforesaid, and the absence of the check-weigher shall not be a reason for interrupting or delaying such weighing. If the owner, agent, or manager of the mine desires the removal of a check-weigher, on the ground that such check-weigher has impeded or interrupted the working of the mine, or interfered with the weighing, or has otherwise misconducted himself, he may complain to any court of summary jurisdiction, who, if of opinion that the owner, agent, or manager shows sufficient prima facie ground for the removal of such check-weigher, shall call upon the check-weigher to show cause against his removal. On the hearing of the case, the court shall hear the parties, and, if they think that at the hearing sufficient ground is shown by the owner, agent, or manager to justify the removal of the check-weigher, shall make a summary order for his removal, and the check-weigher shall thereupon be removed, but without prejudice to the stationing of another check-weigher in his place. The court may in every case make such order as to the costs of the proceedings as they think just. If in pursuance of any order of exemption made by a Secretary of State, the persons employed in a mine to which this Act applies are paid by the measure or gauge of the material gotten by them, the provisions of this section shall apply in like manner as if the term "weighing" included measuring and gauging, and the terms relating to weighing shall be construed accordingly.

And the contention of the appellant is, in short, that the misconduct that renders the check-weigher liable to proceedings and removal from his position under this section must be misconduct in his capacity as check-weigher, and must be misconduct whereby the working of the mine was impeded or interrupted or the weighing interfered with.

On the part of the respondent it was contended:

1. That there was a sufficient disclosure in the written complaint of the place at which the intimidation of the said John Goodman occurred to justify us in our admission of an answer to the question whether or not it was on the colliery premises, and that such question and the answer were in accordance with the lawful rules of evidence.

2. It was further contended on the part of the respondent, that the true interpretation of the 18th section of the said Act 35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, was that, if a check-weigher did misconduct himself upon the colliery premises other than by impeding or interrupting the working of the mine, or by interfering with the weighing, he would be liable to proceedings before the justices, and be subject to the provisions of the said section; and that at the discretion of the justices hearing the complaint an order of removal might be made on sufficient ground shown by the complainant.

The Justices being of opinion that the contention of the respondent was the legal and proper one, on the ground that the Act could not reasonably be construed to give a check-weigher unlimited liberty and licence of action and speech, so long as the working of the mine was not impeded or interrupted, nor the weighing interfered with, and being of opinion that the intimidation of the said John Goodman was sufficient ground proved by the respondent to justify in making them in making an order for the removal of the appellant from his office as check-weigher as aforesaid for misconduct, and that the said intimidation was misconduct within the meaning of the Act, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The questions of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court, therefore, are:

1. Whether there is not a sufficient disclosure in the complaint and copy conviction of the appellant for the intimidation of the said John Goodman as aforesaid, in the words "at Ryhope in the said county," to justify our decision to admit the question whether the place where the intimidation of the said John Goodman occurred was or was not a part of the colliery premises, and the answer that it was, and that the said John Goodman was then working on what are known as the "branches" of the colliery, such question and answer being objected to by the appellant and the objection noted as before mentioned.

2. Whether the words "or has otherwise misconducted himself," in the said sect. 18 of the Act, are to be construed and limited by the preceding words of the same section, "if the owner, agent, or manager of the mine desires the removal of a check-weigher, on the ground that such check-weigher has impeded or interrupted the working of the mine, or interfered with the weighing." And whether, as a result, the misconduct which makes a check-weigher liable to proceedings and removal under this section must be misconduct as a check-weigher, and be such as occasions the working of the mine to be impeded or interrupted, or the weighing interfered with. And whether the words "or has otherwise misconducted himself" are to be taken as referring to a separate and distinct class of misconduct by a check-weigher, from the particular misconduct of impeding or interrupting the working of the mine, or interfering with the weighing; and whether, in this case, in which the opinion of the court is now sought, the intimidation on the colliery premises of the said John Goodman by the appellant was misconduct, within the meaning of the section, affording legal and just ground for the complaint and for the order of removal, and generally as to the construction of the section, and what is misconduct which subjects a check-weigher to an order of removal.

A. Wills, Q.C. (with him A. Jones) argued for the appellant.

Mellor, Q.C. (with him E. Clarke), for the respondent, was not heard.

MELLOR, J.—It has been considered essential by the Legislature that the person who occupies the position of check-weigher, as provided by this section, should have no authority to impede or interrupt the working of the mine. There is nothing in the section to limit the kind of interruption intended to be forbidden, or to confine the time in which such interruption might occur to the mere actual working hours. In this case the check-weigher was not a mere trespasser on the respondent's premises; he was using his position as check-weigher as an opportunity for intimidating a workman; such a proceeding comes within the very words of the section, as tending to impede the working of the mine. But, even if not covered by the words themselves, we ought not, I think, to be too strict in limiting the meaning of the expression "otherwise misconducted himself," which, in my opinion, certainly includes the ground of the respondent's application to the court of summary jurisdiction in this case. I am satisfied that the justices were right on all the points they have reserved, and were fully justified in making the order appealed against.

Q.B. Div.]

PIKE (app.) v. ROSSITER (resp.)

[Q.B. Div.]

LUSH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The meaning of the section is plain. A man is put in a position to care for the interests of the workmen, which is independent of the employer or owner of the mine. If, however, he uses that position so as to impede or interrupt the working of the mine, or otherwise misconduct himself in any way having that tendency, whether on or off the premises, or whether in or out of the working hours, he is liable to be removed. The essence of the offence is the use of his position, and the case finds as a fact that, except as check-weigher, he had no right on the premises where the intimidation for which he was convicted took place. It is not necessary to show that actual interruption to the working of the mine was the direct result of the check-weigher's conduct. Intimidation was calculated to have that effect, and is clearly pointed out by the words "otherwise misconducted himself." The order of removal will be affirmed.

PIKE (app.) v. ROSSITER (resp.) (a)

Salmon fishery—Fishing mill-dam—Obstruction to fish—24 & 25 Vict. c. 109 s. 22.

The respondent was charged before justices, under sect. 22 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, with omitting to maintain a clear opening of not less than four feet wide through the crib, box, or cruiwe of a fishery occupied by him, during the weekly close time. It was proved that his mill-dam had been a fishing mill-dam before 1859, and there were now the remains of a box with fenders over openings of the required size. But part of the old box was broken away; there were no internal appliances, and the box had ceased to be used, or capable of being used, for catching fish. A certificate of the Fishery Commissioners in 1871, however, referred to this dam as a fishing mill-dam, but there was no evidence of any alteration since the passing of the Act, by which increased obstruction to fish was created.

Held (upon a case stated), that this dam had ceased to be a fishing mill-dam before the said Act; that sect. 22 did not apply, and that the justices were right in dismissing the charge.

THIS was a case stated by four of Her Majesty's justices in and for the county of Devon, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Guildhall, in Totnes, in and for the division of Stanborough and Coleridge, in the county of Devon, on the 9th July 1877, an information preferred by Anthony Pike (hereinafter called the appellant) against John Reap Rossiter (hereinafter called the respondent), charging "for that the said respondent being the occupier of a fishery at Totnes Weir, in the parish of Darlington, in the said county of Devon, did not between twelve o'clock at noon on Saturday, 30th June last, and six o'clock on the

Monday morning following, maintain a clear opening of not less than 4ft. in width from the bottom to the top through the crib, box, or cruiwe, of the said fishery at the Totnes Weir, so that a free space of that width was not effectually secured for the passage of the fish up and down through the said box, crib, or cruiwe, contrary to sect. 22 of statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109," was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present; and upon such hearing the justices dismissed the said information: at the request, however, of the appellant they granted the following case:—

It appeared from the evidence taken at the hearing before the justices that there was what the appellant called a box at the weir. It was proved that only a wood sill, level with the floor at the bottom of the box where the gates hung, was there now, and iron fenders, which are capable of being raised or lowered to regulate the supply of water to the mill, are also still existing. That the engines which used to exist were not at the weir now, although there was evidence of their existence up to 1859.

That the fenders could be raised 4ft.; but if the fenders were down, or only raised a small distance, salmon could not ascend into the higher water. The length of the side walls of the so-called box was 46ft. 6in., and the floor 15ft. 1in. wide at the bottom, and 13ft. 4in. at the top, and part of one of the iron fenders was broken.

That the difference at the weir, as compared with years ago, was that there were iron fenders now instead of wooden ones. These fenders when shut down are as high as the rest of the weir. That the fenders are now at the head of the sluice as formerly, but all other interior fittings and traps used for the catching of fish were removed, and no evidence was given as to the date of removal. That when water was running over the weir salmon had been seen by a witness on many occasions attempting to run up, but he had never seen a fish pass into the higher water.

That the traps were made a very great number of years before the remembrance of an old man who gave his evidence. That there was not now a perfect box, as all the fittings had been removed by means of which the fish used to be caught.

That the Special Commissioners of English Fisheries, when they held their meeting to inquire into the legality of fixed engines for catching salmon, pursuant to the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, did not give any notice that, unless a pass was put within a certain time in the dam, the fishery would cease. When at the weir on the 1st July 1877, it was considered by a witness that it was a box within the statute; but the same witness considered that it was not at present a perfect box, or adapted for catching fish. It was proved by the clerk to the Endowed Schools Governors for Totnes, who produced a certificate of the Fishery Commissioners for England and Wales, relating to the Totnes Weir, dated 1st Dec. 1871, that the fishing mill-dam, being the mill-dam which is the subject of the present proceeding, having a trip or coop on the right bank situate in the river Dart, was legal, and that there was no fish pass in connection with the fishing mill-dam as required by law, and that the mill-dam was at the head of the weir which diverts the water to the town mills. That the said certificate was granted to the trustees of the municipal charities, who were then the owners of the mill premises, but under the endowed schools scheme the management and administration of the property had passed to the governors of the schools, and the legal estate vested in the official trustees of charitable lands.

No witnesses were called on behalf of the respondent, but his solicitor contended that he wanted to protect his client's rights.

That the respondent was at present the occupier of the Totnes mills as sub-lessee under a gentleman of the name of Bowden, and that the lease under which the lessee rented bore date 5th May 1863, and that during the time the mills had been in respondent's occupation as such sub-lessee there had been no fishery used in any respect by any person or persons as a fishery, and therefore he contended that the respondent was not bound under the section of the Act of Parliament to keep his fenders up between the times specified in the information.

He also stated on the respondent's behalf that it had not been proved that the respondent had either a crib, box, or cruiwe, or that he had used either for taking salmon in the fishery, and denied that it was a fishery, or that it had been used as a fishery, with the exception of between the years 1856 and 1859, during a previous lease.

That by or under the lease of 1863, a reduced rent had been accepted in consequence of the fishery being abolished, and that ever since the respondent had been the occupier of the mills under the present lease, no fish had been caught there, nor had any appliances, such as a box, &c., been placed there for the purpose of taking fish. That one of the witnesses for the appellant admitted that it was not a perfect box which could be used for taking fish; and the said lease of 5th May 1863 contains an exception and reservation to the lessors of the fishing, if any, near the Rack Marsh called the Salmon Pool, and the fishery near the Rack Marsh, and all other fisheries, if any, belonging to the lessors.

That all traps and gratings had been removed so as to prevent the taking of fish since 1859, and that, if altered from what it is at present, it would damage the respondent's mills; and that the removal of the interior fittings and hecks was done for the purpose of preventing any further use of them being made for the purpose of killing salmon; and consequently there were no means whatever to allow the respondent to kill fish, nor let it or use it as a fishery. He referred to the great damage done to the respondent's mills by the floods rushing down and swamping the grain, and otherwise damaging the machinery, which damage was averted by the use of the fenders.

That there was no proof that it had been used in any shape as a fishery since 1859.

That there was no evidence given that any fish had been taken by the supposed box since the year 1859.

The justices dismissed the case because they did not consider that the supposed box was a box of a fishery within the meaning of the Act, as it had not been used for taking fish since 1859, and even if refitted with hecks, &c., it could not be legally used as such until a pass was put in the weir.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court therefore is, whether there is a box, crib, or cruiwe of a fishery within the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109), now that the iron fenders are used solely for the purpose of regulating the water which supplies the mill.

Whereupon the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is asked upon the said question of law, whether or not the said justices were correct in their determination as aforesaid. And as to what further should be done or ordered by the said court in the premises.

J. Paterson argued for the appellant, the complainant.—The Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109), by sect. 4 gives as definitions: "'dam' shall mean all weirs and other fixed obstructions used for the purpose of damming up waters: 'fishing weir' shall mean a dam used for the exclusive purpose of catching or facilitating the catching of fish: 'fishing mill-dam' used or intended to be used partly for the purpose of catching or facilitating the catching of fish, and partly for the purpose of supplying water for milling or other purposes." The word "fishery" is not defined, but from its use throughout the Act it must include every place in which fish are or have been caught, as well as the right to catch them. With these definitions sect. 22 necessarily applies to the circumstances of this case: "The proprietor or occupier of every fishery shall, between twelve of the clock at noon on Saturday and six of the clock on the Monday morning following, maintain a clear opening of not less than four feet in width from the bottom to the top, through all cribs, boxes, or cruiwes, used for taking salmon within his fishery, so that a free space of that width is effectually secured for the passage of fish up and down through each box, crib, or cruiwe, whether used for the purpose of fishing or not; and shall, for the purpose of maintaining such opening, remove the inscales and rails of all such boxes, cribs, or cruiwes; and any person acting in contravention of this section shall incur the following penalties: (1) He shall for each offence pay a sum not exceeding five pounds, and a further penalty not exceeding one pound for each fish so taken: (2) He shall forfeit every fish caught in contravention of this section." Although the respondent may have no right to catch fish, he has the entire control over these fenders, and is bound to keep an opening for fish in the close time. The object of the section is to compel a passage up and down stream to be kept for fish during part of each week; this passage is found to be necessary for the encouragement of breeding. It would be impossible for fish to increase in this river if their passage is thus prevented. Sect. 20 contains a similar provision in respect of the close season as that of sect. 22 in respect of the weekly close time; and it has been held that the application of that section is not limited to a fishery actually in use; nor to fishing mill-dams where injury to the milling power cannot be done by carrying out the section. Any obstruction to the free passage of fish through a box at the prohibited times was held to be penal under this Act of Parliament:

Hodgson v. Little, 14 C. B. N. S. 111, and 16 C. B. N. S. 196.

Pitt Lewis for the respondent.—The justices were right in holding that this was not a box within the meaning of the Act. Hodgson v. Little has no application to this case, because the 20th section requires the removal of every obstruction to fish, whilst the 22nd requires only a fish pass. Moreover, the respondent is found by the justices to be no occupier of a fishery, nor is this a fishing mill-dam within the definition given in the Act. Before the passing of this Act, the existing fishing mill-dam was converted into a mere mill-dam, having no contrivances for catching fish; such dam was held to be no fishing mill-dam in

Our. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—LUSH, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Mellor and Lush, JJ.).—This case, although it was the subject of an elaborate argument on the construction of the Fisheries Act 1861, turns entirely on a question of fact. The statement is so vague, and fact and argument are so mixed up together, that we were unable to discover what the real facts were till we came to examine the case closely. Having done so, it is clear to us that the dam in question had ceased to be a fishing mill-dam before the Salmon Fisheries Act passed, inasmuch as all the appliances and arrangements in the so-called "crib, box, or cruiue" by which it had been adapted for catching fish, and which so far as can be collected from the case were what constituted the dam a "fishing mill-dam," had been removed in the year 1859, and had never been replaced. This is the inference we draw from the evidence stated and the comments upon it, though it is not expressly found, as it should have been, by the justices. A "fishing mill-dam" is defined by the Act to mean "a dam used or intended to be used partly for the purpose of catching or facilitating the catching fish, and partly for the purpose of supplying water for milling or other purposes." From the time that the "crib, box, or cruiue" ceased to be "used," or capable of being used, for catching fish, the dam ceased to be a dam "used or intended to be used" for that purpose, and became a mere mill-dam. The argument, which was so much pressed upon us, that a dam, which was a fishing mill-dam at the passing of the Act, cannot afterwards, by the removal of all means and appliances for catching fish, be reduced to a mere mill-dam, so as to relieve the occupier from the obligation of maintaining a fish pass, is entirely out of place. It must not be taken that we should have assented to that view if the argument had been applicable to the facts. We express no opinion upon the point, because it is unnecessary to do so. The 22nd section of the Act has therefore no bearing upon the case, and, as no alteration has been made in the dam since 1861 which creates "increased obstruction to fish," the claim to have a fish pass by virtue of that section equally fails. We were referred to the certificate given by the Fishery Commissioners 1871, by which it was certified that the dam which the commissioners therein describe as a "fishing mill-dam" was legal. We are at a loss to see what bearing this has upon the question before us, which is not whether the dam is one which the owner has a lawful right to maintain, but whether it is a fishing mill-dam. Upon that question the commissioners have no power to adjudicate. Their calling it a fishing mill-dam does not make it one. We do not know what evidence was laid before the commissioners, but the evidence before us shows that it was not, either in 1871 or 1861, a fishing mill-dam. The appeal must consequently be dismissed with costs.

REGENT'S CANAL COMPANY (apps.) v. ST. PANCRA'S ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (resps.)(a)

Rating—Canal—Land of like quality—52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv. s. 101.

By 52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv. s. 101, the lands of the appellants, whether covered with water or not, and also all dwelling-houses, wharfs, warehouses, lockhouses, and other houses are to be rated in their several parishes, the lands, according to their quantity and quality, and the wharfs and houses according to the nature and respective uses, dimensions, and descriptions thereof, in like manner as lands of a like quality, and wharfs and houses of a like and similar size, nature, dimension, or description in the respective parishes where the same shall be situate, are rated.

Held, that the appellants' canal and adjoining paths were to be rated, not as an ordinary canal, nor as land with buildings upon it like those in the other parts of the parish; but as lands, not intended to be built upon, in an improving neighbourhood, of like quality in the parish.

THIS was a special case stated under the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67 (the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869), sect. 40, by consent of the parties and by order, notice of appeal to the assessment sessions having been previously given by the appellants as provided by the said Act.

1. The Regent's Canal Company was incorporated by an Act of Parliament, 52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv., local and personal (but which Act is a public Act, and may be referred to by either party on the argument of this special case), for the purpose of "making and maintaining a navigable canal from the Grand Junction Canal in the parish of Paddington to the River Thames in the parish of Limehouse, with a collateral cut in the parish of Saint Leonard, Shoreditch, in the county of Middlesex."

2. The canal was made in pursuance of the said Act, and part of the said canal passes through the parish of Saint Pancras, in which parish there are four double locks. The property of the said company in the said parish in the occupation of the company consists, as described in the Valuation List hereinafter mentioned, of
No. 6590 . . Canal, towing path, sloping banks, and locks.

" 6591 . . Dwelling-house, office, and stable, " 6591a . Cottages near locks, and the extent of the property above mentioned numbered 6590 is about 21½ acres, and the length of the canal 2 miles 3 furlongs and 196 yards of width varying from 31 to 129 feet.

3. By 52 Geo. 3, c. cxcv. s. 101, it is enacted as follows:

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

And be it further enacted that the lands, whether covered with water or not, and also all dwelling-houses, wharfs, warehouses, lockhouses, and other houses of and belonging to the said company, shall be rateable and chargeable to the maintenance of the poor and to all other parochial rates and taxes in the several parishes and places where they are respectively situated, the lands according to their quantity and quality, and the dwelling-houses, wharfs, warehouses, lockhouses, and other houses according to the nature and respective uses, dimensions, and descriptions thereof, and shall be charged and assessed in like manner as lands of a like quality, and dwelling-houses, wharfs, warehouses, lockhouses, and other houses of a like and similar size, nature, dimension, or description in the respective parishes where the same shall be situate are or shall be assessed or charged; and that the rates, duties, and other personal property of the said company liable to be rated to the poor or other parochial taxes in any such parishes or places shall be rated and assessed in like manner and in the same proportion as other personal property rateable in the said parishes and places respectively shall be rated and assessed, and according to the length of the line of the said navigation in such respective parishes and places, and not otherwise or in any other manner; provided that before such personal property shall be rated fourteen days' notice shall be given in writing to or left at the dwelling-house or usual place of abode of the treasurer or clerk, or any officer of the said company residing in the parish or place where such rate shall be intended to be made, by the respective overseers of the poor of the intention so to do.

4. At the date of the passing of this Act (1812) the lands through which it was proposed that the canal should pass and through which it was afterwards made, were to a considerable extent lands agricultural and pasture, and some of the said lands were used as yards or gardens and some were covered with houses, &c. At the present time within the parish the lands adjoining the canal have been built upon, with the exception of that part passing through Regent's Park, and these buildings are assessed to the poor-rate. If the area now occupied by the canal and towing-path were assumed to be covered by buildings similar in rateable value to the buildings adjoining the canal, allowing for necessary roads, access, &c., and a proportionate part of such rateable value were taken as representing the rateable value of the lands so covered, as distinguished from the buildings standing upon them, then such proportionate part would be the sum of 1134*l.* gross and 915*l.* net rateable value.

5. The area of uncovered land in the parish in 1873 amounted to about one-fourth of the total area of the parish. If the canal were assessed in the ordinary way in which canals, the Acts of Parliament relating to which do not contain any special provisions as to rating, are now assessed—namely, by deducting from the gross receipts in the parish the expenses and outgoings in the parish, and allowances for tenants and trade profits risks, maintenance, &c.—then the sum at which the property of the company is now assessed exceeds the sum at which the appellants claim to be rated.

6. In June 1875 the overseers of the parish of St. Pancras made, under the provisions of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, a valuation list of the property in the said parish, and in the said list the "gross value" of the property belonging to the Regent's Canal Company therein numbered 6590 was increased from 500*l.* to 2268*l.* and the "rateable value" from 418*l.* to 1418*l.*, the sums of 500*l.* and 418*l.* respectively being the amount of the "gross" and "rateable" values at which the same property had been assessed in the assessment of 1870.

7. The company duly objected before the assessment committee of the said parish of St. Pancras to the valuation list with respect to the property therein numbered 6590 on the ground that the "gross" and "rateable" values of the said property were not made in accordance with the requirements of the Company's Act of Parliament, 52 Geo. 3., c. cxcv, s. 101, but the company failed to obtain such relief as they deemed just. In their notice of objection they stated as the correction which they desired to make that the "gross value" should be reduced to 107*l.* 10*s.* and the "rateable value" to 81*l.*

8. Notice of appeal was duly served, upon which it was agreed to state this case.

9. If the said canal and towing-path were assessed (as the appellants contend they ought to be assessed) as uncovered land of similar quantity and quality applicable to any purpose except building purposes on a building agreement, the "gross" and "rateable" values would not exceed the values which the appellants desired to have inserted in the valuation list in lieu of those inserted by the parish officers; or if the canal and towing-path were rated or assessed as in the alternative the appellants contend that they ought to be assessed according to their quantity and quality as uncovered land in like manner as lands of the like quantity and quality are in point of fact assessed in the parish of St. Pancras, the appellants' valuation would be correct.

10. The respondents contend that the section set out in paragraph 3 was not inserted by the Legislature for the purpose of limiting directly or indirectly the assessable value of the appellants' property, but only to remove a difficulty that then existed from the view of the law then laid down by the courts, namely, that canal rates or dues, &c., were assessable per se and only in the parish in which they were considered to be earned, namely where the voyages respectively terminated. That this view of the law was altered shortly after this Act, and the canal rates, &c., have been since considered as an element of the occupation, in other words as of the quality of the land; and, therefore, the property should be rated on the principle laid down in paragraph 5, or in the alternative annual value of the adjoining lands as in paragraph 4.

The question for the opinion of the court was upon what principle the canal and towing-path are to be valued and assessed. If the court should be of opinion that either of the two contentions of the appellants is right, then the gross and rateable values are to be reduced to 215*l.* gross and 204*l.* rateable. If the principle stated in paragraph 4 be correct, then the gross value is to be reduced to 1134*l.* and the rateable value to 915*l.* If the principle stated in paragraph 5 be correct, then it was agreed that the amount of the gross and rateable values respectively shall be determined by an arbitrator. It was agreed that judgment should be entered at the assessment sessions at their session next or next but one after the decision of the court or of the arbitrator in accordance with the judgment of the court, and for such costs as the court should adjudge.

F. M. White, Q.C. (with him B. S. Wright) argued for the appellants.—The canal and the adjoining paths ought, under the 101st section of the local Act, to be rated at the amount at which uncovered land is rated in the parish. The construction of this particular section was considered in Ex v. Regent's Canal Company, 6 B. & C. 720, where it was held that the land used for the purposes of the canal was rateable, not in respect of its improved value, but as if it had not been used for those purposes. And in the Grand Junction Canal v. Hemel Hempstead, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 173, a very similar rating section in an Act of 1794 was interpreted exactly in the sense of the appellants' contention in this case; it was there held that the land occupied by the canal was to be rated in the same proportion as the open land lying near, the value of which might be increased from time to time by circumstances, and the buildings belonging to the company in the same proportion as the buildings lying near.

Poland (with him Oastle) for the respondents.—It is impossible to support the principle of rating described in paragraph 5 of the case, in the face of the special rating clause contained in the Act of Parliament. But there can be no doubt that, if this canal did not occupy this particular ground in this parish, the ground would be built upon, as the lands of a like quality have been built upon in the parish. The meaning of the section, therefore, may be defined to authorise the rating of the canal and adjoining paths as if covered with buildings, allowing for roads, &c. The words of [34 Geo. 3, c. xxiv. s. 19, upon which the case of Grand Junction Canal v. Hemel Hempstead was decided, differ from the words of the 101st section of this Act, and do not justify the application of the same construction to the present case.

F. M. White, Q.C. was not heard in reply.

MELLOR, J.—We are of opinion that the plan of assessment supported by the appellants' contention is better, more reasonable, and more intelligible than that adopted by the respondents. I cannot think how Mr. Poland's principle could be applied; he admits this land cannot be covered with buildings, but he says we must assume that it is, and then for the purpose of rating separate the land from the buildings upon it. The Act says the buildings of the company are to be rated as buildings of a like nature in the parish; but I do not see how it can be interpreted to say that the land is to be rated as if it had buildings of a different nature from the company's standing thereon. Such a principle would give rise to enormous difficulties, and it seems to have no justification in the words used by the Legislature. It is impossible to furnish accurate data upon which to carry out the assessment according to the section; but, as it appears that both of the modes of rating mentioned in paragraph 9 produce the same result, it will be sufficient if we hold that either of them is correct.

LUSU, J.—I am of the same opinion. The respondents contend that the appellants' land must be assessed as if it were covered with buildings, but at the same time as if the buildings were severed from the land. This is an ingenious principle of rating, which is not only new, but also inconsistent with the words of the 101st section. Lands are to be charged and assessed, not as lands covered with buildings, but as lands of a like quality in the parish—that is, as lands not built upon, and not intended to be built upon, in a growing and improving neighbourhood. This is the appellants' principle, and their appeal must be allowed.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Friday, Nov. 30, 1877.

(Before GROVE and LINDLEY, JJ.)

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND CITIZENS OF THE CITY OF EXETER v. HEAMAN. (a)

Market—Infringement by sale within the limits—Conviction—Amendment of summons.

The respondent was charged before the magistrates of the city of E. for having infringed a private Market Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. cxxii., s. 3), which imposed a fine on any person selling, offering, or exposing for sale any carcases or meat within the limits of the city and county of E., except within the markets. It was proved on the 12th Jan. 1877, the respondent delivered certain carcases at a door within the limits, and that the carcases were then weighed and paid for, but it was alleged that they were delivered in pursuance of a previous contract, entered into between the same parties at the same place on the 5th of the same month. The summons was taken out for the 12th Jan., and the magistrates found that there had been a previous sale and purchase on the 5th.

Held (reversing their decision), that they should have convicted the appellant on the above facts, and that if they had thought it necessary, they should have amended the summons by altering the date on which the offence was alleged to have been committed from the 12th to the 5th of the month.

APPEAL from the magistrates of the city of Exeter under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 33. The following case was stated:

At a petty sessions for the city and county of the city of Exeter, holden at the Guildhall therein, on the 19th Jan. 1877, before us, Frederick Franklin and John Knapman, Esquires, two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, acting in and for the city and county of the city of Exeter, a complaint was preferred by Charles Chaplin, the inspector and toll collector, for and on behalf of the said mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city and county of the city of Exeter, the owners of the Exeter markets, and the tolls, stallage, and profits thereof (hereinafter called the appellants), that Richard Heaman (hereinafter called the respondent), on the 12th Jan., in the year aforesaid, did sell certain carcase meat, to wit, two whole carcases and two half carcases of pigs, at a certain price, within the said city and county other than the Higher or Lower Market therein, that is to say, at the shop and premises of one Elizabeth Bishop, in the Parish of Saint Sidwell, within the said city and county, whereby, as alleged, the said respondent had rendered himself liable upon conviction thereof to forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 5l., nor less than 40s., and which said complaint was heard and determined before us at the petty sessions aforesaid, and upon such hearing we did dismiss the said complaint.

The said appellants, being dissatisfied with such our determination and judgment as being erroneous in point of law, have applied to us pursuant to the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of our determination for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. Wherefore we, the said justices, make and sign the following case.

By statute 3 & 4 Vict. (local and personal) c. 122, entitled, "An Act to alter, amend, and enlarge the power of provisions of an Act for removing the markets held in the High and Fore-streets, and other places within the city and county of the city of Exeter, and for providing other markets in lieu thereof," it is by sect. 3 enacted, "that if any person or persons shall at any time sell, offer, or expose for sale (inter alia) any carcase, meat, flesh, or other raw victuals, at any other place within the city and county of the city of Exeter, than two certain markets, in the said Act called the Higher and Lower Markets; every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.* nor less than 40*s.*" This section contains a proviso exempting every inhabitant of the said city and county selling a carcase meat in the respective houses, shops, and premises from the operation of this section, and also a proviso exempting from its operation hawkers of fish and poultry, &c. (not including carcase meat) upon which the regular market tolls have been paid. By the 11th section of the same Act it is enacted that the delivery of any goods, wares, commodities, articles, or things, thereby made chargeable with or liable to the payment of any toll upon the sale thereof, shall in all cases be evidence of the sale thereof.

It was proved in evidence and admitted, that between six and seven o'clock in the morning of Friday, the 12th Jan. aforesaid, and being one of the said market days, the respondent, who is a carrier residing at Ashreigney, in the county of Devon, unloaded from a cart bearing his name and standing at the door and shop of Mrs. Elizabeth Bishop, who is a pork butcher, residing in Saint Sidwell, within the said city and county, and there delivered into her shop (that being a place outside the market), two whole carcasses and two half carcasses of three pigs, and which were received by Mrs. Bishop. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the said delivery was not a sale of the said carcasses, but a delivery in pursuance of a previous contract, in support of which Mrs. Bishop stated that on the previous Friday, the 5th Jan. she at her said shop had agreed with the respondent for the purchase of three carcasses of pigs at 10*s.* per score to be delivered on the following Friday the 12th, the day in question.

On being asked on cross-examination when she considered the carcasses had become her property, she replied on the day they were delivered to her (the 12th); she further stated that she had not on the previous Friday purchased any particular pigs of the respondent, but had merely bespoken of him a certain quantity of pork of a certain quality; that she had not paid for the carcasses until the evening of that day (the 12th), as she did not know the weight of them until brought in, but the price at 10*s.* a score was agreed for on the previous Friday, and which she considered as binding on her. On the part of the appellants it was contended that the said carcase having been delivered on the 12th Jan. and it being admitted that the contract of sale was made within the city of Exeter at a place outside the said market, the offence against the statute was completed on the said 12th Jan., and that the respondent should have been convicted in the penalty.

On the facts we decided that there had been a previous sale and purchase on the 5th Jan., and that what took place on the 12th was but a delivery of the carcasses in pursuance of such sale. We did not give any importance to the fact of the price not having been paid until the evening of the 12th, as Mrs. Bishop did not know the weight of the carcasses, or the amount to be paid until the carcasses were so delivered.

Whereupon we declined to convict the respondent, and dismissed the said summons and complaint. The question for the opinion of the court is whether, supposing the facts as stated and admitted by the respondent to have happened on the 5th and on the 12th Jan. to be true, we were right in dismissing the said summons and complaint, or whether we should have convicted the respondent.

Buckmill for the appellants.—The justices were wrong in refusing to convict. Sect. 11 of the Exeter Market Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 122) enacts that the delivery of any goods, wares, commodities, things, or articles thereby made chargeable with or liable to the payment of any toll upon the sale thereof shall in all cases be evidence of the sale thereof. [GROVE, J.—Surely something must be imported into that to limit its general effect? Mere delivery cannot prove the sale.] It is prima facie evidence of it. Further, notwithstanding the finding of the justices, it is clear that the sale did take place upon the 12th. There was only an arrangement for a future sale on the previous occasion, by which neither party was bound. If the justices had thought differently they should have altered the date in the summons, and convicted them upon that.

The respondent did not appear.

GROVE, J.—Even upon the case as stated—and certainly I did not at first think we were called upon to decide a matter which could have been decided by merely amending the summons, simply because the justices did not think fit to amend the summons themselves—they say that they decided that there had been a previous sale and purchase on the 5th Jan., and that what took place on the 12th was only a delivery in pursuance of such sale. As I understand it, if the date in the summons had been the 5th of the month, they would have convicted; and their decision seems to have been that the Act had been contravened on the 5th and not on the 12th, so that they actually prevent the operation of the Act because it has not been contravened on the particular day for which the summons was issued. Cases of this sort should not be sent up, when they are such that the justices might have decided them at the time. I am, however, of opinion that the Act was contravened by what took place on the 12th of the month, within the meaning of this Act. I think there was an infraction of it on the 12th, when the price was ascertained and the meat delivered and the price paid, within the city and not in the market; because, until the weighing and delivering of the meat, the whole transaction was inchoate and incomplete. I must not, however, be taken as saying that because we say the Act was infringed upon the 12th it may not also have been infringed upon the 5th. I think sufficient took place on the 12th to constitute an offence against the provisions of the Exeter Market Act; and the decision of the justices must, therefore, be reversed.

PHILLIPS v. SALMON.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the justices were right in dismissing the summons, which was taken out for the 12th Jan. Now, there certainly was a sale within the city of Exeter, and not within the marketplace, of certain carcasses which would have been the subjects of toll had they been sold in the market. That is the substance of the case; and, therefore, it appears quite plain that the justices were wrong in dismissing the summons. I cannot help thinking that they would have amended it if they had been asked to do so; and, as a matter of fact, I think they should have done it without being asked. The question whether the sale took place upon the 5th or upon the 12th should not have arisen at all, if it was clear that the Act had been, upon the one day or the other, infringed. The decision must be reversed.

Decision reversed.

PHILLIPS v. SALMON. (a)

Parliament—County vote—Lease of waste land of a manor—Presentment by burgesses for occupation of common.

The burgesses of the borough and manor of N., in accordance with immemorial custom, at the annual courts, leet and baron, held in 1841, 1852, and 1855, presented to the lord the respondent, one of their number, for occupation of certain portions of the waste of the manor, at a rent to be agreed upon between him and the lord. The burgesses of N. enjoyed a right of common of pasture over the waste land of the manor, but a sufficiency was left of the said waste for the exercise of the rights of the commoners.

The respondent entered into possession of the land, and paid nominal rents to the lord in respect of his occupation. In the year 1861 the lord granted to the respondent a lease of the said plots of land for three lives, with a covenant for the insertion of two new lives in lieu of those two that should first drop. It was admitted that the annual value of the holding was sufficient to qualify for the county franchise.

Held, that the respondent, who continued in possession and paid rent under the lease, had a freehold qualification to entitle him to the county franchise.

APPEAL from the decision of the revising barrister for the county of Pembroke. The following case was stated:—

1. John Phillip duly objected to the name of John Salmon being retained in the list of voters for the county of Pembroke.

2. The name of Salmon appeared in the list of claimants to be entitled to vote for the county as follows:

Name.	Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lanes, &c.
Salmon, John.	Blaenwarrn.	Feehold lease of house and land.	Blaenwarrn.

3. In support of the claim, the claimant produced a lease duly executed, dated the 28th Feb. 1861, whereby Thomas Davies Lloyd, in the lease described as lord marcher of the barony of Kemes, in the county of Pembroke, demised to the claimant, his heirs and assigns, the dwelling-house, outhouses, garden and lands called Blaeny-Warrn, situate at Newport, in the barony of Kemes, reserving to the lessor mines and minerals, with the ordinary powers for working the same, to hold to the claimant, his heirs and assigns, during the lives of his son, daughter, and grandson, therein respectively named, and the survivors and survivor of them, at a yearly rent of 5s., payable to the lessor, who also thereby covenanted with intent so as to create a lien upon the reversion of the demised premises and all persons who should become entitled thereto, but not to create a personal charge upon the lessor, his executors or administrators, that he, his heirs and assigns, would grant unto the claimant, his heirs or assigns, a lease for adding a life on the said premises, to be named by the claimant, his heirs or assigns, upon the death of such one of the lives therein named as should first drop, and also a further lease for adding a life on the said premises upon the death of such one of the survivors of the lives therein named, and the additional life as should first drop in manner therein mentioned. [A copy of the lease accompanied, and was to form part of the case.]

4. The question on this appeal was, whether T. D. Lloyd had power to grant the lease for the lives of the persons named, or any of them, and in manner therein appearing, so as to create the qualification in respect whereof Salmon claimed.

5. No witnesses were called, nor any further documentary evidence given before the revising barrister, but the following facts were agreed upon between and by the parties in reference to the claim.

6. The site of the dwelling-house and land called Blaenwarrn were formerly part of the waste of the manor of Newport, which manor is co-terminous with the borough and parish of the same name. The barony of Kemes comprises several manors, one of which is the manor of Newport; and the barony also comprises twenty-six parishes, of which the parish of Newport is one.

7. At the time of granting the lease, T. D. Lloyd was lord of the barony of Kemes, and as such lord of the manor of Newport. There are no copyholds in the manor.

8. The borough of Newport is governed by a mayor and burgesses, who have from time immemorial held courts called courts leet and courts baron for the borough. At one of such courts holden annually on the 29th Sept. it has been the custom for the burgesses to present three of their number, one being the mayor in office at the time for the following year. These presentments were delivered to the lord, who thereupon elected one of such persons presented to him, and such person was thereupon sworn into office as mayor.

9. By a charter dated in 1192, Nicholas Fitzmartin, then lord of the barony, confirmed to his burgesses of Newport, then called Newburgh, certain liberties and customs which William, his father, had granted to them, and amongst others, that they should have common of pasture in his land, and easement of wood for their houses and buildings, and for firing, by view of the forester;

likewise that they ought to have a bailiff and a common council for him and for them. This charter was exemplified and enrolled by the justices of the Great Session holden at Haverfordwest, in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, on the application of the bailiff and burgesses of Newport; and it was again similarly exemplified and enrolled in the fifth year of the reign of James I.

10. At the courts leet and courts baron it has been the practice of the mayor and burgesses, for 100 years and upwards, to present to the lord individual burgesses for occupation of pieces of the common or waste lands, and most commonly with the addition, after naming such burgess, "he to agree with the lord for the rent." In all cases the persons so presented took possession of the apportioned plots of land, generally building cottages and other buildings thereon, and paid the rents to the lord which he had fixed; such rents being very small sums, varying according to circumstances. No duration of the holding was specified in such presentments; but, upon the death of the person presented, his personal representatives continued to occupy and pay rent to the lord without further reference to the court leet.

11. In the year 1838, disputes having arisen between the lord and certain of the persons holding under the above-mentioned circumstances, as to their liability to pay the said rents, the lord took proceedings to recover such rent from one of them, and recovered the amount thereof in an action tried at the assizes.

12. Since the date of such trial the successive lords of the barony have granted many similar leases to that under which the present claim is made, and the leasees have taken possession of the plots demised by such leases, and have paid the rents thereby reserved. There was no evidence that such leases had been granted previously to such date; nor has any notice been taken of such leases on the court rolls.

13. During the time that T. D. Lloyd was lord of the barony, extending from the year 1845 to the present year, the records of the courts leet and courts baron were headed as follows:

"Town and corporation of Newport, in the county of Pembroke, barony of Kemes, whereof Sir Thomas Davies Lloyd is lord of the corporation. The court leet and court baron held at Newport, within the said barony. Before me, A. B., mayor."

14. The original presentment to the claimant of part of the lands in respect of which he claimed as aforesaid was made in the customary form by the jury at the court leet holden on the 14th May 1841, and was in the words following: "We present two pieces of ground on the common to John Salmon, weaver, northwards and westwards of Yetyrhose, admeasurement about 60yds. long by 30yds. He to settle with the lord of the manor for the rent."

15. A further part of the said lands was presented to the claimant by the jury at a court leet holden on the 26th Nov. 1852; and such presentment was in the words following: "We present to John Salmon, of Blaenwarrn, a piece of land on the common, bounded, &c. (mentioning the abutments.) The mayor will mark out the boundaries. The said John Salmon to settle with the lord of the manor for the rent. Received 6d.

in court on account of rent." Then follow the names of the jurors.

16. A further part of the lands in respect of which he claimed was presented to the claimant by the jury at a court leet holden on the 6th Nov. 1855, and such presentment was in the words following: "We present to Mr. John Salmon, of Blaenwarrn, all that piece or spot of land, being part of Newport Common, and situate near a house and garden the property of T. D. Lloyd, Esq., the said spot or piece of land to be of the extent of 60yds. by 30yds. or thereabouts. The said John Salmon shall not encroach or stop up any public roads, and shall settle with the lord of the barony for the rent of the same spot of land. The mayor, accompanied by Mr. J. Llewellyn, Mr. T. Bevan, Mr. J. Harris, and Mr. W. Salmon, are hereby directed to mark out the boundaries. Mr. John Salmon has on this day paid on account of rent the sum of one shilling." Then follows the names of the jurors. The sums of 6d. and 1s. paid on account of rent by the claimant were received by the steward as part of the rent to be fixed by the lord of the manor to be paid for the said plots of land respectively.

17. The lease executed by T. D. Lloyd to the claimant in manner aforesaid included the several pieces of land referred to in the three presentments hereinbefore recited, and included no additional or other land, and possession has been retained by him and rent paid to the lord until the present time, in accordance with the said lease.

18. The burgesses of Newport have from time immemorial exercised rights of common of pasture over the wastes of the manor of Newport. Such wastes consisted originally of 3000 acres or thereabouts within the manor, of which in the year 1861 about 300 acres had been inclosed, and were then held in severalty under the presentments hereinbefore referred to; but a sufficiency of such waste lands was then and still is left for the use by the commoners of their said right of pasture. No right of turbary or estovers has been exercised by the burgesses; and there is no turf or trees within the said waste lands available for the user of either of the last-mentioned rights, if they exist.

19. It was contended for the claimant that the lord had a right to approve against common of pasture, leaving sufficient waste for that purpose; and, if so, that he had also a right to demise the lands so approved; and that there were no other rights of common in this manor. Moreover, that a custom so to demise was proved by the foregoing facts.

It was answered for the objector, that no right to demise could be incidental to the right to approve, without a custom; and that such custom was in this case only recent, and not of legal origin.

The Revising Barrister decided that the contention of the claimant was well founded. He inserted the name of Salmon in the list of claimants. If the court should be of opinion that his decision was wrong, the register was to be amended by erasing the name of Salmon therefrom.

Grantham, Q.C. (Vernon Smith with him) for the appellant.—The respondent has no sufficient qualification. The lord may approve against common of pasture, but he cannot, unless by express custom, grant a lease of the waste, even if sufficient be left for the commoners. The lease in respect of which the respondent claims is, therefore void, inasmuch as no precedent for such a demise is shown. [DENMAN, J.—Prima facie the land is the land of the lord. It is for you to show that, in demising it, he exceeded his powers.] The lease speaks for itself. He cited

Lascelles v. Ouslow, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. D. 433;
Elton on Commons, p. 238.

Sir H. James, Q.C. (Besley and Tickell with him) for the respondent.—The lessor's title cannot be attacked by a political objection to the lessee's vote; but even admitting the appellant's right to this objection, the qualification is good. The presentments by the burgesses amount to a consent by them that the respondent shall occupy at least during his own life, and he is not to be in a worse position because he has a lease. The commoners are at any rate prima facie bound by their presentments, and his interest therefore amounts to a freehold. Secondly, we say that his possession for more than twenty years is sufficient under the Statute of Limitations to give him a qualification.

Grantham, Q.C., in reply, referred to

Coke Inst. ii. 85;
Arlett v. Ellis, 7 B. & C. 346;
Case of the Fishermen of Chichester, Godb. 231.

DENMAN, J.—I think the respondent is entitled to our judgment. A good many points have been argued or touched upon in the course of the argument which might give rise to some difficulty if the facts in this particular case did not dispose of them, and enable us to give judgment without reference to certain niceties of law which might have arisen. The decision really turns upon the 10th paragraph of the case stated by the barrister, which states that at the courts leet and courts baron it has been the practice for the mayor and burgesses for a hundred years and upwards—which I read here in the absence of any contradiction as equivalent to time immemorial—to present to the lord individual burgesses for occupation of pieces of the common or waste lands, and most commonly with the addition, after naming such burgess, of saying, "he to agree with the lord for the rent." It is further stated that in all cases the persons so presented took possession of the apportioned plots of land, generally building cottages and other buildings thereon, and paid the rents to the lord which he had fixed, such rents being very small sums, varying according to circumstances. Now, no question arises here as to the value of the premises; and it must be assumed in this case that, subject to the bare point of law, the holding was of sufficient value to give the voter his franchise. The case goes on to state: "No duration of holding was specified in such presentments, but upon the death of the person presented his personal representatives continued to occupy and pay." That, I take it, is equivalent to the statement that from time immemorial the course of things has been this: The tenants have agreed that A. B. or C. D. shall take a particular lot, and that the lord should let him into it, he paying a certain rent, for a period at least as long as the duration of his life. As to what happens upon the death of such tenant, no question arises in the present case, because Salmon, the respondent, is the person presented and who took a lease, and held the land from the lord, and has paid rent to him, with the consent of the commoners. This at least is made out, and this is sufficient to give him a qualification. Here he is, holding land sufficient in value to give him a vote, for a period at least equal to the duration of his natural life; and that is enough to give him all the necessary qualification to vote for the county. And without deciding that it would have been sufficient here to state that he was in possession, leaving the person who takes the objection to prove that he was not in possession as a freeholder, it seems to me that the real existence of a lease for a period longer than his life cannot give him a less title than he would have had without it according to the statement of the custom, and that there are all the necessary elements of qualification to give him a vote. The decision must be supported.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether Salmon is or is not entitled to a vote depends upon the answers to be given to only two questions. First, has he a property qualification in law? Secondly, is it of sufficient value? Now the qualification in respect of which he claims, consists of a freehold lease of a house and lands; that is, it is a lease for lives from the lord of the manor of this barony. The lord must be assumed to be owner in fee of that land, there being nothing to cut down his interest; so that the matter stands thus: the voter has a freehold, given to him by a person who has a right to give it. All that can be said against that is that the lease is subject to the rights of certain commoners in the lands demised. Suppose it is so, that is all, and the lease remains none the less. It is quite obvious that the lease is good as against the lord, and against the commoners it is good to this extent at least, that they cannot disturb the tenant's possession for the duration of his life. Then we come to the question of value, and as to that there is no dispute that the qualification is sufficient. I am of opinion that the claim is good, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

CAMPBELL (app.) v. STRANGEWAYS (resp.) (a)

Fraction of a day—Dog licence—First of two Acts —"On the day on which"—30 Vict. c. 5, ss. 8, 5.

By 30 Vict. c. 5, s. 8, it is enacted that, "if any person shall keep a dog without having in force a licence granted under this Act, he shall forfeit 5l." Sect. 5 provides that "every licence shall commence on the day on which the same shall be granted."

Held, that "on the day on which" must be taken to mean "at and from the time when," and that it is no answer to a charge of having kept a dog without a licence on a particular day to produce a licence taken out on that day, if it is proved that the licence was applied for later in the day than the detection of the offence charged.

THIS was a case stated by the magistrate of the Westminster Police-court.

An information, laid by the appellant, an excise officer, charged that, on the 21st Oct.

CAMPBELL (app.) v. STRANGEWAYS (resp.)

[C.P. Div.]

1877 the respondent kept a dog without a licence. The 30 Vict. c. 5, imposing an excise duty on dogs, provides for the granting of licences to keep them. By sect. 5, "The licences to be taken out under this Act shall be in such form and shall be granted by such officers of Inland Revenue as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall direct; and every licence shall commence on the day on which the same shall be granted, and shall terminate on the 31st Dec. following." By sect. 8, "If any person shall keep a dog without having in force a licence granted under this Act authorising him to do so, or shall keep a greater number of dogs than he shall be licensed to keep, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of five pounds."

On the 21st Oct. 1877, at 12.40 p.m., the appellant discovered that a dog was kept by the respondent. No licence for the animal was then in force. At 1.10 p.m. the respondent took out a licence, the form of which authorised him "to keep one dog in great Britain from the date hereof until December the 31st, 1877." The magistrate being of opinion that this licence produced by the respondent was an answer to the information, dismissed the charge.

Lockwood for the appellant.—In 1 Chitty's Archbold, 12th ed., p. 164, it is stated that "the court will take notice of the fraction of a day, if it be necessary for the purposes of justice." In R. v. Justices of Middlesex (9 Jur. 758; 14 L. J. N. S. Mag. Cas. 139, 142), Wightman, J., says: "Where the question is, which of two acts takes precedence of the other, a fraction of a day may be considered." [GROVE, J.—The words of sect. 5 are, "Every licence shall commence on the day on which the same shall be granted." LINDLEY, J.—The licence itself substitutes the words "from the day" for "on the day"] In Combe v. Pitt (3 Burr. Rep. 1423, 1434, 1 Wms. Bl. 437) Lord Mansfield says: "But though the law does not, in general, allow of the fraction of a day, yet it admits it in cases where it is necessary to distinguish. And I do not see why the very hour may not be so too, where it is necessary and can be done, for it is not like a mathematical point, which cannot be divided." Here the whole of the offence was complete as soon as it was ascertained that the respondent had no licence. [LINDLEY, J.—If I have to do a thing on a day, have I not the whole day upon which to do it?] In Chick v. Smith (8 Dowl. 337), Patteson, J., said: "Where it is necessary to show which was the first of two acts, the court is at liberty to consider fractions of a day."

GROVE J.—There is a good deal to be said for the decision the magistrate has come to in this case; but we must give effect to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, if we can. Chick v. Smith (8 Dowl. 337) and the other cases cited are authorities to show that, where it is necessary for the purposes of justice to ascertain which is the first of two acts, the law will regard the divisions of the day. Sect. 8 of 30 Vict. c. 5 provides that, "if any person shall keep a dog without having in force a licence granted under this Act, he shall forfeit 5*l*." Here unquestionably, without a possibility of ambiguity or doubt, the defendant has kept a dog without having a licence granted under the Act. Can the words of sect. 8 be modified by the words of sect. 5, which are, "every licence shall commence on the day on which the same shall be granted and shall terminate on the 31st of Dec. following?" The object of that provision is to explain that, if a person does not take out a licence on the 1st Jan., the licence, when he does take it out, will only cover the subsequent part of that year. Here we are holding that the licence did begin on the day on which it was granted, but not earlier on the day than it was taken out. The two sections so read are not inconsistent. There might be a case, as I suggested to Mr. Lockwood in the course of the argument, in which a person, having been convicted in the early part of the day of keeping a dog without a licence on that day, later on the same day obtains a licence. Then, if the licence relates back to the commencement of the day on which it is taken out, the conviction would be bad. If the licence would not relate back in such a case, then neither will it in any other. I am of opinion that this case comes within sect. 8 of the Act, and that the decision of the magistrate must be reversed.

LINDLEY, J.—I also am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate must be overruled, although at first I was disposed to take the same view as he has done. It occurred to me that a man who had just got a dog might be charged under this section before he had had time to obtain a licence, if we adopted a different construction to that of the magistrate. But the section speaks of keeping a dog without a licence, not having a dog. The form of the licence is left by the Act for the officials of the Inland Revenue to settle; but they must not adopt a form inconsistent with any words in the Act. The 5th section of the Act provides that a licence shall commence on the day upon which it is granted. To commence on the day must mean here not on any previous day. But then the 8th section provides that any person keeping a dog without a licence shall forfeit 5*l*. What construction are we to put upon the two sections? It is clear we may be driven to split up the day in order to see whether the 8th section has been infringed, and we are driven to do so in this case. Then, if we are entitled to look at the order of events, when we do so the facts show that the licence was obtained subsequent to the offence having been committed and detected. I think it is going too far to say that a licence taken out on any part of the day covers the whole day. The two sections may be reconciled, as my brother Grove suggested, by reading "on the day" to mean at and from the time when the licence was obtained. No doubt the object of the provision, that the licence shall commence on the day on which it is granted, was to prevent the possibility of its being supposed that a licence could cover any day previous to that on which it is taken out.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MOORE. (a)

Penalties — 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, sect. 16 — To whom payable, the Crown or borough — The Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), sect. 126.

The effect of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, sect. 16, is that penalties recovered under the latter section in a summary manner before a justice of a borough having a separate court of quarter sessions, go to the borough and not to the Crown.

INFORMATION by the Attorney-General against the clerk to the justices of the borough of Warwick, to recover a sum of 11. 10s., being fines received by the defendant as such clerk, and alleged to be payable to Her Majesty. By the consent of the parties a case was stated under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, sect. 10, which disclosed the following facts:

The borough of Warwick is one of the boroughs contained in schedule A. of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, as having a commission of the peace. It has also a separate court of quarter sessions.

On the 29th May 1876 one Amos Dalton was convicted before two of the justices of the peace of the borough of a breach of sect. 16 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, for that he did unlawfully and wilfully obstruct and impede one Robert Billington, then being in the execution of his duty on the Great Western Railway within the borough, and he was adjudged to forfeit and pay the sum of 5s. to be paid and applied according to law.

On the 6th Sept. 1876 one John Reeves was convicted and adjudged to forfeit and pay the sum of 11. 5s. for a similar offence.

Both these fines were received by the defendant, and were claimed by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury as belonging to the Consolidated Fund, and as being payable by the defendant to the receiver of fines on the ground that, upon the right construction of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, the said fines were forfeit, and therefore payable to Her Majesty. The defendant however declined to pay over these fines to Her Majesty, contending that, upon the right construction of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126, they ought to be paid to the treasurer of the borough to the credit and on account of the borough fund, inasmuch as the Act under which the penalties were recovered is not an Act relating to trade so as to bring it within the provisions of the last-mentioned section.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the fines ought to be paid to Her Majesty or not.

The sections on which the question turned were to the following effect.

5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126:

When by any Act any penalties or forfeitures are or shall hereafter be made recoverable in a summary manner before any justice or justices of the peace, and by such Act respectively the same are or shall be limited and made payable to His Majesty, . . . in every such case the same if recovered, and adjudged before any justice of any borough in which a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace shall be holden as aforesaid, shall, notwithstanding anything in such Act respectively contained, be recovered for and adjudged to be paid to the treasurer of such borough for the time being to the credit and on account of the borough fund of such borough. . . . Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to any penalties or forfeitures recovered under any Act relating to the customs, excise, and post office, or to trade or navigation, or any branch of His Majesty's revenue.

3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16:

If any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any railway company in the execution of his duty upon any railway, . . . every such person so offending . . . shall and may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent, until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace for the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and when convicted before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorised and required upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognisance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises), shall, in the discretion of such justice, forfeit to Her Majesty any sum not exceeding 5l.

Sir Hardinge Giffard, Solicitor-General (Sir John Holker, Attorney-General, and Bowen with him) for the Crown.—Under sect. 126 of the Municipal Corporations Act, certain fines and fees recovered in the manner therein specified go to the borough fund. The question is, whether sect. 16 of the Railways Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 97), does not repeal this enactment pro tanto; so as to make penalties recovered under the Railways Act, though recovered in the manner specified in the former Act, go to the Crown and not to the borough. I submit that the two enactments are inconsistent, and that the former section is virtually repealed so far as it relates to these particular penalties. The case of Wray v. Ellis (1 E. & E. 276) is analogous to the present question.

Mellor, Q.C. (Dugdale with him), for the respondent, was not called upon.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the respondent is entitled to our judgment. When we refer to the Act of Will. 4, we find that it is expressly enacted, "That when by any Act any penalties or forfeitures are or shall hereafter be made recoverable in a summary manner before any justice or justices of the peace, and by such Act respectively the same are or shall be made payable to His Majesty . . . in every such case the same, if recovered and adjudged before any justice of any borough in which a separate court of quarter sessions shall be holden as aforesaid, notwithstanding anything in such Act respectively contained, shall be recovered for and adjudged to be paid to the treasurer of such borough for the time being to the credit and on account of the borough fund of such borough." Now all the requirements of this section have here been fulfilled, and the only question for us is, whether these penalties still belong to the borough or not. They have been recovered under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, under which persons acting in contravention of its provisions shall, in the discretion of the justice by whom he is convicted, "forfeit to Her Majesty any sum not exceeding 5l." In my opinion there is no doubt that penalties recovered under this section are "payable to Her Majesty." But the previous Act says that, if they are recovered in a certain way, and are payable to Her Majesty, they are to be paid to the borough. We must read the two Acts together; I can see nothing inconsistent in them, and I consider that the previous one must be considered as containing an exception to the general rule that under this second Act all penalties recovered are payable to

BENT v. ROBERTS.

[Ex. Div.]

Her Majesty. I therefore think these penalties belong to the borough, and that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

CLEASBY, B.—I cannot entertain any doubt in this case. The enactment of the Act of Will. 4 is in substance that penalties which are payable to Her Majesty go to the borough fund in certain cases. The language of the second Act declares that the penalties recovered under it shall be forfeit to Her Majesty. Now no attempt was made to found a distinction between the language of the two Acts "payable to Her Majesty," and "forfeit to Her Majesty"; and the language may be taken as though they were the same. That being so, I see no inconsistency between the statutes; the latter seems to be a re-enactment of the former. The former says that penalties recovered as these have been recovered go to the borough. I am of opinion, therefore, that these belong to the borough.

BENT v. ROBERTS.(a)

Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Property tax—Occupier of premises—Superintendent of police-station—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Sched. B. R. 1—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 63, No. 9—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34.

The appellant, as superintendent of a police-station, was compelled to reside, and did reside with his family, in a house within the boundary wall of what was generally known as the premises of the police-station, and which, though quite separate from the station itself, had a communication with the station yard by a doorway in its own yard wall. He kept the keys, and with his family had the sole access to the house, the front entrance facing the street being quite distinct from the entrance to the station. There was no accommodation in the house beyond what was actually necessary for the requirements of himself and his family and the transaction of his business as superintendent, and he would not have been permitted to make use of the premises for any other purpose. It was liable, moreover, to be used for such purposes connected with the police force as the chief constable of the county might direct, and it might occasionally be used as a place of detention for prisoners. He paid a small sum by way of rental, and was liable to be removed from station to station at any time.

Held (on appeal by him from assessment in respect of inhabited house duty, and under Sched. A of the Income Tax Act), that he was not the occupier of a house and premises within the meaning of the Acts imposing these duties, and was therefore not liable to assessment in either respect.

CASE stated by the Commissioners of Income Tax and Inhabited House Duty for the Division of Manchester, upon an appeal against an assessment under Schedule A of the Income Tax Act and for inhabited house duty on the house occupied by James Bent, of Old Trafford, in the township of Stretford, in the district of Manchester, second superintendent of the police station there, which was assessed at 50l. under Sched. A. and 50l. for inhabited house duty.

1. The county constabulary of the county of Lancashire was established under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93.

2. The county is divided into police districts or divisions, and station-houses and strong rooms have been built and provided under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88.

3. The force is annually inspected by a Government officer, and, if his report is satisfactory, a grant is made by the Treasury, amounting to one-half of the expenses of the pay and clothing of the force, in aid of the police rates.

4. The house in which the appellant resides is included within the boundary of certain premises known as the Old Trafford police-station, which comprised other buildings and offices provided for the purposes of the Manchester police district.

5. In addition to the communication between the appellant's house and the drill yard there is a further communication between the drill yard and the cell yard which adjoins, and into which the cells open.

6. It is necessary for the police purposes of the district of Manchester that the appellant should reside in the house in question, for the due performance of his official duties.

7. The appellant is compelled to live on the premises in question, and the house in which he resides is liable to be used for such purposes connected with the police force as the chief constable of the county may direct; and the appellant is further liable to be removed from station to station at any time.

8. There is no accommodation in the appellant's residence beyond what is actually necessary for the requirements of himself and his family, and the transaction of his business as superintendent of police; and he would not be permitted to make use of the premises for any other purpose.

9. The appellant is not assessed to the poor-rate.

10. The appellant admitted that the house which he occupied was separate from the police-station, but added that there was a communication with the station yard by a doorway in his own yard wall. The front entrance was quite distinct. He said that he himself possessed the keys of the house, and that he and his family alone had access thereto; that it was wholly occupied by himself and family, and furnished throughout with his own furniture; that it might occasionally be used as a place of detention for prisoners; and that on one occasion he had admitted a female prisoner there for a few hours who was not in very good health, and who was of a more respectable class than prisoners ordinarily are.

11. He contended that he was not liable to house duty, nor to schedule A. of the income-tax, beyond the amount of his rental, 10l. 0s. 8d. per annum, and the reasons assigned were that the house was a part of the police-station, it being included within the boundary wall known as the Old Trafford police-station, which, in addition to the house occupied by the appellant, comprises other buildings and offices provided for the police purposes of the Manchester police division; that the force was annually inspected by a Government officer, and that the whole of the premises was used for the purposes of the county constabulary, and being so used was used for Government purposes, and was exempt from assessment as being occupied for the purposes of the Crown, and that in any case the house in question ought not to be separately assessed, but should be included in one charge with the police-station, some of the apartments of which were occupied by police constables, who paid rentals for them. In support of his opinion he cited Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 993.

12. The appellant admitted that he was the officer of the county, and was paid out of the county fund.

13. The surveyor submitted that the case referred to did not apply, and that, as the house in question was admittedly separate and distinct from the police-station, its front entrance facing the street or road (formerly an ancient footpath) and the only communication with the station-yard being by a doorway in the wall of its yard, which doorway could easily be closed up; and its being, moreover, furnished throughout by the appellant as a private residence, it was, to all intents and purposes, a private house, and was separately assessable upon its full annual value, for which the appellant was liable, he being the beneficial occupier. Judge's case, No. 2827, was referred to in support of this view.

After considering the statement of the appellant and the surveyor, the commissioners were of opinion that the superintendent was the servant of the county, and not of the Crown, and that the house being separate and distinct from the police-station, the only communication being by a door in the yard wall to the drill ground, and being furnished by the superintendent at his own expense, was liable to be assessed upon its full annual value, and from its position was separately chargeable. They, therefore, confirmed the assessment.

Gorst, Q.C. (H. Hulton with him) for the appellant.—The appellant is not liable to be assessed, either in respect of property tax or inhabited house duty. The latter is regulated by 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36. By sect. 1 of the second Act the duties were granted on inhabited houses, as specified in the schedule annexed, in lieu of duties by that Act repealed; but by sect. 2 the powers, rules, and provisions of former Acts were to remain in force. Looking back, then, to 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, we find by Sched. B. R. 1, that the duties are to be charged on the occupier or occupiers for the time being of every such dwelling-house. With regard to property tax, precisely the same reasoning applies. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 5, the duties imposed by that Act are to be assessed and raised under the provisions of the recited Acts. Of these, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, is one; and by sect. 63, No. 9, of that Act, we find that the duties imposed are to be charged on and paid by the occupier for the time being. In order that the appellant may be liable to either assessment, he must be the occupier; but he is not the occupier within the meaning of the Acts. In order to be so, he must have the exclusive use of the house, which he certainly has not:

Clark v. Bury St. Edmunds, 1 U.B. N.S. 23.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

Dacey (Sir John Holker, A.G., and Sir Hardinge Giffard S.G., with him).—It is quite clear the appellant is the occupier of this house within the meaning of the Act. So long as he occupies, that is sufficient to make him liable to assessment, and it is then for him to show that he falls within one of the exemptions. By sect. 63, No. 9, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, we find, first, that the said duties, except when other provisions are made as to estimating particular properties, shall be estimated according to the general rule in Sched. A., and shall be charged on and paid by the occupier for the time being; second, every person having the use of any lands or tenements shall be taken and considered for the purposes of this Act as the occupier of such lands and tenements. Moreover by R. 9, occupiers may recover the amount of their assessment from the landlord by deducting it from the rent. Here the appellant clearly has the use of the house, and is therefore undoubtedly liable to the duty in the first instance. This, however, is not the point on which the case was stated; but, if the court is against me on this point, it is useless for me to enter upon any other question.

KELLY, C.B.—The question in this case is, whether the appellant is the occupier of the premises in question within the meaning of the Inhabited House Duty Act, or within the meaning of the Income Tax Act. It appears, according to the statement of the case before me, that the appellant has been assessed in respect of both statutes for the year's occupation from the month of April 1875 to the month of March 1876, and the question which we have to determine is, whether the occupation and the use of these premises by the appellant in the manner and under the circumstances stated in this case render him liable to either the one or the other of these assessments. I am clearly of opinion that he is liable to neither. If the case were confined to what is stated in paragraph 10 of the case, a question might well arise as to whether he might or might not be liable, for there it appears that the appellant admitted that the house which he occupied was separated from the police-station yard by a doorway in his own yard wall. It appears, moreover, that the front entrance was quite distinct, that he himself possessed the keys of the house, and that he and his family alone had access thereto, that it was wholly occupied by himself and family, and furnished throughout with his own furniture, that it might occasionally be used as a place of detention for prisoners, and that on one occasion he had admitted a female prisoner there for a few hours who was not in very good health, and who was of a more respectable class than prisoners ordinarily are. Now, if the case had stopped there, and had contained nothing else to assist us in determining whether this was an occupation within either of these Acts, the question might well have been arguable; but it goes further. When we refer to another paragraph, we find that the appellant, who, it appears, is an officer of the constabulary of Lancashire, is, by the duties of his office and under the circumstances in which he holds that office, compelled to live on the premises in question; and that the house in which he resides is liable to be used for such purposes connected with the police force as the chief constable of the county may direct; and the appellant is further liable to be removed from station to station at any time. Now any one of the portions of this paragraph would

BENT v. ROBERTS.

in my opinion, be perfectly fatal to the argument on the part of the Crown, that the appellant has such an occupation of these premises as to render him liable to either of these assessments. The first is, that he is compelled to live on the premises. A man who pays rent for premises has the right to live upon the premises under a contract between himself and the landlord to whom he is liable for the rent, and to whom, under the contract between them, he is bound to pay the rent, and is in return entitled to the occupation of the premises. No such case exists here. This, though it is called a rent in the statement of the case before us, is clearly no rent at all. It is stated that the appellant is compelled to live upon these premises, but while there he enjoys a lodging which probably saves him the rent of some lodging elsewhere. It amounts to nothing more than this, that the authorities by whom he is employed think fit to deduct from the salary that they pay him, a certain sum a year in consequence of the benefit that he derives from lodging in this house with his family during whatever time they may compel him to remain there. That is not a rent at all, it is not a tenancy at all, it is not an occupation at all in respect of the acts which regulate and determine either of these assessments; and therefore, were it upon that ground alone, I should hold that this is not an occupation within the meaning of either of these Acts of Parliament. But the paragraph goes on thus, "that the house in which he resides is liable to be used for such purposes connected with the police force as the chief constable of the county may direct." Under this power, the chief constable might either, upon a particular occasion, or any number of occasions where the proper conducting of the business of the police offices might require it, send any number of persons, who might be taken in custody, and who would have to remain in custody until the following morning before they could be taken before the magistrate, into this house, and put half-a-dozen of them into half-a-dozen of the beds in the different rooms of this house; and they might, if they thought fit, in order to do so (and it might be a public duty on their part that they should do so), confine him to a single bed in a room at the top of the house, or they might desire him to lie upon the floor all night, in order that those several prisoners might be in safe custody. That alone is inconsistent with the beneficial occupation or use of the house by a tenant who is liable to assessment under these Acts of Parliament; and therefore, if it stood alone upon this second clause of the 7th paragraph, it would also be fatal to the question of occupation. But then, when we come to the last provision in this 7th paragraph we find that "the appellant is further liable to be removed from station to station at any time." Here is a man assessed for the income tax for the year, and assessed to the inhabited house duty for the year, who might, if it were thought fit, a week, or a month, or even a single day after the assessment, be removed to another place altogether. He might not occupy the house for a single day after the notice, or the command is issued to him to quit the station and remove himself to another station. It is not arguable whether or not this could be an occupation within the meaning of these Acts of Parliament. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that he is not an occupier; he is merely a servant of the constabulary, put into the house for their purposes, and has liberty and permission to live in that house just so long as they think fit, and no longer. Under these circumstances, it clearly is not an occupation within these statutes.

CLEASBY, B.—I must say that I was a good deal surprised at the statement of the learned counsel for the Crown that the point intended to be raised here was a different one from that which we are now considering. I refer to the case, and I see that this is the only point upon which the case is stated. In paragraph 15 we read that "after considering the statements of the appellant and the surveyor, the commissioners were of opinion that the superintendent was the servant of the county and not of the Crown, and that the house being separate from the police-station, the only communication being by a door in the yard wall to the drill ground, and being furnished by the superintendent at his own expense, was liable to be assessed upon its full annual value." They state everything connected with the place to show in what way it is connected with the police-station, and not deciding anything upon the other question, the commissioners decide that it is to be regarded as if he were living altogether apart from the police-station in a street in the town. Passing by every other question, the commissioners held that in this case, as he occupies the premises separate from the police premises, and furnishes them at his own expense, he is liable to be assessed. Upon that, which is mainly a question of fact, we come to a different conclusion. I will only say, with reference to the case of Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester, which was not referred to in the Judges' case, that the question there considered was a totally different one. What we have to consider is simply this: is the appellant to be regarded as a person occupying or living upon these premises in any different manner than this, that he lives there upon part of the police premises, and is allowed to live there? I apprehend that, if the police premises were shut in by an outer door, and this man had the house within that outer door, no question whatever could possibly arise. It would not be in his occupation in any sense of the word, according to these Acts of Parliament; but in a general way, as he has the key of the house, it is said that he occupies it. No one would contend, if it were at all within the wall of the police premises over which of course the police authorities would have the exclusive control, that he was the occupier of the house, though he was the only person living in it. How can it be that it makes a difference if, for the more convenient enjoyment by their servant of the particular house, with all the internal communication requisite for the discharge of his duties, they allow him to have an outer door into the footpath or street? It appears to me not of the slightest importance. The Lord Chief Baron has fully gone into the statements of the case, and I will not repeat them. This is an application by the police authorities, and, if this man is to efficiently discharge his duties as their servant, he must have a place to live in. I am, therefore, of opinion that he is entitled to our judgment.

POLLOCK, B.—I also think that there is ample material for a decision in this case contained in the argument alone addressed to us by Mr. Dicey, and which turns upon the meaning of the word "occupier" in Schedule B. of the 48 Geo.

3, c. 45, and the facts stated in the case, upon which we have to draw inferences of fact as well as of law. It is sufficient to say that such a so-called occupation as is shown to exist in this case is not such an occupation as makes the man an occupier within the meaning of either of the statutes, and after what has been said by my Lord, I think it quite unnecessary to repeat the reasons given by him.

THE IMPERIAL CONTINENTAL GAS ASSOCIATION (apps.) v. NICHOLSON (resp. (a))

Revenue—Foreign company incorporated in England—Carrying on business abroad—Portion of profits remitted to England—Portion retained abroad—Income tax—Gasworks on the Continent—“Foreign possessions”—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, Schedule A., rule 3—Sect. 10, Schedule D., cases 1 and 5—16 & 17 Vict. c. 3, s. 2, Schedule D.

A joint-stock company, established and incorporated by Act of Parliament in England, but carrying on its business entirely abroad, is assessable to income tax upon the whole of the annual profits of its business, whether such profits are or not remitted to this country, or are or not distributed as dividends amongst its shareholders resident in England or abroad, or are applied to some other legitimate purposes of the company abroad.

The appellants, a copartnership association, established to supply foreign cities and towns with gas, and incorporated by Act of Parliament in England, have offices in London, where the directors meet and the business of the company is transacted, and whence all the orders emanate. They possess interests, of various natures and tenures, in gasworks in France and other continental countries, the profits of which arise wholly in those countries, and in such of them as have a tax equivalent to an income tax, those profits are there assessed to such tax. The entire profits of the company arise and accrue abroad, and, in making their return to the income tax in England, the company admitted their liability to the tax upon the amount of profits as from “foreign possessions” actually remitted to this country, and applicable to the payment of dividends to their shareholders, whether resident here or abroad, but denied their liability in respect of their profits ultra such remittance, and which were never transmitted to England or applied in payment of dividends, but were retained abroad and applied in liquidation of other legitimate engagements of the company abroad.

The special commissioners assessed the company in respect of the whole of their profits, including the last-mentioned portion of them, and upon appeal therefrom it was, on a case stated for the court, Held by the Ex. Div. (Kelly, C.B. and Huddleston, B.), upholding the assessment, first, that the company, though a foreign undertaking in a continental country, yet, being a joint-stock company, incorporated and resident in England, were in the position of a person residing in the United Kingdom, and were therefore taxable under the first case of Schedule D. (sect. 100) of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and Schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of the whole of the profits arising from their business abroad, including not only the portion remitted to England and applied in payment of dividends to shareholders resident there or abroad, but also the portion retained and applied to the other purposes of the company abroad. And, secondly, that the provisions of sect. 60, Schedule A., rule 3, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, which treat gasworks as “property,” relate exclusively to gasworks in this country, and do not include or relate to gasworks on the Continent, and that such last-mentioned works are not “foreign possessions” within sect. 100, Schedule D., rule 5, of the same statute.

The Cesena Sulphur Company (Limited) v. Nicholson (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 275; L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 428; 45 L. J. 821, Ex.) followed.

THE Imperial Continental Gas Association, being dissatisfied with the decision of the special commissioners upon an appeal of the association against an assessment to the income tax made upon them by the said commissioners, required the commissioners to state a case for the decision of the court, under part 3 of the Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16; and, the commissioners having stated and signed a case accordingly, the same was subsequently amended in conformity with the order of Huddleston, B., dated 3rd Jan. 1877, and as amended was as follows:—

AMENDED CASE.

1. The Imperial Continental Gas Association, having required to be assessed to income tax by the special commissioners, made by their secretary a return under schedule D. for the year 1875, ending the 5th April 1876, of 210,665l.

2. The said association are a company originally established under the provisions of a copartnership deed, bearing date 9th March 1835, for the purpose of supplying cities, towns, and places in foreign countries with gas, and were incorporated by an Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 190) intitled “An Act for consolidating and amending the powers of the Acts of the Imperial Continental Gas Association.” The said Act was repealed by the Imperial Continental Gas Association Act 1870, but the association remained incorporated by virtue of the said last-mentioned Act.

3. The offices of the association are at 30, Clement’s-lane, Lombard-street, in the City of London, and the meetings of the directors of the association take place at such offices.

4. The association possess interests of various natures and tenures in gasworks in France, Germany, Austria, Holland, and Belgium, the profits of which wholly arise in those foreign countries, and in such of them as have a tax equivalent to the income tax those profits are assessed to such tax.

5. The said sum of 210,665l., being the amount stated in the return made on behalf of the association in respect of profits, is made up of two sums, viz., 208,805l. and 1860l. The sum of 208,805l. was stated to be in respect of profits from foreign possessions, and the sum of 1860l. was stated to be in respect of interest of money.

6. The reason given, on behalf of the association, for confining the amount of the return to the said sums is, that the said sum of 208,805*l.* represents the profits of the association from foreign possessions actually remitted, and which would have to be remitted to the United Kingdom to make up (together with 1860*l.* interest of money lent in the United Kingdom) the interest on the debenture debt of the said association, and the gross total amount found from time to time by the directors to be applicable for the purposes of dividend, including both the dividend paid to non-resident shareholders and that paid to resident shareholders. And further, that the profits, ultra such remittances, and wholly arising abroad as aforesaid, are never transmitted to this country at all, but are retained abroad in liquidation of charges and expenses arising abroad from the exigencies of contracts for lighting foreign places, and are not divided among the shareholders either in this country or abroad.

(a) Reported by HENRY LEXER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

7. The special commissioners, in making their assessment, charged the association in the sum of 258,668*l.* in respect of the whole of their profits. Assuming the assessment to be made on the right principle (which the appellants deny), it is admitted, for the purposes of this case, that the association ought to be assessed in the said sum of 258,668*l.*

8. Against such assessment the association gave notice of appeal, and the appeal was heard by the special commissioners, at their office, on the 27th July 1876, when Mr. Albert F. Jackson, the secretary, attended with Col. Wilkinson, one of the directors.

9. No accounts were produced, the secretary stating that the said association contend that the assessment should be confined to profits accruing in the United Kingdom, and to so much of those accruing abroad as are received by them in the United Kingdom for distribution amongst the shareholders, whether residing in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

10. The special commissioners decided that the association were liable for the whole of their profits, and confirmed the assessment made by them on the amount thereof, 258,668*l.*, the secretary of the association expressing his dissatisfaction at the decision.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the assessment made by the commissioners is in principle correct.

Points for argument for the appellant :

1. That the appellants are not liable to be assessed upon the whole of their profits wherever made. 2. That the assessment should be confined to the profits which actually are received in England, and should not include profits made and retained abroad. 3. That the appellants correctly made their return in respect of foreign possessions.

Points for argument for the respondent :

1 and 2. That the Imperial Continental Gas Association, being an English company incorporated by Act of Parliament, having their office in England, are in the same position as a person residing in the United Kingdom, and are liable to income tax under Schedule D. of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of the whole of the annual profits and gains of the company derived from their business, whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and whether such profits or gains are remitted to the United Kingdom or not. 3. That on the facts of the case it appears that the association resides in the United Kingdom.

4. That the case of The Cesena Sulphur Company v. Nicholson (L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 428) has decided that the association, being an English corporation resident in England, are assessable upon the whole of their gains and profits derived from their business, whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. 5. That the return made on behalf of the association as stated in paragraph 5 of the case is bad in law. 6. That the assessment made by the commissioners as stated in paragraph 7 of the case is good in law.

Charles, Q.C. for the appellants.—This assessment was made on a wrong principle. The point is new, though somewhat similar in character to that in the cases of The Cesena Sulphur Company (Limited) v. Nicholson and The Calcutta Jute Mills Company (Limited) v. Nicholson (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 275; L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 428; 45 L. J. 821, Ex.) The appellants admit their liability to the tax upon all profits divisible amongst the shareholders wherever they may reside, whether in England or on the Continent, but deny their liability to taxation on profits made and kept abroad, and neither remitted to England nor divisible amongst the shareholders, but applied by the company to their other legitimate purposes abroad, such as maintaining and improving their income-producing power. The Crown will contend that the association is liable for all the money earned by them abroad. [KELLY, C.B.—And why not?] Because under the Income Tax Acts a corporation resident in England, but trading wholly abroad, is expressly dealt with, and, under the terms of Schedule D., their only liability is upon the money that reaches the governing body for distribution amongst the shareholders, wherever resident—upon, in fact, such portion only of the profits made wholly abroad as, in the words of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, “come home” to the United Kingdom. The question turns on the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34—an Act which for all practical purposes is identical with the earlier Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. By sect. 1 of the later Act the duties are to be assessed and recovered in accordance with the provisions of the earlier Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), by sect. 1 of which the duties mentioned in certain schedules are made payable. Schedule A. relates to lands, &c., in Great Britain, and then, passing over Schedules B. and C., comes Schedule D., which gives the tax upon “the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, and upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any profession, trade, &c., whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere.” The rules for assessing the properties mentioned in Schedule D. are contained in sect. 100, under the several cases 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. Case 1 is “duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act.” Now, though foreign gasworks are not eo nomine contained in any other schedule, yet Schedule A. throws light on the view the Legislature took of such undertakings in 1842, for gasworks in England are mentioned in Schedule A., which deals with lands in Great Britain; and by sect. 60, the duties in Schedule A.

are to be assessed under certain rules, rule 3 being for "estimating the lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages hereinafter mentioned;" and amongst them will be found in sub-sect. 3, "gasworks," and it is provided that "the annual value of the properties herein described shall be understood to be the full or the actual amount for one year, &c., of the profits received therefrom." In 1842 the Legislature, therefore, classed "gasworks" as property to be assessed under Schedule A., amongst lands, &c., showing that they were dealt with as a possession in pari materia with a possession of lands, &c. Now there being no statement in the Act with regard to "foreign gasworks," it is submitted that the present case comes within Schedule D., but not within the first but the fifth case of that schedule, which deals with (inter alia) "foreign possessions." The only cases which at all touch the point are Sully v. The Attorney-General (2 L. T. Rep. N.S. 439; 5 H. & N. 711; 29 L. J. 464, Ex.; The Cesena Sulphur Company (Limited) v. Nicholson, and The Onclutia Jute Mills Company (Limited) v. Nicholson (ubi sup.). Sect. 100 provides the rules for charging the duty in respect of "possessions." English gasworks are treated by 5 & 6 Vict., under Schedule A., as lands, and are not removed therefrom by sect. 2. of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, but are thereby directed to be taxed under schedule D. If English gasworks are classed with property in the ordinary sense of "possessions," why should not foreign gasworks be classed as "foreign possessions?" The whole policy of the Income Tax Acts is to tax the profits which are here, in this country, and none other, and it is not the persons living here who are assessable. Sect. 108 clearly contemplates that "foreign possessions" means something besides the possession of land.

Dicey (with whom were the Attorney-General, Sir J. Holker, Q.C., and the Solicitor-General, Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), for the Crown, respondent, contra.—In construing a statute of this kind the court is strictly bound by its words and provisions, and an exception made in one case is not necessarily to be introduced in an analogous case. [CLEASBY B.—Is not the question this, whether the present case comes within case 1 or case 5?] It will probably come to that at last; but there are some other points. We have here, first a person resident within the United Kingdom; and, secondly, profits and gains accruing to such person. These precise general words must not be frittered away by words simply intended to carry out a general intention. The case is decided and governed by the Cesena Sulphur Company case (ubi sup.), which the company are now attempting to overrule. The question there was, What was the company, and were they to be treated as the possessors of land or as persons carrying on a business abroad? [CLEASBY, B.—The contention in that case was, on both sides, what was the rate upon the profits of the trade? Now, here a different point is raised: that this company is to be assessed on the profits of the property.] That it was assumed to be so in the Cesena case is a strong argument in favour of its being the natural and right view of the matter, and that the present question was not raised in that case is against its validity now. The only distinction between the two cases is that in the present case a portion of the profits was not divided amongst the shareholders, but kept abroad to pay the debts of the company; whereas in the Cesena case all the profits were paid to the shareholders both at home and abroad. [KELLY, C.B.—The point taken by the appellants' counsel in the present case was not taken in the Cesena case.] Probably it was assumed there to have been decided in one way. Now Schedule A. refers only to "possessions" in England, and "foreign" gasworks are therefore not to be treated differently from other trades. In England, for certain purposes, they are placed artificially amongst lands; but even English gasworks are not turned into "lands" for all purposes, and foreign gasworks are not mentioned in the Act. [HUDDLSTON, B.—It required a special legislative provision to bring English gasworks within the definition of "property," but no such provision has been made with reference to foreign gasworks.] They come so near to the cases in Schedule D. that, by sect. 8 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, they were re-transferred to that schedule.

Charles, Q.C. in reply.—The Cesena case does not touch the present question. There was only one contention there, and the point argued here was not thought of or alluded to in that case. The company there contended that the assessment was to be restricted to profits distributed in England, and the whole argument was that the company was a foreign company. It had not then been decided that a company registered abroad as well as in England was resident in England at all. The present company are prepared to pay tax on all dividends wherever distributed, and that is the distinction between the two cases. The Crown construes the word "possessions" too narrowly, and the Act does not warrant its being restricted to "real property," properly so called. The phrase "foreign possessions" occurs only in sects. 5 and 108. Why are not foreign gasworks "property?" and if "property," why not "possessions?" Unless "foreign possessions" be held to mean only "foreign lands," as contended for by the Crown, the argument of the appellants is left unanswered.

KELLY, C.B.—This case has been very admirably argued on both sides, and, although considerable doubt was raised for some time in our minds by the able arguments of Mr. Charles on behalf of the gas company, yet, from an attentive consideration of the Acts of Parliament, as well as of the decision of this court in what I may briefly call the Cesena case, it appears to me that the Crown is entitled to our judgment. In the first place, let me observe that there is really no substantial distinction, either in fact or in principle, between that case and the case now before us. In both of them a joint-stock company, incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, established, existing, and registered in England, and, within the meaning of the language of the Acts of Parliament, "resident" in England, was possessed of extensive works in foreign countries, in which what may not improperly be called a manufactory and trade is carried on, and carried on at a profit, but in which all that is earned in the way of profit, when it has been earned and ascertained, becomes the property of and is payable to the company established and resident in this country; and the company is assessed to the income tax in respect of the whole of these profits; and the objection made to that assessment in the present case is, that the company ought to be assessed only on that portion of the profits accruing and received abroad which is remitted to and received by the company in this country. Now, the only difference, which is so slight as to be scarcely any difference at all, between the present case and the Cesena case (ubi sup.) is, that in the latter the profits of the company for the year in question consisted of a sum of money which became due and was dealt with in the form of a dividend payable to the whole of the shareholders of the company; whereas, in the present case, the profits which have been acquired by the company, through its dealings in foreign countries, have been applied, not altogether, in the form of a dividend. The greater portion of them, no doubt, have been paid to the shareholders in the shape of a dividend; but another portion has been applied by the company, as they were fully entitled to do, in some other way, as in improving their works or matters of that description. It was still all profit, and the case differs from the Cesena case only in this, that there the whole of the profits acquired were distributed as a dividend, whereas here the profits were distributed partly in paying a dividend and a portion was applied by the company at their pleasure to some other purpose. In both cases, however, there was this common feature, which raised the question before the court in each of them, namely, that a portion only of the entire profits acquired was remitted to or ever received by the company in this country. In the Cesena case a number of the shareholders were resident in various parts of the Continent, and consequently only that portion of the profits which was payable to the shareholders in England was ever remitted to this country, the rest being paid to the shareholders resident abroad. In the present case a portion only of the profits has been remitted to this country, and that portion payable as a dividend to the shareholders, and the other portion has never been remitted to this country at all. On all these points, in everything which constitutes the substance of the case, the two cases are identical. Under these circumstances, therefore, were we to give effect to the argument of Mr. Charles, we should really be overruling the decision of this court in the Cesena case, which I should be most unwilling to do; but still, if I were satisfied not only that in point of law that decision was wrong, but that justice required, there being no appeal in this case, that we should give effect to the argument which has been offered to us on behalf of the appellants, I do not say that I should not be prepared to take that course; but upon full consideration of the Acts of Parliament it appears to me that the argument of Mr. Charles, even if it had been offered and brought under the attention of the court in the Cesena case, ought not to have prevailed then, and ought not to prevail now. The question that that argument raises is, whether this case is for all purposes to be treated as within Schedule A.; not only whether these gasworks on the Continent are to be considered as property, substantially speaking, as land on the Continent, not only in construing the different schedules A., B., C., and D., but also in giving effect to the cases and the rules for carrying the schedules into effect to be found in various parts of the old Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and in the later Act of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34. Now, when we look at the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, we find Schedule A. in the first instance relating to lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages; and on referring to sect. 60 (and it is upon this section and all that follows that reliance is placed by the learned counsel for the company), we find that the duties in Schedule A. are to be assessed and charged under certain rules therein set forth, and which rules are to be deemed and construed to be a part of the Act. First comes "No. 1. A general rule for estimating lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages named in schedule A. The annual value of lands, &c., charged under Schedule A. shall be the rent by the year at which the same are let at rack-rent, &c.; or if not let at rack-rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year," &c. Then comes "No. 2. Rules for assessing the tax in respect of tithes," and certain other descriptions of property therein mentioned; and then comes the following, "No. 3. Rules for estimating the lands, hereinafter mentioned, which are not to be charged according to the preceding general rule. The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount of one year of the profits received therefrom within the respective times therein limited." Then under that heading are dealt with first, quarries of stone, slate, &c.; and, secondly, mines of coal, tin, lead, and so forth; and then we find, "thirdly, ironworks, gasworks, salt-springs," and so on. "Gasworks" are thus made "properties," and are to be dealt with under Schedule A., and it is therefore contended on the part of the appellants that their gasworks, though they are not strictly speaking land or landed property, are yet nevertheless, for the purpose of this portion of the Act of Parliament, treated as "property" within and subject to the operation of Schedule A. and the cases and rules for carrying that schedule into effect. But, on looking carefully at the whole of the provisions in all these cases and rules under Schedule A., and especially at those which relate to and include gasworks, we find that they all relate to properties and works within the United Kingdom, and that there is nothing in any of them which deals with or relates to or can include gasworks, situated as these works are out of this country. In short, the whole of the provisions which treat gasworks as "property" within Schedule A., relate only to gasworks in this country, and there is no provision, case, or rule, at all applying directly or indirectly to gasworks or any property of that description abroad. I think, therefore, that Mr. Charles's argument, captivating as it seemed at first sight, ought not to prevail. We have, therefore, only to consider the law concerning these gasworks, treating them as within Schedule D., which undoubtedly they are. It is unnecessary to go through the different sections of the Act, and the various cases and rules for expounding and carrying into effect the original provisions of Schedule D., and every description of property, work, or undertaking within it, because the present case, in all respects that can apply to it, is identical with the case of the Cesena Company. Under these circumstances, and on the grounds which I have stated, this being a foreign undertaking in a continental country, but belonging to a joint stock company, established, incorporated, and resident in England, I am of opinion that the whole of the profits, whether that portion of them which has been remitted to and received in this country, or that which has been applied to the other purposes of the company abroad, are assessable to income tax in this country, and that, consequently, the right of the Crown being established, our judgment should be in its favour. I ought to add, at the request of my brother Cleasby, that he, being a shareholder in this company, does not think that he ought to be a party to the present judgment.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The real practical question in this case is, whether this company are to be assessed in this country, where their place of business is, on a sum of 258,668*l.*, or on a sum of 210,665*l.* The company claims exemption as to a sum of 48,003*l.*, on the ground that the sum is profits never transmitted to this country at all, but retained abroad, and appropriated there in liquidation of charges and expenses arising abroad from the exigencies of contracts for lighting foreign places, and not divided among the shareholders either in this country or abroad. Mr. Charles says that, if that is to be taken as part of the profits (as it undoubtedly is if this be a trade), he concedes that it would be assessable; but he says that we must not look at it in that light, because "gasworks" are to be assessed in the way that real property is assessed, namely, under the 5th case of sect. 100, Schedule D., and therefore that this portion of the profits is not assessable, because it has not been actually received annually in this country. Thus the question is raised for our consideration. Now I want, first of all, to see whether these are really profits of a trade. They are clearly profits arising from something that has been carried on; that is to say, from the manufacture and sale of gas abroad. I cannot help thinking that, in ordinary parlance, that is a trade. The mere fact that what is manufactured is gas does not distinguish it, as far as I can see, from any other trade. It is made, manufactured, and sold, and the profits, looking at it as a book-keeping concern, are what is received minus the outgoing expenses. Now, upon looking at Schedule D., in the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, it seems to be clear that those profits come within the words of that schedule. The words are: "Upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, there shall be charged," &c. These clearly are profits arising from or accruing to a person (and for this purpose a corporation may be held to be a person) residing in the United Kingdom from property out of the United Kingdom, and clearly, therefore, come within the words of Schedule D. Indeed, Mr. Charles does not deny that; but he says that they are assessable under case 5, and not under case 1. As I understand his argument—and certainly it is not from any fault on his part if one fails to understand it—he says it may be that the case comes within Schedule D., but that the company must be assessed under case 5 of that schedule, because, in fact, the works abroad are "foreign possessions," and he says it is so by referring to the Act of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 and the cases under Schedule A., because under rule No. 3 of Schedule A. "gasworks" are placed in the category of "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," and the assessments are to be on the annual value of these properties. That is what I understand him to argue, and he says, these things being "foreign possessions," they are only to be assessed under the 5th case upon that amount of money which is actually received in this country. I can only say that, if Mr. Charles's view is correct, the case of the Cesena Sulphur Company (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided, for that case is precisely the present one. There is no distinction between mines and gasworks. Mines are mentioned specifically in the 2nd subsection of rule No. 3 attached to Schedule A. and gasworks are mentioned in the 3rd subsection; but all the rules with reference to them are applicable to the Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and therefore, as far as the Cesena Sulphur case is concerned, it is exactly on all-fours in all its circumstances with the present case, as pointed out by my Lord, and I do not wish to repeat what has been already said upon that. I well recollect an argument was raised in that case as to how far that portion of the profits would be assessable to income tax which was paid to persons abroad and had never come to this country at all. It is said that the point which Mr. Charles has suggested was not raised in the Cesena case; but I must say that I think Mr. Dicey furnished a complete answer to the argument offered on the part of the appellants. Now what is that argument? It is obvious that this Schedule D., which has reference to trades and to gasworks, is confined to gasworks in the United Kingdom. In substance it says that gasworks in England shall be assessable as real property. I cannot help thinking that it must have required a legislative enactment to put that construction upon gasworks. I really cannot see that the manufacture of gas is not a trade; nor can I understand that, although it is carried on with buildings and by pipes put in the ground, it is not just as much a trade as that of carrying on a hotel by means of buildings and gardens. It could never be said that a company formed in England for the purpose of carrying on the business of hotel keepers on the Continent were not to be assessable in England because they carried on their business by means of houses and gardens. I have said that it required a legislative enactment to bring English gasworks within the category of real property; and there is no legislative enactment to that effect with reference to gasworks abroad. I cannot help thinking that gasworks abroad are to be considered as works used for the manufacture of gas, and so they come within the definition of a trade, and that they do not come, as contended for by Mr. Charles, within the category of "possessions" abroad, or of lands, tenements, and so on. Two points were no doubt strongly put by Mr. Charles to show that the first case under sect. 100 of Schedule D. would not be applicable to gasworks abroad, and he argued that under rule 5 of the rules applying to both the first and second cases, there would be no power to charge the duties in one division unless when the person is engaged in different concerns in trade in different places. That seemed, no doubt, at first to raise a difficulty; but the Act says: "Every statement of profits to be charged under this schedule shall include every source so chargeable on the person delivering the same on his own account, or on account of any other person; and every person shall be chargeable in respect of the whole of such duties in one and the same division, and by the same commissioner, except in cases where the same person shall be engaged in separate partnerships, or shall be engaged in different concerns relating to trade or manufacture in divers places, in each of which cases a separate assessment shall be made in respect of each concern, at the place where such concern, if singly carried on, ought to be charged as herein directed." Where is the business place of these gasworks? In England. If the concern was carried on in different places, it might be assessed in different places; but here, as pointed out by Mr. Dicey, according to the decision of the court, in The Calcutta Jute Mills case (ubi sup.), the business is carried on at the place whence the orders emanate. That is the central point where the business is carried on, where the directors meet and whence the orders are issued, and where the whole transactions occur, and, according to the fifth part of this clause, it would be assessed here. Our attention was then called to sect. 108 for the same purpose. If I am right in my view that these gasworks are not "foreign possessions," then sect. 108, is inapplicable here, because it applies only to "foreign possessions." On the whole I am clearly of opinion that these works are assessable in that sum of 48,003*l.*, and that therefore our judgment should be for the Crown.

KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED) (apps.) v. M'ADAM (resp.)

Revenue—Income tax—Coal mines—Working of on lease for years—Balance of profits or gains—Exhausted capital at end of year—Deduction on account of—What allowable—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, sect. 60, sched. A., No. 3; sect. 100, sched. D., third case—Rules 1 and 3, sect. 159—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, sect. 2, sched. D.—29 Vict. c. 36, sect. 8—Construction.

The plaintiffs, a colliery company, owned certain leasehold coal mines, the lease of which they had purchased for a term of years; and in carrying on their business during the first year of the term they raised and sold a quantity of coal, thereby reducing the value of the mines at the year's end to 10,424*l.* less than the sum which they had originally paid for them. Upon being assessed to the income tax upon their profits as a colliery company for the year, they claimed to deduct from their gross receipts the above-mentioned sum of 10,424*l.* as for exhausted capital; and on a case stated by the special commissioners for the opinion of the court, it was Held, by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Cleasby and Pollock, BB.), that coal mines were by sect. 8 of 29 Vict. c. 36, transferred from Schedule A., No. 3, sect. 60, and were assessable under Schedule D., sect. 100 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35; and that, in estimating the balance of their profits or gains under rule 1 of the latter schedule, the company were entitled to make the deduction claimed, which was not within any of the deductions forbidden either by rule 3 of that schedule or by sect. 159 of the Act.

Forder v. Handyside and Co. (ubi infra) not in point or applicable.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the commissioners for the special purposes of the Income Tax Acts, under 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16, as to income tax assessed under Schedule D., on appeal for the year ending the 6th April 1875.

CASE.

Andrew Knowles and Sons (Limited), a company carrying on business as colliery proprietors at Pendlebury and elsewhere, appealed against an assessment on the sum of 226,824*l.* made on them under Schedule D. of the Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34) in respect of the profits of their business as colliery proprietors.

At the hearing of the appeal the commissioners were of opinion that the assessment should be reduced to the sum of 216,827*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*; but it was urged by Mr. Chadwick that a sum of 10,424*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* should be deducted on the ground that, in estimating the amount of assessable profits, the commissioners ought to allow as a deduction that sum, which was claimed by the company as "depreciation," and which, as stated in the annual report for the year ending 31st Dec. 1874, "is based on a calculation of the extent of coal available and the duration of existing leases, but it may be modified as future circumstances require;" and he further explained that the term "depreciation" in the balance-sheet was used to show to the shareholders the deterioration or difference in the value of their property at the end of the year and after the working out of a year's coal and the expiration of a year of their leases, as compared with the value of such property at the beginning of the year; or, in other words, that a re-valuation of the property showed that it was worth at the end of the first year 10,424*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* less than at the time of the purchase twelve months before.

The commissioners were of opinion that they were precluded, by the 3rd rule applicable to the first case of Schedule D. in sect. 100 of the Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), and by sect. 159 of that Act, from allowing the deduction claimed, and determined to enforce the assessment in the said sum of 216,827*l.*

The company thereupon expressed their intention to appeal, and this case was accordingly stated and signed by the commissioners on the 22nd March 1876.

The case came on for hearing before the Court of Exchequer in the Hilary sittings on Jan. 24, 1877, before Cleasby and Pollock, BB., when it was partly argued, and by decision of the court was directed to stand over for an amended statement to be made, showing the circumstances under which the deduction of 10,424*l.* was claimed, the court being of opinion that the case, as stated, did not raise the point between the parties so distinctly as it was desirable that it should do. The following amendments by way of addenda to the case were accordingly made.

AMENDMENTS TO CASE.

The company's colliery property comprises both freehold and leasehold mines, which were purchased by them; the price paid for the leasehold

Ex. Div.]

KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED) (apps.) v. M'ADAM (resp.)

coal mines, subject to an average royalty rent of 7d. per ton, and having an average of thirty-two years to run, being 717,421l., the purchase-money for the freehold mines being 67,550l.

At the end of the first year's working, which is the year of the assessment in question, it was ascertained that from the company's leasehold collieries 844,877 tons, and from their freehold pits 62,000 tons of coal had been wrought or gotten and sold in that year, the total quantity therefore being 906,877 tons.

The appellants allege that, in ascertaining by a correct and accurate balance-sheet the profits made in that year, the company valued their coal mines at 10,424l. 15s. 3d. less than the sum for which they had purchased them at the commencement of the year, which sum (as the appellants alleged) fairly represented the diminution in their value by reason of the coal gotten as above mentioned, and which sum for the purposes of such balance-sheet was technically, but perhaps incorrectly, referred to as "depreciation." Of the said sum of 10,424l. 15s. 3d. the sum of 721l. 17s. 11d. represents the diminution in the value of the freehold mines, and the balance that of the leasehold.

The appellants further alleged that, in ascertaining the profits of the freehold mine, no sum is set against or deducted from the gross receipts on account of any rent assumed to be paid in respect thereof.

Points for argument on behalf of the appellants:—1. That the determination of the commissioners is erroneous. 2. That the assessment upon the appellants under the Income Tax Acts, in respect of their business as colliery proprietors for the year ending 6th April 1875, ought not to be in a sum including the sum claimed as a deduction by the appellants. 3. That the sum claimed by them as a deduction is no part of the profits upon which they are liable to be assessed under the Acts in respect of the profits of their said business for the said year, and ought not to be included therein. 4. That the assessment upon the appellants ought not to be in a greater sum than 206,402l. 7s. 7d.

Points for the Crown:—1. That the amount of duty chargeable upon the appellant's colliery is to be calculated upon the full annual value of the profits of such colliery on an average of the preceding three years, without making any deduction therefrom on the ground of its depreciation in value, either through the working out of the coal, or the expiration of any portion of the lease. 2. That the deduction claimed by the appellants in the present case from the amount of profits or gains arising from their said colliery is not such as the appellants are justified in claiming under the provisions of the third rule of the first case of Schedule D. of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), and is contrary to law. 3. That the case of the colliery in question does not differ in principle from the case of leasehold properties or annuities, in neither of which cases is any such deduction allowable as is now claimed by the appellants.

The following sections, schedules, and rules of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36), are material to this report.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, enacts (inter alia) as follows:

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XI.

Sect 60 :

That the duties hereby granted and contained in the said Schedule A. shall be assessed and charged under the following rules, which rules shall be deemed and construed to be part of the Act, and to refer to the said duties as if the same had been inserted under a special enactment.

SCHEDULE A.

No. 1. General rule for estimating lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages mentioned in Schedule A. The annual value of lands, &c., charged under Schedule A. shall be understood to be the rent by the year at which the same are let at rack rent, if the amount of such rent shall have been fixed by agreement commencing within seven years previous to the 5th April next before the making of the assessment; but if not so let at rack rent, then at the rack rent at which the same are worth to let by the year, and which rule shall be construed to extend to all lands, &c., except the properties mentioned in Nos. 2 and 3 of this schedule.

No. 3. Rules for estimating the lands, &c., hereinafter mentioned, which are not to be charged according to the preceding general rules. The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for the year, or the average amount for one year of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited.

Secondly, of mines of coal . . . on an average of the five preceding years subject, to the provisions concerning mines contained in this Act.

Sect. 100 :

SCHEDULE D.

First case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act.

RULES.

First.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, &c., upon a fair and just average of three years, &c.

Third.—In estimating the balance of the profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D., for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains, on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, &c., nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, &c., employed for the purposes of such trade, &c., beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes, according to an average of three years, &c.; nor on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade, &c.; nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom; nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, &c.; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, &c.; nor on account or under pretence of any interest which might have been made on such sums if laid out at interest; nor for any debts, except bad debts, proved to be such to the satisfaction of the commissioners respectively; nor for any average loss beyond the actual amount of loss after adjustment; nor for any sum recoverable under an insurance or contract of indemnity.

Sect. 159 :

That in the computation of duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned . . . it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions therefrom than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act; nor to make any deduction from the profits or gains arising from any property herein described, or from any office, &c., on account of diminution of capital or of loss sustained in any trade, &c., profession, employment, or vocation.

The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, enacts (inter alia) by sect. 2, Schedule D.:

That for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall respectively be carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount of such profits and gains.

And for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, &c., exercised within the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every 20s. of the annual amount of such profits and gains.

The 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36 enacts (inter alia) by sect. 8:

That the several and respective concerns described in No. 3 of Schedule A. of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 34 shall be charged and assessed to the duties hereby granted in the manner in the said No. 3 mentioned, according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D. of the said Act, so far as such rules are consistent with the said No. 3.

Herschell, Q.C. (with whom was T. J. Sanderson) for the appellants.—The question is, whether at the end of a year's working the appellants are or not entitled, in making up the balance of profit and loss, to take into account the exhaustion during the year of so much of what may be called their stock, and to make a deduction in respect of such exhausted stock for the purpose of arriving at the balance showing the profit made during the year. The Crown contends that the appellants are not entitled so to do. The case comes, and the tax is assessable, under Schedule D., sect. 100, of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, to which coal mines have been transferred from No. 3 Schedule A. of the Act by sect. 8 of the 29 Vict. c. 36. In every trade or business, in order "to arrive at the value of the profits or gains" of a year's trading, it is necessary to take stock at the commencement and at the end of the year, and the exhausted stock must, so to speak, be replaced at the year's end before any profits can be said to have been made; that is to say, exhausted capital must be accounted for before profits can be reckoned. The definition of profits by political economists is in accord with that. McCulloch in his "Principles of Political Economy," 4th edition, chap. 7, p. 530, says: "Profits really consist of the produce, or its value, remaining to those who employ capital in industrial undertakings after all their necessary payments have been deducted, and after the capital wasted or used in the undertakings has been replaced. If the produce derived from an undertaking, after defraying the necessary outlay, be insufficient to replace the capital expended, a loss will have been incurred; if the capital be merely replaced, and there is no surplus, there will then be no loss, but there will be no annual profit, and the greater the surplus is the greater the profit." I would adopt that language here. Take the ordinary case of a coal merchant having at the beginning of the year 100,000 tons of coal in his coal yard, purchased by him at 1*l.* a ton. If during the year he sold 10,000 tons for 10,000*l.* he has made no profit; if he has sold it for 12,000*l.* his profit is not the whole 12,000*l.* but the 2000*l.* difference between it and the 10,000*l.* which the coal cost him. The Crown will not dispute these propositions. What difference, then, is there in principle between that case and one where the coal produced is underground, or in a mine, as in the present case? The appellants contend there is none. The merchant at the year's end has 90,000 tons only left, instead of 100,000, and this company have, at the end of the year, not all the coal in the mine when first bought, but only that quantity (say 1,000,000 tons) less the quantity (say 100,000 tons) got out and sold by them during the year. The price originally paid for the 100,000 tons must be deducted from the price the coal sold for, and the difference, after deducting expenses of working—which are not here disputed—is the balance of profit for the year. Had the 100,000 tons of coal been sold for less than the price they were bought at, the result, if the Crown's contention is right, would be that the appellants would have to pay income tax on the selling price notwithstanding that at the end of the year there were a balance of loss instead of profit on the year's trading; so also, if that contention is to prevail, a person purchasing or inheriting a stock of coal above ground or in a mine, and selling it all in the year, would have to pay tax upon the net proceeds, even though his whole capital were exhausted. The appellants, however, contend that he might deduct from the proceeds the selling or market value of the stock of coal at the time at which he acquired it. The principle and the way in which the balance of profits is arrived at are the same, whether it is a lease of a mine for one year or (as here) for thirty-two years, and there is no difference between them. In neither case does profit begin until the exhausted capital, which is gone and will never be seen again, is replaced. This is properly a sale of so much coal to the appellants, and not a lease at all: (Gowan v. Christie, L. Rep. 2 H. L. Sc. App. 273). In that case Lord Cairns, speaking of a lease of minerals, says, at p. 283: "Without pursuing the question with regard to agricultural leases further, I should doubt extremely whether dicta of this kind apply at all to leases of mineral subjects; for, although we speak of a mineral lease or a lease of mines, the contract is not in reality a lease at all in the sense in which we speak of an agricultural lease. There is no fruit; that is to say, there is no increase—there is no sowing or reaping, in the ordinary sense of the term, and there are no periodical harvests. What we call a mineral lease is really, when properly considered, a sale out and out of a portion of land. It is liberty given to a particular individual, for a specific length of time, to go into and under the land and to get certain things there if he can find them, and to take them just as if he had bought so much soil." Now, if at the expiration of their term the appellants should have gotten out and sold all the coal for less or for the same sum as they paid for their lease, they will have made no profit, and yet the Crown will contend that they will have been liable to tax every year upon their net yearly receipts. That would be regarding as profits all that a man receives, even though less than his exhausted capital. If a trading company, with power to pay dividends only out of profits, had realised 10,000*l.* by the sale of coal, but in so doing had exhausted an amount of coal which more than represented that sum, and then proposed to pay a dividend, the Court of Chancery would stop the payment on the ground that the company had no profits. It would say, "True, you have 10,000*l.* at your bank, but you have 15,000*l.* worth of coal less in your mine." There is nothing in rule 3 of the first case of Schedule D., on which the Crown will rely, that modifies or conflicts with the appellants' argument. That rule points out the matters in respect of which no deduction is to be made in estimating the balance of profits, &c., viz., on account of sums expended in repairs of trade premises, &c.; for the supply, repair, or alteration of implements, &c., beyond the usual sum, on an average of three years, or on account of any loss arising out of the trade, or for any capital employed in the trade, or in the improvement of the trade premises, &c., none of which are applicable here, and all of which are beside the present question. Neither is sect. 159, nor the case of Forder v. Handyside and Co. (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 63; L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 233; 45 L. J. 809, Q. B. C. P., & Ex.), on both of which the Crown relied, in point or applicable to this question.

[Ex. Div.]

Dicey (with him were the Attorney-General, Sir J. Holker, Q.C., and the Solicitor-General, Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), for the Crown (respondent) contra, contended, first, that the case came within sect. 60, Schedule A., and not under Schedule D., and the appellants therefore had no locus standi; but secondly, even if it were within Schedule D., they had still no locus standi. Originally mines were treated by Parliament, not as trades, but as belonging to or coming under the category of lands, tenements, and hereditaments (sect. 60, Schedule A., rule No. 3, second sub-section), and they were not, as the appellants have contended, transferred by sect. 8 of 29 Vict. c. 36, from that schedule to Schedule D. For some purposes it is true they were by that section brought under that schedule for convenience, that persons might go privately before the commissioners. Sect. 8 only directs that in some respects they shall be assessed under the rules in Schedule D. so far as is consistent with Schedule A., under which schedule they still are. Sect. 7 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 14, confirms this view. The question here is not about deductions from profits, but about the "annual value." As a matter of political economy, the doctrine contended for by the appellants may be correct, but the Income Tax Acts ignore political economy altogether. The tax, though it has in fact continued for many years, yet in theory it is an annual Act, and the intention is that everyone should pay a proportion of his income for each and every year. Mines under Schedule A. are to be treated as lands, and to be taxed upon their annual value, and not upon a balance of profits like a trade. The value of a mine is what a man gets from it by the coal which he sells, the Act treating coal exactly as if it were the produce of the land. That is the legal, though not perhaps the economical way of treating it. But assuming the mines to be brought within Schedule D., the present deduction is forbidden by the express words of rule 3 of the first case in that schedule, which prohibits any deduction "on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom" (that is from "the trade, manufacture, or concern"), nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern," and sect. 159 of the same statute (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35) is also against the appellants' claim. The Act makes no distinction between a purchaser and an inheritor of land. If a landowner discovers a mine under his land, and takes out the coal and sells it for 100,000*l.*, even my friend, I think, would not contend that in calculating the gains the landowner may say, "I've got 100,000*l.*, but I must deduct enough to enable me to replace my estate in the position it was in before I got the coal." So if a man buys land out and out, and then finds a mine, and takes the coal and sells it, could it be contended that he might deduct the purchase money of the land from the money he received from the sale of the coal? But if the purchaser of land out and out may not deduct his purchase money, why should a leaseholder for, say ninety-nine years, be allowed to deduct the money paid for his lease? The case, however, is virtually decided by the case of Forder v. Handyside (ubi sup.) As in that case, so here, I say the amount set aside is in effect an addition to capital. It is either capital withdrawn or a sum employed or intended to be employed in the trade, &c. It is an attempt to set aside money to compensate for coal sold.

Herschell, Q.C. was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—I had not the advantage which both my learned brothers enjoyed of hearing the argument on the former occasion in this case; but, looking at the nature of the Income Tax Acts, and the plain and simple, clear, and undoubted meaning of the word "profits," I do not think that this case admits of any doubt. The reference which has been made to the case of Forder v. Handyside (ubi sup.), and to the statutes passed before the time when this question arose, may be disposed of almost in a word. Under the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 30, sect. 8, it appears to me to be clear that the question here is transferred from Schedule A. to Schedule D., and we have therefore only to consider the construction of Schedule D. and the different rules to which the learned counsel on both sides referred, and upon which the whole question turns. Now, the first rule of Schedule D. is as follows: "The duty to be charged in respect thereof;" that is, "in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern," which includes "mines" and the business of working them, shall be computed "on a sum not less than the full amount of the profits and gains of such trade, manufacture, &c., upon a fair and just average of three years," and so on. That is the substantial enactment, the construction of which must decide the present question, unless it is qualified by something which comes after. Now, what is "the balance of the profits or gains" of such trade, &c. Beginning at that point, let us take the simplest possible case, and imagine a man purchasing at a wholesale warehouse a bale of cotton or a chest of tea for 40*l.*, and selling it by retail for 45*l.*, incurring no expense in the transaction beyond his purchase money of 40*l.* What is his profit? It is the sum of 5*l.*, the balance or difference remaining to him after having repaid himself everything that he expended in order to obtain the bale or chest which he sold for 45*l.*; and, if it stood by itself simply, it would be his whole year's income; but if it be multiplied some hundred times by as many different transactions, his income would be 500*l.* a year, and in respect of the one or the other sum, if so small a sum as 5*l.* were assessable at all, he would be assessable to the income tax. Now let me go a little further, and suppose that the man became the owner of a bale of cotton by purchase for 20*l.*, and of a chest of tea of that value, which had been left to him as a legacy. Starting in business with these two articles of the joint value of 40*l.*, he sells them in the course of the year for 45*l.* What is his profit? Is it not the difference between the value of the articles and that for which he sold them, viz., 5*l.*

[Ex. Div.]

KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED) (apps.) v. M'ADAM (resp.)

only? If the 20*l.*, the value of the tea which was bequeathed to him, is to be transmuted into "profits" and to be treated as such, and his "profits" are to be put at 25*l.*, I see no escape from the proposition that, if a man has a legacy of 20*l.* or 100*l.* left to him in goods or money's worth, it is to be taken as his income. Now, if that were so, what would be the inevitable consequence? Let us take the case of money first, and suppose a man dying possessed of half a million of money, which he leaves equally between his five children. Could it be contended for a moment in a court of law that that was income, and that each child was to be assessed to the income tax upon 100,000*l.*? To contend that the corpus of a man's whole fortune was to be taken as his year's income, and that he was to pay income tax upon it after that rate, would be a startling, not to say ludicrous proposition. If it were so, and the money remained untouched and uninvested, and none of it were spent during the whole of the man's life, he would still, according to that proposition, be liable to be assessed at the same rate for the remainder of his life, which would surely be a monstrous contention. Then, is there any difference between that case and the case of goods which are assessable under Schedule D.? Suppose a merchant dies and leaves to his son all his goods in his warehouses, consisting of, say, 20,000 bales of cotton, and that the son, on succeeding to his father's business, carries it on, and in the course of the year sells 1000 of the 20,000 bales, what is his profit? Is it what he receives for the 1000 bales without any deduction? It is not so. His profit must be reckoned in this way. What would it have cost him to purchase at wholesale price the 1000 bales which he has sold? Suppose they would have cost him 10,000*l.*, and that he has sold them for 12,000*l.*, is his profit the whole 12,000*l.*? If it be, then, if he had sold all the 20,000 bales in the year, his profits would have been equivalent to a legacy of 240,000*l.* in money, and he must have been assessed on that amount as if it were a yearly income. But that is not so. What he has really gained in the way of "profit" is the sum for which he has sold the bales, deducting therefrom the price for which he bought them, or, if he inherited them or took them under a gift, the market value or sum which he would have had to pay for them if he had purchased them, and that difference alone is his profit. Now, let us apply this principle to the case of a coal mine, and suppose, as it was I think unanswerably put by Mr. Herschell in his argument, that the present case was one of a lease of the mine for one year only, for which the appellant company had paid 1000*l.*, thereby having the liberty to work and raise as much coal as they could find and get out during the year. What at the end of the year would be their condition? We will suppose that in the course of the year they bring to the surface a quantity of coal which they sell for 1200*l.*: what is the profit which they have earned in the year? They paid 1000*l.* for the lease, the means by which alone they obtained the liberty to enter and work the mine, and that lease is now expired and gone. We will assume that the machinery and labour employed cost them during the year 100*l.* more, and they sold the coal obtained for 1200*l.* Is their profit the whole of that sum? To apply the term "profit" to such a transaction would be an abuse of language. Their profit would be that which remained to them, and which they can put into their pockets, after deducting their expenses, viz., the 1000*l.* paid for the lease and the 100*l.* expended in machinery and labour and the cost of getting the coal. Their profit then would be 100*l.* only. If that, then, be the case with regard to a lease for one year, it must be the same with respect to a lease for thirty-two or any other number of years. There is and can be no difference in principle between the two cases. In order to arrive at their profits, whatever they may be, the company have a right to set off against their gross receipts the whole expenditure over the thirty-two years, divided into thirty-two portions, if their dealings have been alike in all the years, just as they would, supposing it had been a lease for one year; and now what is the expenditure? It is, in addition to the yearly expenses and cost of labour, the premium or rent paid for the lease, which, if it be for one year only, would have to be set off against the gross earnings for that year; and if it be a thirty-two years' lease, it would then have to be divided into thirty-two parts, in order to ascertain what, if any, during the thirty-two years, is their annual profit in respect of which they would be assessable to the income tax. Such, in my opinion, is the construction of this provision of the first rule under Schedule D. of the Act, supposing there to be no subsequent qualification in any other section. Now the third rule is as follows: "In estimating the balance of profits and gains eligible under Schedule D. for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon," no sum shall be deducted from it "on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade;" that is, on account of something not in the way of trade, as for instance, a loss through some speculation incurred whilst working the mine. The loss so incurred would have nothing to do with the trade in which the individual was engaged. Then next, "nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom." The meaning of that is perfectly plain. If a man begins to work a mine, or to carry on any other trade, &c., with a capital of 40,000*l.*, and in the course of a year withdraws 10,000*l.* of it for the purpose, say of building coal warehouses in other places in which he carries on his business, that would be a portion of his capital withdrawn, which would not be taken into consideration in ascertaining the balance of his profits. Then come the other words, "nor for any sums employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade." These words I think refer to and mean something additional to the capital which has been actually employed in realising the profit that has been acquired during the year. If, for instance, during the year the lessee of the mine, in order to work it with greater success, has added to all his previous expenditure a sum of money, say 1000*l.*, in order to assist in working the mine in general, that would be a sum which might add to the value of the mine, and in one sense it would be employed in the trade, because it would be employed to add to the value of the mine; but yet it would not be an element in ascertaining that year's profit. Then we come to sect. 159, which enacts "that in the computation of duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned, either by the party making or delivering any list or statement," and so on, "it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions therefrom than such as are expressly enumerated in the Act nor on account of diminution of capital employed or of loss sustained in any trade," &c. Now, it is not a diminution of capital to purchase an article which afterwards is sold at a profit; but a man's capital may be diminished by the destruction of his goods by an accidental fire, and that would be a loss or depreciation of the amount of his capital, but not an element in the calculation of his profits, and could not be set off against them. So also a trader may think that his capital is too large, and may reduce it from 20,000*l.* to 15,000*l.*; but such a diminution is not to be set off against the amount of his profits in calculating the income tax. It is one quite of another character, and is in no respect an element in the estimate of the balance of profits. From the produce of the articles a man deals in he has a right to deduct all the expenses which he has been put to in the purchase of the articles and by payments for work and labour or machinery, or of any other kind—all, in fact, that he has necessarily expended in order to acquire possession and the right to dispose of such articles—before the amount of his profit can be said to be ascertained. Under these circumstances, and for these reasons, I am of opinion that the deduction here claimed by the appellants is not forbidden by any section, rule, or provision of the Income Tax Acts, and that the appellants are therefore entitled to our judgment.

KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED) (apps.) v. M'ADAM (resp.)

CLEASBY, B.—The present case, involving the application of the rules for assessing the Income Tax, appears to me to be of a class in which we must look at each case by itself, and be careful not to generalise, so as to appear to include other and different cases. This is not the case of a landowner opening a quarry or a mine, and letting it at a royalty, or working it himself. I do not say anything about such a case as that, for it must be understood, as far as I am concerned, that I am not dealing with or deciding any such case as that at all. Now I take it to be quite clear that, in the present case, sect. 8 of the 29 Vict. c. 36 places the assessment under "the rules prescribed in the Schedule D." of the 5 & 8 Vict. c. 35, of which the words are, "the several and respective cases described in No. 3 of Schedule A. of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 (and that includes mines), shall be charged and assessed to the duties hereby granted in the manner in the said No. 3 mentioned according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D. of the said Act, so far as such rules are consistent with the said No. 3." Nothing can be possibly clearer, I think, than that language, and unless that enactment applies to the case of a colliery company formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of working coal mines, no case can be suggested, in my opinion, to which it could apply. This is a case to which it was intended to apply. I do not express any opinion whatever as to how far it applies to the case, as I before observed, of a landowner opening a quarry or mine, and letting it or working it himself. It is clear, however, that this colliery company came under Schedule D., and we have only to apply the words of that schedule, treating this, as it ought to be treated, as a trade or business. As soon then as we arrive at that point, the case, as it seems to me, is perfectly free from difficulty.

The first rule under Schedule D. says, "the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade," &c. Now, as was well put by the learned counsel for the appellants, how can we get at the balance of the profits of a trade for a year without stock-taking at the commencement and at the end of the year? It is, I think, impossible to do so, and this indeed was hardly disputed. Now rule 1 ends with these words, "without any other deduction than is hereinafter allowed." The whole argument therefore turns upon the application of the language of rule 3 as correcting the necessary application of the language of rule 1, which prescribes that "the balance of the profits or gains" is to be taken. Some of these rules may perchance be somewhat inconsistent with the strict principles of political economy; but if there is anything in rule 3 applicable to the present case we are bound to apply it. Now, I can see nothing in rule 3 which is in the least degree inconsistent with the plan I have alluded to of stock-taking for the purpose of arriving at "the balance of the profits and gains." It is not necessary to go through the several branches or items of that rule to show that each part of it is inapplicable to the present case; the only part of it on which anything can turn on the present occasion is the following: "nor on account of any capital withdrawn from the concern." Now, to call the deduction here claimed "capital withdrawn from the concern" is entirely erroneous. It is rather "capital consumed in making the profits." As to the case of Forder v. Handyside (ubi sup.) which has been referred to, there is no doubt that the principle of the Income Tax Acts is to take the result of the trading for one year, or at an average of three years, and every person must pay something out of the profits of that year or average of three years; and a trader cannot put by a sum of money out of his yearly receipts for the purpose of meeting a depreciation of capital, in addition to the deduction which he is allowed to make in respect of the annual repairs of premises, and matters of that sort, which belong to the year or the average of years. It is obvious that if he did more than that he would depart from the principle of the Acts of Parliament which expressly forbid such things to be done. That case, I must say, seems to me to be so inapplicable to the one now before us that I almost wonder it was cited; at all events it has no bearing upon the present case at all, its principle being simply this, that a trader is not entitled to put by a sum for depreciation. I think therefore, under these circumstances, that the appellants are entitled to our judgment in their favour.

POLLOCK, B.—I entirely agree with my Lord and my brother Cleasby. The first point for us to determine is, under what Act of Parliament does this case come and is it governed by? It appears to me clearly to be governed by the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, s. 8, which provides that any concern such as this is to be charged and assessed with duty in the manner in No. 3 of Schedule A. mentioned, according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D. of the said Act, so far as such rules are consistent with the said No. 3. It has not been contended or assumed that there is any inconsistency between Schedule A. No. 3 and these rules. That being so, the rest of the case seems to me really to have arisen from a misapprehension, caused by reason of the company having in their first return made use of the word "depreciation," which, unexplained as it then was, not unnaturally or unreasonably suggested to the commissioners the idea that it was necessarily in diminution of the sum of the balance of profits or gains. It was afterwards corrected, and it was stated that "the amount claimed for depreciation was based on a calculation of the extent of coal available and the duration of existing leases, but that it might be modified as future circumstances required;" and further, that "the term depreciation was used to show to the shareholders the deterioration or difference in the value of their property at the end of a year and after the working out of a year's coal." Mr. Herschell, too, in his able argument to-day, further explained it as meaning that the company had in the year overworked the proportion of the whole quantity of coal in the time as compared with the whole lease of years—that is to say, in proportion to their term of thirty-two years. That turns us back, therefore, before going to the question of deduction at all, upon the question, What has been the balance of profits or gains of the concern? If they have any rent to pay, we must first ask what is that rent? It may or not be an annual rent, or it may be a small annual rent with a very large sum paid as premium. Of course in that case the premium must be distributed over the whole number of years. It could not be argued for a moment that, because a man paid 100,000*l.* as premium and only 500*l.* a year as rent, the 100,000*l.* should be treated as a nullity. So, again, in the present case, supposing a larger quantity of coal, having regard to the number of years, to be taken in any one year than would be taken if it were distributed over the whole number of years, there can be no doubt, I think, when these facts are apprehended, and when we ask what is the profit or gain of this adventure, that we must consider that term and estimate it, and therefore deduct it from the gross receipts of the sale of the coal before we can arrive at the balance of the profits or gains. That being determined, I think the whole question is at an end; and had the case been originally stated as it was afterwards amended, it would probably never have been before us at all. I quite agree that the appellants are entitled to judgment.

REG. v. PAUL READ.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

Embezzlement—Wild rabbits—Taking, killing, and removing—One continuous action.

owner. He was not at liberty to kill rabbits for his own use, but he did take, kill, remove, and sell eighteen rabbits in and from the wood, nevertheless. The taking, killing, removing, and selling were parts of one continuous action.

Held, that the criminal offence (if any) was not embezzlement.

CASE stated by the Vice-Chairman of the Berks Quarter Sessions for the opinion of this Court.

The prisoner was indicted at the Berks Epiphany Sessions, held 31st Dec. 1877, for stealing eighteen rabbits, the property of Arthur Smith, his master.

The evidence showed that the prisoner was the gamekeeper of Smith, and was employed to look after a wood in which the game and rabbits, and rights of sporting, had been granted to Smith by the owner.

The prisoner was not at liberty to kill or take rabbits in the wood for his own use.

He did take and kill and remove eighteen wild rabbits in and from the wood, and had bargained to sell them, when they were seized in the possession of the purchaser's agent; the capturing, killing, removing, and selling being parts of one continuous action.

Counsel for the defence required the Court to stop the case, because there was not any evidence to go to the jury; that the rabbits had never as subjects of larceny been in the possession of Smith; and that, therefore, the prisoner could not be guilty of stealing or embezzling them.

Counsel for the prosecution insisted that, when the rabbits were captured and killed by the prisoner, they were by that act reduced into the possession of his master, and became subjects of larceny or embezzlement.

Reg. v. Townley, L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 315; 12 Cox C. C. 59; and Reg. v. Oullum, L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 28; 12 Cox C. C. 469, were cited.

The case was left to the jury, the Court telling them that the criminal offence of the prisoner (if any) was embezzlement and not larceny, and that if, in their opinion, the prisoner being the servant of Smith captured and killed the rabbits, although against the orders of his master, and they so came into the possession of the prisoner for or on behalf of his master, and the prisoner converted them to his own use, he was guilty of embezzlement.

The jury found the prisoner guilty of embezzlement, and he was sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The Court reserved for the opinion of the Superior Court, which they now request, the question, whether the prisoner, by capturing and killing the rabbits against his master's orders, did so bring them into the possession of his master that he could, by appropriating them to himself, be guilty of embezzling them.

The Court respited the execution of the judgment on the conviction until such question has been decided.

GEORGE CHARLES CHENT,

Vice-Chairman of Berks Quarter Sessions.

Howard Smith for the prisoner.—It is submitted that the prisoner was not guilty of embezzlement. The case finds that the capturing, killing, removing, and selling the rabbits were parts of one continuous action, and therefore the rabbits, according to Reg. v. Townley, were not the subject of larceny. In that case Bovill, C.J., said:

"Now, the first question is as to the nature of the property in these rabbits. In animals feræ naturæ there is no absolute property; there is only a special or qualified right of property—a right ratione soli to take and kill them. When killed upon the soil they become the absolute property of the owner of the soil. This was decided in the case of rabbits by the House of Lords, in Blades v. Higgs (11 H. of L. Cas. 621; 34 L. J. 286, C. P.). And the same principle was applied in the case of grouse in Lord Lonsdale v. Bigg (1 H. & N. 923; 26 L. J. 196, Ex.). In this case therefore the rabbits being started and killed on land belonging to the Crown, might, if there were no other circumstance in the case, become the property of the Crown. But before there can be a conviction for larceny for taking anything not capable in its original state of being the subject of larceny—as for instance, things fixed to the soil—it is necessary that the act of taking away should not be one continuous act with the act of severance or other act by which the thing becomes a chattel, and so is brought within the law of larceny. This doctrine has been applied to stripping lead from the roof of a church, and in other cases of things affixed to the soil. And the present case must be governed by the same principle." As the rabbits were not the subject of larceny, so neither are they the subject of embezzlement. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68, enacts that whosoever, being a servant or being employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a servant, shall fraudulently embezzle any chattel, money, or valuable security which shall be delivered to or received or taken into possession by him for or in the name or on the account of his master or employer, shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen the same from his master, although such chattel, money, or security was not received into the possession of such master or employer otherwise than by the actual possession of his clerk, servant, or other person, &c. employed." The rabbits here were not delivered to or received by or taken into the possession of the prisoner for or in the name or on the account of his master, but on his own account and for his own gain. The case is similar to that of Reg. v. Oullum, where the captain of a barge used the barge for his own purposes contrary to his master's orders, and so earned money which was paid to him and appropriated to his own use, and this was held not to amount to embezzlement. Then again the rabbits were not "chattels" at the time of killing, which was done that the prisoner might get the property for himself. [MANISTY, J.—It is clear that a dead rabbit is a chattel, and belongs to somebody. HAWKINS, J.—But here the prisoner had the rabbits in his possession before he killed them, and the taking, killing, and removing them were all one continuous act.] That is so. When the rabbits were taken into the possession of the prisoner they were not chattels. Suppose a wild rabbit ran into the hall of a house, and the servant caught and killed it then and there; would he be guilty either of larceny or embezzlement? It is submitted that he would not.

H. D. Greene for the prosecution.—The prisoner was properly convicted of embezzlement. That a chattel was received into the possession of the prisoner is clear from Blades v. Higgs (11 H. of L. Cas. 621.) In that case Lord Chelmsford said: "With respect to hwild and unreclaimed animals, there can be no doubt that no property exists in them so long as they remain in the state of nature. It is also equally certain that, when killed or reclaimed by the owner of the land on which they are found, or by his authority, they become at once his property absolutely when they are killed, and in a qualified manner when they are reclaimed. Does the unauthorised act of a trespasser, by the very act of killing them, convert them at once to the use of the owner of the land? If the appellant is right in saying that the owner of the land has no property in game unless it is killed by him or by his authority, it will necessarily follow that a poacher reducing the game into possession, and thereby as possessor, though a wrong-doer, having a right to it against all the world but the true owner, there being no owner to challenge his possession, might maintain an action against the owner of the land for taking the game from him, even upon the land itself, when it was killed. It is much more reasonable to hold that the trespasser having no right at all to kill the game can give himself no property in it by his wrongful act, and that as game killed or reduced into possession is the subject of property, and must belong to somebody, there can be no other owner of it under these circumstances but the person on whose ground it is taken or killed." It is clear dead rabbits are the property of someone, and, according to Higgs v. Blades, of the owner of the land on which they are killed. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose the rabbits are taken while asleep? MANISTY, C.J.—Or caught in a trap and taken away alive?] In this case they were killed on the land. The master had a constructive possession by the prisoner, his servant, killing them in the wood. [COCKBURN, C.J.—By the statute it must appear that the prisoner took the rabbits for or on account of his master. That is contrary to the fact, for the prisoner took the rabbits for himself. He intended to rob his master and took the rabbits for himself.] On that view the prisoner might be convicted for larceny. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But he was not, and the question reserved is as to embezzlement.] When a butler steals his master's plate or wine, in point of law they are in the master's possession at the time. Here the rabbits, when killed, became the master's property, but were not at the time in his possession. In Reg. v. Oullum Blackburn, J. said: "Without criticising the words of the Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68, let us look at the object of passing it. The common law requires, for the offence of larceny, not only animus furandi, but that there should be a taking, and it was held, on the narrow distinctions of the common law, that when the property only became the master's by coming into the hands of his servants, and not otherwise, the servant could not be said to take his master's property, because it came into his hands at the moment it was so received. It was to meet this difficulty that the Legislature said, 'He who embezzles shall be guilty of stealing, although the property has not become the master's, except by the possession of the servant.' And in the original Act were the words 'by virtue of his employment,' which have been expressly omitted from the more recent statute. Yet still the essence of the matter is, that the servant shall be deemed to have stolen the master's property, if it be his master's property, although not received otherwise than in the prisoner's capacity of clerk or servant." Here the prisoner had his master's property when the rabbits had been killed by him. [HAWKINS, J.—In Reg. v. Roe, 11 Cox C. O. 557, Willes, J. said, "By the decision in Blades v. Higgs it was never intended that poachers should be put on the same footing with felons."]

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that the conviction must be quashed.

REG. v. KNIGHT. (a)

Debtors Act 1869—Indictment—Aider by verdict—Obtaining credit by false pretences, and fraudulently disposing of goods within four months before liquidation—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, sub-sects. 14 and 15.

An indictment charged that the defendant, a trader, "did within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs obtain from W. goods upon credit under the false pretence, &c., with intent to defraud." And in another count in similar terms the defendant was charged with unlawfully disposing of the goods otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade. Both counts were framed under sect. 11, sub-sects. 14 and 15, of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62.

Held, that the counts were good after verdict, and sufficiently averred that the defendant was a person whose affairs were liquidated by arrangement within the meaning of sect. 11.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the borough of Birmingham, held at Birmingham, before the Recorder, on the 22nd Oct. 1877, an indictment of which the following is a copy came on to be tried against the defendant, framed upon sub-sects. 14 and 15 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (The Debtors Act 1869).

Borough of Birmingham to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oaths present, that heretofore and before the committing of the offences by William Augustus Knight as herein-after mentioned, the said William Augustus Knight was a trader within the true intent and meaning of the laws then and now in force relating to bankrupts. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that afterwards, and whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 12th April 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain from Westwick and Co., spice merchants of London, five cases of Cochin Ginger upon credit, under the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, and has not paid for the same, with intent to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

2nd count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 9th May 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, unlawfully dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, certain property (to wit), five cases of Cochin Ginger, which he had obtained on credit, and had not paid for, with intent then and there to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

3rd count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 3rd May 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain from Joseph Brook and Co., of Birmingham, twenty cads (or boxes) of Caper Tea upon credit, under the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, and has not paid for the same, with intent to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

4th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 8th May 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, unlawfully dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, certain property (to wit), twenty cads (or boxes) of Caper Tea which he had obtained on credit and had not paid for, with intent then and there to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

5th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit) on or about the 28th May 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain from William Lloyd, of Birmingham aforesaid, three boxes of Toby and Booth's bacon and two boxes of Toby and Booth's hams, upon credit, under the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, and has not paid for the same, with intent to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

6th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the said 28th May 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, unlawfully dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, certain property, to wit, three boxes of Toby and Booth's bacon and two boxes of Toby and Booth's hams, which he had obtained upon credit and had not paid for, with intent then and there to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

7th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 1st June 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain from H. H. and S. Budgett and Co., of Bristol, five boxes of bacon upon credit, under the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, and has not paid for the same, with intent to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

(a) Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on the said 1st June 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, unlawfully dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, certain property (to wit), five boxes of bacon which he had obtained upon credit and had not paid for, with intent then and there to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

9th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the 7th June 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain from Charles Wood and Co., of Liverpool, ten boxes of cheese upon credit, under the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, and has not paid for the same, with intent to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

10th count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that whilst the said William Augustus Knight was such trader as aforesaid (to wit), on or about the said 7th June 1877, the said William Augustus Knight did, within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, unlawfully dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, certain property (to wit), a large quantity of cheese which he had obtained upon credit, and had not paid for, with intent then and there to defraud, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her Crown and dignity.

In the course of the trial proof was duly made, by the production by an official of the County Court of Warwickshire, holden at Birmingham, of the proceedings under the seal of the said Court relating thereto:

1. That the said William Augustus Knight had, upon the 19th June 1877, filed in the said Court his petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement under the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71 (The Bankruptcy Act 1869).

2. That trustees under the said liquidation had been subsequently duly appointed.

3. That the liquidation proceedings under the said petition were still pending.

The defendant was acquitted on the third and fourth counts of the said indictment, and convicted on the remaining eight counts.

After the verdict was returned by the jury, but before sentence was passed, a motion was made by the counsel for the defendant in arrest of judgment to quash the counts of the said indictment on which the defendant had been convicted, on the ground that they were bad on the face of them, and were not tured by the verdict inasmuch as:

1. The above-mentioned counts of the said indictment contained no averment of any offence under the Debtors Act 1869.

2. There was no averment in any of the above-mentioned counts of the said indictment that the defendant was a person adjudged bankrupt, or was a person whose affairs were or had been liquidated by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

3. There was no averment in any of the above-mentioned counts of the said indictment of the filing of any petition for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act 1869, by the said defendant or the appointment of a trustee under any such liquidation proceedings.

4. There was no substantive or certain averment of any liquidation proceedings whatever under the Bankruptcy Act 1869 in any of the above-mentioned counts of the said indictment.

Upon hearing counsel on both sides I overruled the objection, but on the application of the counsel for the defendant I stated my intention to send up a case for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and I therefore postponed judgment on the conviction and discharged the defendant on recognisance of bail to appear and receive judgment if called upon.

If the Court should be of opinion that all the above-mentioned counts of the said indictment are bad after verdict, then they are to be quashed; but if the Court should be of opinion that any of the said counts are good, then the verdict on those counts is to stand, and the defendant is to come up for judgment accordingly.

R. Harris (T. M. Colmore with him) for the defendant.—It is submitted that the indictment is bad after verdict. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, begins thus: "Any person adjudged bankrupt, and any person whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, shall in each of the cases following be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour." Then sub-sects. 14 and 15, on which the indictment is framed, enact: "If within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him or the commencement of the liquidation, he being a trader obtains, upon the false pretence of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary way of his trade, any property on credit and has not paid for the same, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud." Sub-sect. 15: "If within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, or the commencement of the liquidation, he being a trader pawns, pledges, or disposes of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, any property which he has obtained on credit and has not paid for, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud." In order to convict a person under those sub-sections it must appear either that he has been adjudicated a bankrupt, or that his affairs have been liquidated by arrangement; and the indictment must show on the face of it that the defendant is a person on whom those sub-sections can operate. A man may file a petition for liquidation, but if the liquidation is not carried out and goes off, he is not within the purview of sect. 11:

Reg. v. Oliver and Austin, 13 Cox C. C. 588.

The principle of that case is applicable to this case. [COCKBURN, C.J.—You must read the indictment with reference to sect. 19, which seems to me to set at nought the rules of criminal pleading: "In an indictment for an offence under this Act it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged in the words of this Act, specifying the offence, or as near thereto as circumstances admit, without alleging or setting forth any debt, act of bankruptcy, trading, adjudication, or any proceedings in, or order, warrant, or document of any contracting under, the Bankruptcy Act 1869.] In Reg. v. Oliver and Austin, Lush, J. said that sect. 19 only makes an indictment good when it states the offence in substance. This indictment does not state the offence in substance, for it nowhere avers that the defendant's affairs were liquidated by arrangement, which is a necessary ingredient to bring the defendant within the operation of sect. 11. The only difference between the present case and Reg. v. Oliver and Austin is, that that was a bankruptcy and the present a liquidation by arrangement. [MANISTY, J.—No; the indictment was very different. In that case Kelly, C.B. said: "I am of opinion that no such amendment or intentment as suggested can be made, when the contrary is alleged as here." We have not that difficulty to get over in this case. LINDLEY, J.—Do you contend that the words "are liquidated," in sect. 11, mean "have been liquidated," and that no offence can be committed by a person when the liquidation turns out abortive?] Yes. Again, the indictment does not show that the liquidation ever commenced, for by sect. 125, sub-sect. 4, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), a liquidation by arrangement shall be deemed to commence from the date of the appointment of the trustee. It does not appear on the face of the indictment that a trustee was ever appointed. So that the most that can be inferred from the indictment is, that at some time proceedings for a liquidation had commenced, but what became of them does not appear; they may have dropped, or the defendant may have paid 20s. in the pound.

Rosher for the prosecution.—The indictment is good after verdict. In Reg. v. Oliver and Austin the motion to quash the indictment was expressly made on the ground that it was bad on the face of it, and repugnant; and the repugnancy was the chief difficulty in that case. Here there is no repugnancy, and according to sect. 19 it is sufficient, for it contains all the requisites to constitute the offences charged; it follows the words of sect. 11, and shows substantially the offence charged. Secondly, the objection was made too late. If it had been taken before verdict, an amendment might have been made. Again, this, if a defect at all, is one that is cured by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 21, which enacts that, where the offence charged has been created by any statute, the indictment shall, after verdict, be held sufficient if it describe the offence in the words of the statute. Cases cited:

Nash v. The Queen, 4 Best & Sm. 935; 33 L. J. 94, M. C.;

Heyman v. The Queen, 8 L. Rep. Q. B. 102; 12 Cox C. C. 383;

Reg. v. Goldsmith, L. Rep. 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 74; 12 Cox C. C. 479.

Harris in reply.—No doubt a defective averment, as in the cases cited, may be cured by proof, and the objection is too late after verdict; but in the present case it is contended there was no aver-ment at all of any offence. It is not enough to show that there has been a commencement of a liquidation, which is the utmost that can be inferred in the present case.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this indictment should be upheld, and that the conviction should stand. In the first place, as to the case of Reg. v. Oliver and Austin, that is not an authority in point in this case. The indictment in that case contained an allegation not to be found in this indictment, viz., "that before the committing of the offence next hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on, &c., I. Oliver and T. Austin were adjudicated bankrupts, and that they afterwards, with intent to defraud, &c., within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them," committed the offence charged. The objection was that it was not stated in that indictment, in a form sufficient to satisfy the statute, that there was any adjudication of bankruptcy upon the petition within four months of which it was alleged that the bankrupts had committed the offence—the adjudication of bankruptcy being the status à quo the offence proceeds. It cannot be disputed that an adjudication in bankruptcy, or a liquidation by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, is essential to the completion of the offences created by sect. 11 of the Debtors Act 1869, and, as in this indictment, there is no express allegation that the defendant's affairs were being liquidated, the indictment would be defective unless the defect is cured by sect. 19 of the Act, which uses strong terms, or is aided by verdict. There is a difficulty in getting over that enactment, framed as it is in such general terms; but at the same time I am reluctant to disregard the rule of criminal pleading that an indictment must state all the matters that are essential to the charge contained in it. Sect. 19 may be construed, I think, not to do away with the necessity of the allegation of the essential matters which constitute the offence, but to prevent the necessity of alleging the details of the adjudication of bankruptcy or liquidation by arrangement; and I think it is sufficient to allege in the indictment that the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt, or that his affairs were liquidated by arrangement, and that he committed the offence within four months before the presentation of the bankruptcy petition or the commencement of the liquidation. It is not necessary in the present case to decide whether the allegation in this indictment is sufficient upon demurrer, for we are dealing with an objection made to the indictment after verdict. Now, I think that, though it is informally stated in the indictment, yet that it may be implied by reasonable intendment from the indictment that the defendant's affairs were being liquidated by arrangement, and if so the indictment may be sustained. Now, the indictment states that the defendant did, within four months before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs, obtain, &c., which seems to me to amount, by necessary implication, to an allegation that there was a liquidation by arrangement of the defendant's affairs under the statute. That being so, I am of opinion that the averment may, after verdict, be treated as an informal one, and cured by necessary intendment. I give no opinion whether it was an objection or not which might have been taken before verdict.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

REG. v. KNIGHT.

CLASBY, B.—I also think that the conviction should be affirmed. It appears to me that there was nothing in the objection to the indictment after it was proved, that trustees were duly appointed, for by sect. 125, sub-sect. 7, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, the appointment of a trustee under a liquidation is to be deemed to be equivalent to and a substitute for the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy, or the service of such petition, or an order of adjudication in bankruptcy, so that at no time can there be a liquidation by arrangement unless a trustee is duly appointed. Then as to the goodness of the indictment, we must look at sect. 19 of the Debtors Act 1869, which enacts that "in an indictment for an offence under this Act, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged in the words of the Act," very general words. In the present indictment the words of the Act are followed, and the defect alleged is the want of a distinct allegation that there was a liquidation by arrangement of the defendant's affairs. Now, sect. 19 says that it shall not be necessary to allege or set forth any adjudication under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, or, what is the same thing, any liquidation by arrangement of the defendant's affairs. The words of the indictment "within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement" are equivalent to within four months next before the appointment of trustees, which, by sect. 125, sub-sect. 7, of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, are "to be deemed equivalent, and a substitute for the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy, or the service of such petition, or an order of adjudication in bankruptcy." I think, therefore, that the averment was sufficient after verdict.

LINDLEY, J.—I also think that the conviction ought to be affirmed. After verdict it is unnecessary to say whether the indictment might or might not have been quashed if the objection had been taken by demurrer. It appears to me, I must confess, to be drawn in a lax form. There is a marked distinction between this indictment and that in Reg. v. Oliver and Austin, and that case, to my mind, appears to support our decision in this case. It is necessarily implied in the words "within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of the defendant's affairs," that the defendant had presented a petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, which must mean that the defendant was a person who had presented a petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and that a trustee had been appointed. In correct legal language no proceedings for a liquidation of a debtor's affairs by arrangement do commence until a trustee has been appointed. Therefore the averment must mean that the liquidation proceedings had commenced and a trustee been appointed. In Reg. v. Oliver and Austin the indictment said that the "defendants were adjudicated bankrupts, and that afterwards, with intent to defraud, &c., within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against them," they committed the offence charged, and the court held that they were unable to say whether the defendants had been adjudicated bankrupts at all upon the presentation of the petition mentioned. In the present case the averment necessarily involves that there was a liquidation by arrangement. The only other point material to be noticed is that the statute (sect. 11) does not mean a person whose affairs have been liquidated by arrangement, but are being liquidated by arrangement. Construing it after verdict I think that this indictment does sufficiently set forth the substance of the offence charged.

MANISTY, J.—I also think that the conviction should be upheld. Liquidation of the affairs of a debtor by arrangement is the creation of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 125, and it does not commence by the presentation of a petition, but by a meeting of creditors passing a special resolution, and appointing a trustee. The offence charged in this indictment is that the defendant, being a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws, "did within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation by arrangement of his affairs," commit the offence charged. All that is necessary to set out according to sect. 19 is the substance of the offence charged in the words of the Act specifying the offence. I agree with my brother Lindley that sect. 11 means a person whose affairs are being liquidated by arrangement. Then how could the offence be committed within four months next before the commencement of the liquidation, unless the act which constitutes the commencement had been done. As at present advised, I think the indictment is good upon the face of it, but after verdict I think it was clearly sufficient.

HAWKINS, J.—I also think that the conviction should be affirmed. I base my judgment on the ground that the objection to the indictment was not taken until after verdict. If the objection had been taken in time I doubt whether the indictment could be considered good. I find the rule on this subject thus laid down: "Where there is any defect, imperfection, or omission in any pleading, whether in substance or form, which would have been a fatal objection on demurrer, yet if the issue joined be such as necessarily required on the trial proof of the facts so defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that either the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection, or omission is cured by the verdict by the common law:" (Stennell v. Hogg, Wms. Saun. 22.) Now what facts would it have been necessary to prove in support of the charge in the indictment? It would be necessary to prove, first, that the defendant was a trader; secondly, that his affairs were being liquidated by arrangement; thirdly, that he obtained goods on credit with intent to defraud; fourthly, within four months before the commencement of the liquidation. After verdict it must be taken that all these matters were found by the jury, and therefore I think that this indictment is sufficient after verdict.

Conviction affirmed.

MACKETT v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF HERNE BAY.

[Ct. of App.]

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Nov. 5, 6, and 9, 1877.

(Before JAMES, BAGGALLAY, and THESIGER, L.JJ.)

MACKETT v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF HERNE BAY. (a)

Private Act of Parliament—Dedication of lands for purposes of—Proposed roads, streets, and squares—Adverse possession—Injunction.

In 1830 A. projected the formation of a seaside town, to be built on his lands, and a plan was prepared which showed the sites of various streets, roads, and squares, proposed to be made and formed on such lands. In June 1833 a private Act of Parliament was obtained by which the lands described on the plan were made a distinct parish for the purposes of the Act, and by which commissioners were appointed in whom were vested all roads, streets, and ways, then made and used by the public, or thereafter to be made and adopted by the commissioners as public ways under the Act. The Act also conferred plenary powers on the commissioners with regard to the paving, lighting, draining, and repairing of such streets, roads, and ways.

In Feb. 1833 A. had sold and conveyed to B., who was one of the principal promoters of the Act, and one of the first commissioners appointed thereunder, several of the plots of land described on the plan, and on which were delineated the sites of certain of the proposed roads, streets, and squares. Previously and subsequently to the Act numerous houses had been built, and some of the roads, streets, and ways, shown on the plan, had been wholly or partially formed, and had been adopted by the commissioners, but no houses were at any time erected on the lands conveyed to B., and the same (including such parts as comprised the sites of the proposed roads, streets, and squares) were from 1833 to 1867 uninterruptedly held and enjoyed and cultivated as arable and pasture lands by B. and his lessees.

In 1868 the commissioners gave B.'s devisees notice of their intention to take possession of the sites of the proposed streets, roads, and squares shown on the plan, and in 1871 they proceeded to mark, grip up, and stump out such sites, on the grounds that the same had been dedicated to the purposes of the Act by the promoters of the Act, and that they were acting within their statutory powers. On a bill filed to restrain the commissioners from so doing:

Held (affirming the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that, upon the construction of the Act of 1833, the commissioners had no present right to enter upon the plaintiffs' land.

Held, also, that the powers of the commissioners could not be exercised over land scheduled in their Act and marked out as the site of intended roads and streets, until the roads had been made, laid out, and duly adopted by the commissioners.

An injunction in the terms of the Vice-Chancellor's order granted, with the addition of the following words: "Without prejudice to any question as to the right of the commissioners in respect of any such street, road, or way as shall hereafter be duly made and laid out, and duly adopted by the commissioners."

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Bacon, V.C. The case is fully reported 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202. In the court below the defendants, the Herne Bay Improvement Commissioners, were restrained from exercising their statutory powers over certain lands belonging to the plaintiffs, which were described in the schedule, and deposited plans of an Act of Parliament passed in 1833, for the formation and improvement of "the town of Herne Bay," and marked out as the sites of proposed streets and squares, but which had for the most part retained their aboriginal character of agricultural land. It was not disputed that, if the roads had been actually made and the streets built, the commissioners would have had full power over the roads under the provisions of their Act; but as, according to the evidence, many of the streets and squares which figured upon the plans had never advanced beyond the stage of projection, the case of the plaintiffs was that the powers of the commissioners had not come into operation, except as to lands duly laid out and formed as roads, streets, and squares, and adopted by the commissioners in accordance with the provisions of their Act; and, further, that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title, by uninterrupted enjoyment of the lands in question for more than thirty years, had acquired an adverse statutory title, and were entitled to treat the commissioners as trespassers. The case put forth by the defendants was that, after the passing of the Act of 1833, all the roads, streets, and squares delineated on the plan were actually marked or laid out; that many had since been made and become highways, partially built upon, and that there had been a complete dedication to the public; that the occupation by the plaintiffs and their predecessors of the lands in question was entirely subject to the right of the commissioners and of the public to use the land for the purposes sanctioned by the Act of 1833, and consequently that no adverse statutory title had been acquired as against the defendants.

The commissioners appealed.

JAMES, L.J.—In my view of the case, the construction of this Act, is, as to the main point of it,

CT. OF APP.]

MACKETT v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF HERNE BAY.

reasonably clear against the construction of the commissioners. To my mind it is impossible to hold that the Act with the map annexed operated to vest in the commissioners the things which were at that moment de facto sites of the proposed roads, and which merely had existence in the contemplation of the owners of the land and in the imagination of the framers of the map; that is to say, they existed on the map, but did not exist in any other way. With regard to things in that position, I am of opinion that there are no words in the Act which say that those lands are vested in the commissioners. If it were intended by the Legislature to transfer Sir H. Oxenden's rights, or any interest in those sites, to the commissioners, nothing could have been simpler or easier than to have said it in so many words. Nothing of the kind is said, and I am of opinion that there is nothing in the clauses which have been read to us from which any such transfer of property to the commissioners can be implied. The commissioners were a public body, who had no duties except as connected with the public expenditure. They were vested with what is called the police arrangements of the streets and the public places of the town, and their rights were correlative to the obligations cast upon them. There was, according to the general scheme, no right on the part of the commissioners to anything which they did not immediately take upon themselves an obligation with respect to. I am not now speaking of the right to make, but the right as to the vesting. What was vested in them by the Act was any existing road which was de facto existing as a public communication, and any future road which might be made either in the lines delineated on the map or afterwards, in certain other modes or lines. That is to say, according to my view, it must have become a carriage road or footway or passage actually made by somebody or another before any right whatever was vested in the commissioners. Now, as I understand it, there is no claim made in this suit by the plaintiff as to anything which can be described as de facto usable or used as an actual carriage road or footway or passage. Of course, if there is anything in the evidence to the contrary, we will hear it, but the parties will take our views of the law upon that. If that is so, and if there is no de facto carriage way, then it appears to me that the declaration in the decree of the Vice-Chancellor and the injunction granted by him, subject to some modification, are perfectly right; that is to say, that the commissioners have no right at present to enter upon the lands of the plaintiff. Assuming the plaintiff to be by himself or his tenants in such a position that he could have brought trespass against a mere stranger, the commissioners, with regard to him, are in exactly the same position as any other stranger would be who chose to walk on the ground of which the plaintiff was in possession. Then it is suggested that, although there might be no actual vesting of the sites, quæ sites, in the commissioners, still they have power by implication to make the roads along the lines that are marked on the map. It appears to me at present to be utterly unnecessary for us to determine whether they ever had, or, if they ever had, whether they now have, the right to enter and make a road on any such line, because, in order to give them any justification for entering under any such power, if such power there be in the Act of Parliament, it appears to me that they must show affirmatively that they have, in the exercise of their jurisdiction and judgment as commissioners, arrived at the conclusion that the time had come for actually making such road on that line, and that their entry on the plaintiff's land was bonâ fide for the purpose of actually making and constructing forthwith a road in that way. Until they can show that, it appears to me they have no justification as against the plaintiff's complaint. If that is so, the declaration of the Vice-Chancellor that they have no right would mean any present right in the present state of circumstances. The injunction will be very much in the form in which it was suggested by Mr. Kay to the Vice-Chancellor, which the Vice-Chancellor did not adopt, namely, leaving the injunction to stand exactly as it is, but to add these words: "This decree and injunction to be without prejudice to any question as to any rights of the commissioners in respect of any such street, road, or way as shall be hereafter duly made or laid out and duly adopted by the commissioners."

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I agree, in substance, with what has been said by the Lord Justice, and have therefore very little to add. This is an Act of Parliament which is very inartificially drawn. The same words have not always the same meaning in the different clauses, or indeed in the same clause, and certainly there is an omission of very many provisions which we should have reasonably expected to find in an Act passed for this purpose. I think the preamble is not immaterial as pointing to the construction which has just been enunciated. The object of the Act, as indicated in the preamble, is to properly pave, cleanse, light, watch, and improve the roads, streets, and so on, now formed and made, and hereafter to be formed and made; not for the making of any such streets, but for the improvement or proper dealing with those which may be made; and also for the removal of nuisances and providing for a proper police. We are told that those purposes could only be effected by means of an Act of Parliament, and then there is an allusion to a map or plan, which it has been admitted, in the course of the argument, was similar to that which has been called plan A. A great deal has been said with reference to the roads delineated on that plan A, and the effect of the Act of Parliament as regards those roads. In the preamble we are told that the map is merely referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the boundaries of the district within which the powers of the commissioners are to be exercised. If it had any further or ulterior meaning than that, I think we should have had an indication of it in the preamble, and it is to be observed that in only one section of the Act, namely the 31st, is that map referred to; and it appears to be referred to for this one purpose, which would be apart from the general scope of the Act, that all the existing public roads and streets, and those indicated on the map, supposing they should be hereafter made, were to be of the width of forty feet, except those which were already delineated on the map, which would be of thirty feet only. Then the question of the vesting of the sites of these various roads and streets in the commissioners depends, as it appears to me, upon the construction substantially of the 27th section of the Act. That provides for the vesting of two classes of roads, present roads used by the public, future roads, and roads to be hereafter made; and the roads to be hereafter made are divided into two branches, those hereafter made and those hereafter adopted. I think the construction put on the words "made and adopted" by the Lord Justice is the correct one, namely that it points to roads hereafter made by the commissioners or hereafter adopted by them, having been made by any other person. It appears to me, therefore, that the making of the road, whether the making is by the commissioners themselves or by anybody else, and a subsequent adoption by the commissioners, is a condition precedent to the vesting in them of the roads or the sites of the roads themselves so made or adopted. I think that is borne out by the general clauses which point to the pavement and flag stones, which are also to vest, but which cannot vest in the commissioners before they are actually in existence. If this be the true construction of this clause—and I see nothing in any of the subsequent clauses to militate against it, but on the contrary they seem to support it—then the question is, have these roads or ways over which the commissioners have exercised a jurisdiction been made or adopted within the meaning of the 27th section? For the reasons already expressed by the Lord Justice, I think it is impossible to say they have been either so made or adopted. What we have to deal with now is, whether the commissioners were justified in the course they took at the time the bill was filed, or at the time the decree was pronounced. I think they were not justified in the course they took. It may be a question, and I desire to express no opinion upon that, whether they have any power to adopt any other roads or ways; but I am of opinion it is desirable that the injunction should be guarded in the way the Lord Justice has suggested, so that, if any such power does exist or any such power shall hereafter be properly exercised, effect may be given to it.

THE SHERIFF, L.J.—I am substantially of the same opinion; but, in order to explain my views of the case, it will be necessary for me to point out some of the passages that have been referred to in some of the sections of this Act of Parliament. Before I do so, I should like to point out what is the question that is to be determined between these parties. It is not a question whether the plaintiffs have an absolute title to the lands. It is admitted that they by themselves or by their tenants have de facto possession of those lands, and that such de facto possession would give them a right to maintain an action at law, or to support this bill in equity, against anybody who cannot show a better title, either to the possession of those lands, or to enter on those lands. Under these circumstances, it being admitted that the defendants have entered on the lands in question, it is for them to prove they have some title or authority under which they have entered for the purpose shown by the pleadings and the evidence shown in this bill. Now they rely, and must rely, on the clauses of this Act of Parliament, and in the main they rely on clause 27; but at the same time Mr. Hemming has very carefully pointed out parts of other sections which he says show that you must imply either a vesting of these lands in the commissioners, or an authority to do the acts which it is admitted they have done. Now, when sect. 27 has been commented on, I do not think sufficient attention has been given to this fact, that it is not a section which gives any authority to the commissioners, but is purely and simply a vesting section; and therefore, in order to see to what that applies, and under what circumstances that vesting will take place, it is necessary to look to the other parts of the Act. Then as regards the vesting in the commissioners of any roads, we find there are three classes of roads which are to be vested. The first class is, present roads now used by the public; the second class is roads made; and here I adopt the view of Baggallay, L.J., that you must imply the words "by the commissioners"—roads made by the commissioners; and the third class is, roads adopted by the commissioners. That is all that the 27th section provides for, and in order to see what are roads made by the commissioners, and what are roads adopted by the commissioners, we must refer to other parts of the Act and see what authority is given to them. The 28th section has been much commented upon, and I cannot help thinking that, when we come to compare it with the 27th, the 28th becomes pretty plain, and shows clearly that the three classes of roads mentioned in sect. 27 are dealt with in sect. 28. In the first place, by sect. 28, a power is given to the commissioners to make a new road, which would therefore give, at all events, one instance—I do not say it is necessarily the only instance—of a road made by the commissioners; and then the section goes on to say that the road "shall be and the same is hereby vested in the commissioners." That seems to complete that part of the section which relates to the making of the road, in the sense of bringing it into existence, and the rest of the section seems to relate to the repair and mending of the roads. Then, again, we have the three classes of roads: first, the commissioners may amend or repair the road which they are authorised to make by the commencing part of the section; secondly, they are authorised to amend and repair, and so on, the roads which form the first part of sect. 27, namely, roads now used by the public; and, thirdly, they are authorised to amend and repair roads, which clearly must include the roads specified in the map, when made, because they are the only words which would include those roads. The words are, "all future roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other passages and places which shall be adopted by the commissioners under this Act." Therefore, stopping at sect. 28, it seems to me the Act assumes that, even in respect of roads which are placed on that deposited plan, there would have to be an adoption before any control could be exercised by the commissioners over those roads. I think we may pass over the next two or three sections until we come to sect. 31. Is there anything in that section which gives the commissioners authority to enter upon mere land—land merely to be used for agricultural purposes, and upon that land to exercise any jurisdiction in connection with road-making? I think not. Sect. 31 provides for two things: first, that existing roads and future roads, when made, shall be of the width of forty feet; and, secondly, it provides that the commissioners, when those roads are laid out, shall have jurisdiction over them for the purpose of preventing any obstruction—meaning by obstruction, buildings—within a certain distance of the centre of the road.

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS.

[OT. OF APP.]

But in that section, from beginning to end, there seems to be pre-supposed this, first, that before the commissioners can exercise any jurisdiction over these roads they shall not be mere roads existing, as has been rather happily termed "paper roads"—that is to say, roads merely looked at on the plan; but shall be roads, in the very words of the section, "laid out, made, or formed;" and in respect of those there is the jurisdiction given to the commissioners, and I think it is pretty plain that that cannot refer to roads which are being laid out, made, or formed by the commissioners themselves, because they have, under sect. 37, a complete power as regards those roads to allow them to be made of not less than twenty feet in width. If that be so, under what powers can the commissioners claim to do the acts which it is admitted they have done in this case? They say that sects. 32 and 37 do not apply to these roads on the map. Be it so. Then we still go back to sects. 27, 28, and 31. Where is the power that they claim to go on land which it is admitted has not been laid out as a road, and exercise jurisdiction over the road? I cannot see any power at all. But at the same time, as these sects. 32 and 37 have been referred to, I think it right that I should state my view upon them. They seem to me to be sections which we find in most of the Acts of this description. You will find similar sections in the Towns Improvement Acts and in the Metropolitan local Acts; and I have seen them in several local Acts, and the scheme of them seems to be this: It was thought by the Legislature that the purpose of repairing streets, certainly in towns or proposed towns—and I think it was carried out in the Highway Acts, into the country generally—should not be thrown on the local authorities until they had seen, first, that the road was a necessary road; and secondly, that the road had been made to their satisfaction, so that they had not the first expense of making it. Sect. 32 provides that they shall only be called on to declare any road to be a public highway, and I can see no limit to the words "new roads." It seems to me that the words are quite large enough to carry roads on the deposited plan, and also roads not so set out. And with respect to those roads it provides that, where any new road of the width of forty feet or upwards shall be laid out and made, and shall be paved, stoned, or put in good order and repair to the satisfaction of the commissioners, then it may be declared a public road upon the application of the landowner; and upon that declaration being made the commissioners shall take complete jurisdiction over the road and have the obligation of repairing it thrown upon them. Then there is a proviso in sect. 37 which seems to be this, that there might be some particular road which, in their discretion, they might think need not be so wide either as thirty or forty feet, and in that case they are entitled to take jurisdiction over it, and also, although it may not have been put in order and condition to their satisfaction, yet there would be circumstances under which they might like to take it. Sect. 37 enables them to do that. Sects. 33 and 35 seem to deal with a different matter, but at the same time intimately connected with sect. 32; and those three sections seem to provide for this: There may be, and often are, in towns new streets from time to time made by the builders, which are not taken to by the local authorities, and which are left already opened, laid out, and formed in a very insufficient state of repair, or indeed of making. Some buildings may have been put up on the sides of those streets, and those houses may have been occupied; and the scheme of all these Acts seems to be that although the local authorities may not actually have taken jurisdiction over those streets and adopted them, yet that they should have some jurisdiction over them for the purpose of forcing the builder or landowner, as the case may be, to do their duty by those streets and put them in repair. As far as I can see, that is the meaning of sects. 33, 34, 35, and 36, to be carried out in this way, that wherever they find there is a road which is partly built upon but which is not finished, paved, flagged, or otherwise put into good order or condition, whether it be a road existing at the time of the Act, or then making, or thereafter to be made, the commissioners are given a power by sect. 34 to give notice to the occupiers that they wish to have that particular road paved and flagged, and put into proper order; and if, after that notice, it is not so done, then, under sect. 33, they are given themselves power to carry it out at the expense of the adjoining owners and occupiers. It also seems to have been thought proper that they might, even where there are not buildings at the side of the road, have a power to cause the road to be paved, flagged, and put into condition. But then it seems to have been considered proper that the adjoining owner should not be called on to pay the expense, at all events, except in the future; and therefore sect. 36 provides that in that case they may do the work, and they may incur the expense, and the adjoining owners shall be called on to pay their proper share of the expense when from time to time their portion of the road shall be built on. That seems to me to be the scheme of these sections, and again I may say that I cannot find in any of them any power in the commissioners to do what they have done in this case, namely, to enter upon land which is mere agricultural land, and take upon themselves to oust the plaintiffs who, at all events, it is admitted, have a possessing title to the land.

Thursday, Jan. 24, 1878.

LEYMAN v. LATIMER AND OTHERS. (a)

Libel—Calling a man "a convicted felon" and "a felon editor"—Justification, that he had been previously convicted—Reply, punishment undergone—Demurrers—Statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 4.

It is no justification for a libel which calls a man "a felon editor" to show that he had been convicted of felony, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment on a certain charge. His actual guilt in fact must be shown, and also, since 9 Geo. 4, c. 32 (per Brett and Cotton, L.JJ., Bramwell, L.J. giving no opinion on the matter), that he has not undergone the punishment awarded him.

The same holds of a libel that calls a man "a convicted felon," if a jury should find that the libel meant anything more than merely that he had been convicted on a charge of felony at some past time.

Per Brett and Cotton, L.JJ.: 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, was passed, among other reasons, in order to restore convicts affected by it, after they had suffered the punishment awarded them, to their full civil rights and status.

Also (per same judges), demurrers which do not apply to the whole of the opponent's case ought not to be used.

Judgment of the Exchequer Division affirmed.

Cuddington v. Wilkins (Hob. Rep. 67, 81); and Hawkins P. C., bk. 2, c. 37, s. 48, approved.

This was an action for libel brought by the plaintiff, the proprietor and editor of a newspaper published at Dartmouth, called the Dartmouth Advertiser, against the defendants, the proprietors, printers, and publishers of a newspaper published at Plymouth, called the Western Daily Mercury. The alleged libels, two in number, appeared in the latter paper, and were shortly as follows:

"The history of the Advertiser too must stand over. . . its present editor is a convicted felon." This appeared in defendants' paper of the 24th April 1876.

The second libel appeared on the 1st May 1876: "There still remain to be recorded Mr. Foster's controversies with the town council of Dartmouth . . . and the facts regarding his newspaper" (meaning the plaintiff's newspaper) "and its bankrupt and felon editors" meaning the plaintiff. The statement of claim contained the usual allegations of falsity of the libels and damage.

The material part of the statement of defence was as follows:

3. The defendants deny that the word "bankrupt" in the quotation from their said newspaper, in the fifth paragraph of the statement of claim set out, was intended to, or did refer to the plaintiff.

4. And the defendants further say that the plaintiff has been convicted of felony, and was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing feathers.

5. The words in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the statement of claim complained of were and are part of certain articles printed and published in the defendants' said newspaper, each of which articles was and is a fair and bona fide comment upon the conduct of the plaintiff in his public character, and as the nominal editor and proprietor of the Dartmouth Advertiser, a public newspaper, and was printed and published by the defendants as and for such comment, and without any malicious motive or intent whatever.

Plaintiff's reply and demurrer:

1. The plaintiff joins issue upon the first, second, and fifth paragraphs of the defendants' statement of defence.

2. As to the third paragraph of the statement of defence, the plaintiff admits the allegations in such third paragraph contained.

3. As to the fourth paragraph of the said statement of defence, the plaintiff (so that such admission be not in any way extended or taken to mean that he ever was, in fact, guilty of the offence referred to) admits the allegations contained in such fourth paragraph. But the plaintiff further says that he has never been convicted of felony save on that one occasion, which is the occasion mentioned in the said third paragraph of the statement of defence. On that occasion he was convicted of the supposed felony by a court duly having jurisdiction on that behalf, the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Cornwall; and the said court, having jurisdiction as aforesaid, in the exercise of such jurisdiction, adjudged that, as a punishment for the said supposed felony, the plaintiff should be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for twelve calendar months. The said conviction took place several years ago, and the plaintiff, as the defendants very well knew, duly endured the punishment to which he was so adjudged as aforesaid, for the said supposed felony, and thereby became, and was, and has ever since been, and is, in the same situation as if a pardon under the great seal had been granted to him as to the said supposed felony whereof he was convicted as aforesaid.

4. The plaintiff demurs to the said fourth paragraph of the statement of defence, on the ground that, while the statement of defence admits the publication of the whole of the libels alleged in the statement of claim, and the said paragraph is pleaded to the whole of the said libels, and a part of the libel charges that the plaintiff is a convicted felon, nevertheless the said fourth paragraph contains nothing which justifies, or is otherwise a defence to, that portion of the said libel; and the plaintiff also demurs upon other grounds sufficient in law to maintain this demurrer.

Demurrer by the defendants to the third paragraph of the plaintiff's reply.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Exchequer Division (consisting of Cleasby and Pollock, BB.), making absolute a rule for a re w trial obtained by the plaintiff, and giving judgment for the plaintiff on the demurrers in the action.

The case below is reported 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 360, where the pleadings and facts in the case are very fully set out. The facts of the case, however, sufficiently appear from the above statement of the pleadings, and from the judgments which follow.

Cole, Q.C. and Bullen for defendants, appellants. —In addition to the arguments urged by them in the court below, they distinguished Cuddington v. Wilkins (1 Hob. 67) on the ground that, in that case, there had been no conviction, and also subsequently a general pardon, which had a different operation to a special pardon:

Sir Henry Fine's case, Godbolt, 288.

In this case the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3, (a) was equivalent, at most, to a special pardon. The definition of a "felon" in all the dictions—

(a) 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3.—And whereas it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felonies not capital, who have undergone the punishment to which they were adjudged: Be it therefore enacted, that where any offender hath been or shall be convicted of any felony not punishable with death, and hath endured or shall endure the punishment to which such offender hath been or shall be adjudged for the same, the punishment so endured hath and shall have the like effects and consequences as a pardon under the great seal as to the felony whereof the offender was so convicted: Provided always, that nothing herein contained, nor the enduring of such punishment, shall prevent or mitigate any punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any other felony.

aries seems to be the same, viz., "One who has committed a felony."

Collins, Q.C. (Pitt Lewis with him), for the plaintiff, had proceeded but a very short way in his argument when, on saying he was content to rest his case on the second libel, he was stopped by the Court, which delivered the following judgments:—

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must fail; and I come to that opinion on a careful investigation of the allegations contained in the alleged libels, and of the way they are dealt with in the pleadings. I am aware that may seem a very narrow ground on which to arrive at a conclusion, and I do not myself like to decide a question on what looks like mere technicalities, but if I do so, it is not my fault; the law is technical. Now the reason I come to this opinion is because I cannot agree with Lord Blackburn that the whole alleged libel (whether it was rightly for the judge or the jury) merely amounted to a statement that the plaintiff had been convicted of a felony, and meant nothing more. If that was all it meant, I should agree with him that the justification was made out. But, to come to that conclusion, it is clear Lord Blackburn could not have had his notice attracted to the second allegation in plaintiff's statement of claim—the alleged libel of the 1st May—where the plaintiff is called "a felon editor." Now how does the matter stand before us? As to all the facts that it was on the plaintiff to make out, he has done so. The allegation that the statements were "false" it was not necessary that he should specifically make out for this purpose; nor the allegation of damage in paragraph 8 of his claim. The defendants, on the other hand, fail to make out all they must make out before they can win; in the fourth paragraph of the defence they allege, by way of showing the truth of their allegation, that "the plaintiff has been convicted of felony, and was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour." That plaintiff in his reply, paragraph 3, admits; but defendants have not alleged, and plaintiff consequently has not admitted—nay expressly guarded himself from admitting—that the plaintiff was actually guilty of the felony. Therefore, so far as it is necessary to decide the issues of fact, plaintiff is entitled to have them found for him. Now as to the issues in law, how do they stand? Paragraph 4 of plaintiff's reply contains his demurrer, which demurs to paragraph 4 of the statement of defence. As to the first alleged libel, perhaps the demurrer means that it is no justification of a libel which says of a man that he is a convicted felon, to show merely that he was at some time past convicted of felony. But if that is all the demurrer means, then, as to that portion of the libel, I am inclined to the opinion it does not show enough, and should fail. But as to the other portion of the libel, that of the 1st May, I think it is not met by the defence, and as to it at any rate the demurrer is good. The words are "felon editor." Before defendants can justify the words "felon editor" they must show that plaintiff actually committed a felony; to show merely a conviction on a charge of felony is not enough. I was of that opinion in the course of the argument, and I find authority for it in Taylor on Evidence, 6th edit. § 1505: "It has been determined that a judgment in a criminal prosecution—unless admissible as evidence in the nature of reputation—cannot be received in a civil action to establish the truth of the facts on which it was rendered." That is, such a conviction is no evidence of the commission of a felony in a civil suit like this, and, being "res inter alios acta," is not admissible. All the dictionaries, too, that have been cited support this view; therefore it is no sufficient justification of such a libel to show merely conviction. And on the broad ground of good policy, too, it is desirable to come to this conclusion; for, if a man will bring charges of this sort against others, he should be required to fully prove them; and it should always be open to a man, so attacked, to show his innocence, if he can. As to this portion of the libel, therefore, plaintiff's demurrer is clearly good. Then, there is defendants' demurrer. The plaintiff says he has been convicted, it is true, but he has endured the punishment; and to that defendants demur. I am of opinion that defendants fail on that demurrer too; but that part of the libel having been wisely abandoned by Mr. Collins, it is of no importance to consider whether I am right in that opinion. As yet, it will be seen, I have not said a word on the question whether, where a man is called a felon, and he owns that he was prosecuted and convicted on a charge of felony, but says he has suffered the punishment awarded him, he can rightly say, "I was a felon, but am one no longer." On that point, I myself express no opinion at all, as it seems to me to be in the present case, as I view it, unnecessary to do so. If one were to consider it, there would be a good deal to be said on either side. On the one hand, there is the great desirability that a man, who has been unfortunate or unhappy enough to commit a criminal offence of this sort, should, at some time or other, be so far freed from the stigma and disgrace which inevitably follow on such an act as to make it an offence in others wantonly to cast the fact in his teeth; but then, again, on the other hand, it certainly cannot entirely be put out of sight that a part of a man's natural punishment is the future opprobrium consequent on his guilt. However that may be, this, at least, is certain, that lightly and for personal reasons to publish such a charge of another man, whether it be true or false, is an act of gross and unwarranted cruelty. I do not say that was the case here. I do not know whether it was so or not, but often it is so; and, where it is, I should be glad if it could be punished.

BRETT, L.J.—There are two things here for our consideration, the rule for a new trial, and the demurrers; and, as they require different treatment, they must not be confused. Now, on the rule for a new trial, I think the point which Bramwell, L.J. has not decided did arise, and that therefore we must consider and decide it. Now, it is clear that this case was not tried at all by Lord Blackburn; he said he knew all the facts, and if a jury were sworn he should direct them to find a verdict for the defendants. But if a jury had been sworn, and the facts proved as we must take them to stand upon the pleadings before us now, he would have had no right to direct the jury to find such a verdict. What are the facts? The libels set out in the pleadings are published. It is undeniable that their meaning is a question for the jury; but Lord Blackburn, in effect, says: "Whatever they may find their meaning to be, I shall still direct a verdict for the defendants." Therefore, to test the learned judge's right to so direct them, we must take the extreme possible finding of the jury. Now, the jury might find the first libel to mean, "is a convicted felon now," and not merely that plaintiff was one at some past time. And if they had found so, then the same question would have arisen on this libel as on the second; for, on that certainly they might have found very easily that a "felon editor" implied plaintiff was a felon then, at the time the libel was published. Then supposing the jury to have found so, on both libels, how does it stand? The plaintiff does not and could not dispute the conviction. I assume the facts most strongly against the plaintiff; I assume he was rightly convicted, in all probability it was so. But still I am of opinion that, even on these facts, the plea would show no justification, if the punishment had been proved to have been served. After that, the man was no longer a "felon," and he would have an action against whomsoever called him one. For that proposition there is distinct authority. I think Cuddington v. Wilkins (Hob. Rep. 81) is good law, and is distinctly an authority for saying that a pardon, granted to a man who has committed a felony, purges him subsequently of the character of a felon. And the reason is good—it is founded on public policy, which will do all in its power to disfavour men who choose to commit such wicked and malignant acts as these. Searle v. Williams (Hob. Rep. 293) is also an authority for the same proposition; and so is Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (bk. 2, c. 37, s. 48), and a most direct authority. And, if any were wanting, public policy would be an ample ground for upholding those decisions. And since the passing of the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, the case is much stronger against the defendants. It is not true that that Act was passed merely for the purpose of effecting some alterations in the law of evidence; it was drawn up, I have no doubt at all, with these very authorities full and immediately in view, and amounted to a deliberate adoption of that view of the law by the Legislature. I say it was the deliberate intention of the Legislature, when it passed that Act, to put a stop to these unwarrantable acts, and to debar men from continuing to crucify their fellows in this unjustifiable manner. It was felt that such acts were abhorrent to justice and totally opposed to any view of the policy of peace. On the second libel, at all events, this is clear; and so far from the judge being entitled to direct a verdict for the defendants on it, it would have been his duty, in my opinion, if the jury had found it to mean what I am supposing they would have found it to mean, to have directed them to find a verdict for the plaintiff. Then as to the demurrers. As to them I must first say that they are both bad, as being against the spirit, if not the letter, of the Judicature Acts. Demurrers are now an idle waste of time, and if warranted in any shape, it is only when they are in the largest and most general form, and demur to the whole of the opponent's case. But if these demurrers are to be considered, we must take the facts as the jury might have found them—i.e., we must take the libels to mean now a felon. But even if they should be taken to mean merely that plaintiff had been a felon, still the defence is bad, since it does not allege guilt in fact. But if the libels mean

"at present a felon," the defence must be bad, because it does not allege that the past felony was not since purged. To be a good defence it should have gone on to add, "and plaintiff is now undergoing the punishment for the same," or to say that the plaintiff had not undergone the punishment awarded. Therefore, even technically on the demurrers, we must find for the plaintiff. I agree most fully with Cleasby, B., that public policy is all against people who make such unjustifiable statements as these; but, in doing so, I wish to guard myself against being supposed to say there is anything which should prevent inquiry into a man's past conduct and character on a proper and justifiable occasion. There are many such, and in those cases, both in motive and reason, the inquiry is justifiable. But people who will rake up all that is against a man in his past history, for their private purposes, and to gratify personal or professional spite, have nothing whatever to be said on their behalf.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is, as to whether there should be a new trial. Now it is clear what occurred at the trial. Lord Blackburn, when the case was called on, informed plaintiff's counsel that he knew all the facts, and that if a jury were to be sworn he should still direct a verdict for the defendants; and that being so, and there being, moreover, no jury to be got that evening, plaintiff's counsel determined on not incurring the delay and expense of waiting for a jury and having them sworn. But it is not the case that the learned judge was both judge and jury in deciding the matter; he never tried it at all. Therefore the question arises, if there had been a trial before a jury, would the learned judge have been right in so directing the jury? Clearly in my opinion he would not. "Libel or no libel" is a question for the jury, except in the case where it is impossible that the words used should amount to a libel. If that could be said of the first libel here, certainly it could not be said of the second; therefore clearly on that ground there ought to be a new trial. For myself, I should be inclined to say that the first libel meant that the plaintiff had been, at some time previous, convicted of felony; and therefore, on that point, I should be inclined to differ from the court below; but I am clear that the second libel might mean—if indeed it can be read otherwise than meaning—that the plaintiff was then, at the time the libel was published, a felon. That being so, the question arises, what is the effect of a punishment undergone, or a pardon granted? We must refer to the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3, which has been cited. It begins by reciting that "it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felonies, &c.," from which recital it is clear that the section was not passed solely to affect the law of evidence in certain cases, but to affect also the "civil rights" of persons in the position of the plaintiff here. Therefore, notwithstanding its primary object being alien to the plaintiff's case, the Act does entitle the plaintiff, in my opinion, to say, "Having suffered my punishment I am in all respects as though pardoned"; i.e. (on the authority of the passage in Hawkins and the other authorities cited), "I am an entirely new man, and you cannot justify a libel that calls me a felon." The arguments to be derived from considerations of public policy strengthen this view. A man should not make these statements unless he is under the obligation of some duty public or private to do so, and in such case he is fully protected as the law at present stands. In other cases he deserves no protection. As to the demurrers, I entirely concur with what Brett, L.J. has said as to the present procedure with regard to demurrers. There should be no demurrer except to the whole pleadings, and to the entire action; otherwise a demurrer does no good, but only embarrasses. They ought only to be used where the entire question can be so decided.

Local Government Act 1858—Bye-laws—Powers of local board—Pulling down buildings erected contrary to bye-laws.

By the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) s. 34, power was given to local boards to make bye-laws with respect to (among other things) "the construction of new streets," and they might "further provide for the observance of the same by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the local board, and as to the power of the local board to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws."

Defendants, a local board, made certain bye-laws.

By the 3rd bye-law, no building was to be "erected by the side of any new street. . . . until such street has been constructed to the approval of such urban sanitary authority."

By the 32nd bye-law "every person who shall intend to erect any new building shall give twenty-one days' notice to the urban authority of such intention . . . and shall leave at the surveyor's office detail plans and sections," &c.

By the 37th bye-law "if the owner or person intending to . . . construct any new building fail to give the notices herein required, or if any owner or person shall construct or cause to be constructed any works or buildings . . . contrary to the provisions of any or either of the hereinbefore contained bye-laws . . . the urban sanitary authority may, if they shall think fit, at any time after the expiration of the time of forty-eight hours from the service of a notice in writing . . . expressing their intention to do so, in default of such owner or person showing good cause to the contrary in the meantime, cause any work begun or done in contravention of any or either of the said bye-laws to be removed, altered, or pulled down, as the case may require."

(a) Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Plaintiff erected houses beside a new street without giving notice or depositing plans or sections.

Defendants pulled down the houses under the 37th bye-law.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Division), that the bye-laws were valid, and defendants were justified.

"Construction of new streets" in the Act applies to the houses as well as to the roadway.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Exchequer Division (Pollock and Huddleston, BB.), reported 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381, where the facts of the case, the pleadings, the statutory provisions, (a) and bye-laws, which are material to the decision of the case, are fully set out.

The appeal was argued by Kingdon, Q.C. and Petheram (Cole, Q.C. with them) for the plaintiff, and by Charles, Q.C. and A. L. Smith for the defendants.

The arguments were similar to those used in the court below, and the same authorities were cited.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I think the judgment ought to be affirmed. No doubt great power is given to local boards, and therefore we should construe the Acts of Parliament with regard to such powers carefully. My conclusion is that subsect. 1 of sect. 34 of the Local Government Act 1858 includes construction of buildings, and the word "streets" in that clause means the ways and the buildings that are built beside the ways. If we look at the Act I think that is the right meaning. No authority that can be cited has much bearing on this point, except to show that it may mean this. I think it does for many reasons: first, if the meaning is otherwise there is no power of regulating new streets so far as the construction of buildings is concerned; secondly, the word "construction" is properly applicable to buildings and not to the laying of the way; thirdly, the general words which come after the fourth sub-section are favourable to this view of the meaning of the clause. For these reasons I think the first sub-section refers to the buildings as well as to the way. I think the defendants have a right to say that until approved no new building shall be erected by the side of any new street. I can see why the local board should say, "Until we see the street and approve of it no building shall be erected." Another reason is that, until the street is properly made with the necessary drains, it would be inconvenient to have buildings erected. Therefore they had power to make the 3rd bye-law, and that is enough to affirm the decision of the court below. As to the other matter, a subtle argument was addressed to us, that, suppose the local board may make bye-laws for the four objects provided for by sect. 34, and may make another bye-law to enforce these, yet they cannot make a further bye-law to enforce any objects not included in these four sub-sections. That is ingenious, but I doubt if it has any application to the present case. I think, for these considerations, the judgment ought to be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants justify what they have done on the ground that there has been a contravention of bye-laws 3 and 32, either of both or of one of them, and therefore under the other bye-laws they were entitled to pull down the plaintiff's houses. If either of these two bye-laws is good, and if that one which is good has been contravened, they are justified. It is a question as to the construction of the statute, whether the words "new streets" in sub-sect. 1 of sect. 34 includes buildings. In dealing with this question we have a right to consider this Act, and the state of the law at the time of the passing of the Act, and how the Act dealt with the law then existing. One of the sections in the former Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 53), dealing with sanitary matters, dealt with houses, and in its place power was given by this Act to make bye-laws. The intention was to give the local boards a further power of dealing with the matters intrusted to them by the Act. They have power to make bye-laws "with respect to" the different subjects, which is a larger phrase than any that had been used before by the Legislature. By the use of the words "new street" was it meant to exclude houses? If there is nothing to exclude houses, the expression should include them; street, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, includes houses, as Lord Chelmsford observed in Galloway v. The Mayor and Commonalty of London (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. at page 871; 1. Rep. 1 H. of L. Cas. at page 55). For roadway the more proper expression would be to "lay out." I do not mean to say that the word "construction" does not include the way, but it is more properly applicable to the buildings. Therefore there is nothing to exclude buildings from the operation of a bye-law with regard to the construction of new streets, and there is nothing to prevent the expression "new streets" from applying to the buildings by the side of the road. The local board are entitled to make bye-laws with regard to the construction of new streets. Have they done so? The 3rd is obviously such a bye-law, and so is the 5th. It was argued that the 32nd bye-law was not made under the previous sub-sections, but under the general part at the end of sect. 34, and therefore that the 37th bye-law was not one to enforce a bye-law made under any of the four sub-sections. I think that argument cannot prevail; if we look at the general part at the end of the section, it is clear that the moment the local board have made bye-laws under the sub-sections, they may enact provisions as to notice and plans, and that part of the bye-laws may be enforced. Therefore, Mr. Petheram's argument does not apply. The 32nd bye-law is made under sub-sect. 1 as much as the 3rd or the 5th; and if so, the 37th bye-law gives power to pull down houses for contravention of the 3rd and the 5th, and therefore the defendants were legally justified.

COTTON, L.J.—The power claimed by the defendant here is a large one, and before we decide in their favour we must be satisfied that it is really given by Parliament. I have had some doubt, but the argument has cleared it away. I think the 3rd bye-law is made with respect to matters dealt with by sub-sect. 1. The expression in that part of the Act, is "construction of new streets," and the question is whether the 3rd bye-law is made with regard to that purpose. The word "streets" is ambiguous, so we must look at the context and consider the purpose of the Act. We must construe the Act and then see whether what is done by the bye-laws comes within the power which the Act gives. "Street" may mean the mere roadway, but, considering that the word "construction" is used, does it not also include the houses on both sides of the road? The local boards have power to control matters with reference to houses, and by sect. 35 they have power to lay down the line in which buildings that have been taken down shall be rebuilt. There is no power beyond that given by sub-sects. 2, 3, and 4 of sect. 34, to put a limit as to the construction of buildings, unless sub-sect. 1 does so. Therefore I think that in this sub-section the words are used as meaning not merely the construction of the road, but the clause fairly means the houses, which in one sense are part of the street. Therefore we can hardly say that the 3rd bye-law is not made with respect to the construction of the street.

Judgment affirmed.

Metropolitan Paving Act (57 Geo. 3, c. 39)—Powers of compulsory purchase—Costs of interim investments—"All purchases from time to time." Under an Act of Parliament it was made lawful for the Court of Chancery to order the corporation to pay the costs of "all purchases from time to time made," with the moneys arising from the sale of lands compulsorily taken by the corporation under the powers of the Act.

Held, that the costs of an interim investment in consols, and of the petition for that purpose, were included in the costs of "purchases from time to time made."

Re Saunders' Estate (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 681) discussed and questioned.

Re The Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Sepulchre's (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 819) followed.

THIS was a petition for the investment in consols of a sum of 600*l.* which had been paid into court by the board of works for the Limehouse district as the purchase money of real estate taken by the board under the powers of the General Metropolitan Paving Act 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. 29). The only question was as to the costs of the investment and of the petition. The board of works claimed to be exempt from liability on the ground that the Act provided only for the costs of purchases of lands. The provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act did not apply to compulsory sales under this Act.

CHAN. DIV.]

Re MERCERSON'S TRUSTS.

[CHAN. DIV.]

JESSEL, M.R.—The real question in this case is as to the construction of the Act of Parliament. This is the first time as far as I am aware when a respondent to such a petition as this has asked for costs with a view to the literal construction of an Act of Parliament. On the other hand, there are a number of cases in which the literal construction has been departed from owing to the anxiety of the courts to do justice to the parties; but I do not know of any case when the words literally meant that the respondent should not pay costs, and he has not done so. It is necessary to see what the Act says. Sect. 84 enacts that when any money arises from the purchase of land by the board, such money shall be applied under the direction and with the approbation of the said court (the Court of Chancery), to be signified by an order made upon a petition to be preferred in a summary way by the person or persons who would have been entitled to the rents and profits of the said lands, and in the purchase of land tax, or the discharge of any debt or debts, or such other incumbrances or part thereof as the said court shall authorise to be paid affecting the said lands, &c., or affecting other lands, &c., standing settled therewith to the same or the like uses, intents, or purposes; or where such money shall not be so applied, then the same shall be laid out and invested under the like direction and approbation of the said court in the purchase of other messuages, lands, &c., which shall be conveyed and settled to, for, and upon such and the like uses, trusts, intents, and purposes, and in the same manner as the messuages, &c., which shall be so purchased, taken, or used as aforesaid stood settled or limited, or such of them as at the time of making such conveyance and settlement shall be existing undetermined and capable of taking effect; and in the meantime, and until such purchase shall be made, the said money shall by order of the Court of Chancery, upon application thereto, be invested by the said Accountant-General in his name in the purchase of three pounds per centum consolidated or three pounds per centum reduced bank annuities." Therefore the Act directs for two purposes two kinds of purchase, viz., of lands, and in the meantime of consols. Then we come to sect. 89, which provides that "when by means of any disability or incapacity of the person or persons, or corporation entitled to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to be purchased under the authority of this Act, the purchase-money for the same shall be required to be paid into the Court of Chancery, and to be applied in the purchase of other lands, &c., to be settled to the like uses in pursuance of this Act, it shall be lawful for the said Court of Chancery to order the expenses of all purchases from time to time to be made in pursuance of this Act, or so much of such expenses as the said court shall deem reasonable, to be paid by the said commissioners or trustees or other persons as aforesaid, who shall from time to time pay such sums of money for such purposes as the said court shall direct." Now those first words of course apply as a description of what property is taken by the company on which the money arises; i.e., property belonging to persons who are under a disability, so that the money cannot be paid to them but to the Court of Chancery. It shall be lawful, the Act says, that the expenses of all purchases (not purchases of land only), or so much as the court shall direct, shall be paid by the commissioners. Why should I restrict the word? "All purchases from time to time:" why the purchase of consols just applies to the expression "from time to time." That is a literal interpretation and good sense. It is objected that the term "purchase" only applies to a reinvestment in land. Why so? They must purchase consols. The whole transaction is a prolonged method of purchasing lands. This is a fair reading—a literal, and I think a right, construction. Then it is said I am bound by some of the cases, especially by the case of Re Saunders' Estate (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 681). That case is open in the first place to the observation that no reason was given. I do not say that the case is not binding upon me because there are no reasons given. There are many cases, especially old ones, in which no reasons are given. But still a great difficulty is caused. One does not know on what principle the judgment is founded, and may suspect that the judge could not find a good reason for his decision. The same section as I have before me is read by James, V.C. as meaning that a purchase made in pursuance of the Act means a purchase made by the commissioners as well as purchases made by order of the Court of Chancery. I am afraid the Vice-Chancellor's sense of what ought to have been enacted persuaded him to think it had been enacted. It obviously did not apply to that, and it was only his strong sense of abstract justice which made him decide as he did. But I do not think that case is binding upon me for another reason. It is opposed to a decision of a Lord Chancellor overruling another Vice-Chancellor. The other case is that of the Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Sepulchre's (9 L.T. Rep. N. S. 819), in which the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) decides the very point the other way. There is another case which has a considerable bearing upon the question, Re Strachan's Estate (9 Hare, 185), which is a decision of Turner, V.C. Though I see Sir William James was counsel in the case, he does not seem subsequently to have remembered it: it was not cited before him. Re Saunders' Estate, therefore, is not binding upon me. I was told there is a case in L. Rep. 10 Eq., Re Harrison's Estate, opposed to this. But I do not think that case is in the contrary direction. That was a case in which by the Act the corporation was to pay the costs of investments in lands. There were no words which could apply to the purchase of bank annuities. That case is no decision, and the words here do not admit of the same construction. The reasonable tendency of the court has been to make the Act rational and just, not to endeavour so to read the Act as to exclude persons from receiving the costs to which they are fairly entitled. The order will be made as prayed by the petition.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY. (a)

Gas company—Nuisance—Gas Clauses Act (10 Vict. c. 15)—Metropolis Gas Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125)—Injunction.In an action to restrain a gas company from creating a nuisance at their gas manufactory:Held, that the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 is incorporated with the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, except so far as its provisions are inconsistent with that Act; and a company performing the obligations of the Act of 1860 cannot justify creating a nuisance by setting up incapacity to make or supply gas without so doing.Held also, that, even if the company were at liberty to justify themselves, the burden of proof rested on them both by the ordinary law and by the Act of 1860, sect. 52, and that they had failed to discharge that burden by their evidence.

THIS was an action brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Local Board of Health for the district of West Ham, in the county of Essex, against the Gas Light and Coke Company, for an injunction to restrain them from creating a nuisance at their gas manufactory at Canning Town, which is in the district of West Ham.

From the statement of claim it appeared that in 1874 the Imperial Gas Company erected certain premises at Canning Town, and began to manufacture gas there. On the 1st Jan. 1876 the Imperial Gas Company was amalgamated with the defendant company under the title of the "Gas Light and Coke Company," and the manufactory at Canning Town was transferred to the latter. From the time when the manufacture of gas was commenced in 1874 at this manufactory, the surrounding inhabitants have been annoyed on various occasions, more or less frequent, by a very bad smell, which came from thence in such volume and intensity as to be a nuisance; it also affected their comfort and health. In 1876 three occasions were specially mentioned when the smell was very bad indeed—viz., the 20th, 21st, and 27th April. It appeared that it was caused by the escape of sulphuretted hydrogen, which was given off by the substances used to purify the gas when the vessels in which the gas was purified were emptied. They also discharged from their works sulphurous and other vapours and noxious and offensive smells. The plaintiffs complained frequently to the company of the nuisance, but, as they did not abate it, they now brought this action, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants "from carrying on business at the said manufactory at Canning Town, or any of the processes there carried on by them, in such a manner as to cause a nuisance."

By the statement of defence the nuisance was denied, and it was alleged that there were in the immediate neighbourhood of the works sewage pumping works, a tar distillery, chemical works, a manufactory of vesuvians, cement works, soap works, and other gasworks; and, moreover, that the site on which the defendants' works were erected had been selected and approved of by Parliament as a suitable place for the purpose.

Moreover, under the provisions of the Metropolitan Gas Act 1860, and the Imperial Gas Act 1869, the defendants alleged that they are compelled under heavy penalties to supply gas of such purity as is prescribed by certain officers appointed by the Board of Trade, and known as "gas referees." In order to produce gas of the purity and illuminating power required by the above-mentioned Acts, the defendants are obliged to adopt certain processes for purifying the gas made by them. The processes in use at the defendants' manufactory are the best, and, in fact, the only processes known to science for this purpose.

The defendants also denied that the health of the surrounding inhabitants was at all affected by the way in which they carried on their manufacture at the works.

Several witnesses were examined, and it was proved that from 1874 to 1876 the lime which had been used at three other works belonging to the defendant company to purify the gas was brought to the manufactory at Canning Town and shot there. This caused about half the nuisance of which the plaintiffs complained, and the defendant company did not maintain that they were authorised or compelled by their Acts to do this.

During the trial it was admitted at the bar that there was what in law amounted to a nuisance, but that it was of an intermittent character and caused by the manner in which the gas was purified, though the process used was the best that is known. The Acts which affect the company are, the Gas Clauses Act of 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15), the Imperial Gas Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 55), the Metropolitan Gas Act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), the Metropolis Gas Act 1860 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 79), the Imperial Gas Company's Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 352), the Imperial Gas Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 128), and the Gas Light and Coke Company's Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 225).

Kay, Q.C., Aston, Q.C., Bardwell, and B. E. Webster for the plaintiffs.—This company is not a public body in any sense, but simply a trading company associated for the purpose of profit. We challenge them to show, if they can, that they are under any obligation to make gas, or that they are obliged to make it where they do. They have the liberty, which every trading company has, to choose where to make it, and having chosen the place, they must make it in such a manner as not to create a nuisance. Under the Gas Clauses Act, where the Act is of such a nature as to distinctly contemplate a nuisance being created, then, of course, the nuisance is legalised. But there is the onus of showing that the Act is of that nature, and that the work cannot be carried on without producing a nuisance. The decisions have been very much indeed against trading companies who assert that they cannot carry on their work without creating a nuisance and are obliged by Act of Parliament to carry it on, creating such nuisance. The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Leeds (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 583) shows that an authority to do an act gives no authority to create a nuisance, and that the persons so creating the nuisance are liable to be indicted. The Act of 1860 provides for the appointment of "referees," whose duty it is to require the gas supplied to be of a certain purity; but sect. 52 provides that the standard shall be such as can be made "without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbourhood in which the works are situate." Every part of these Acts keeps the rights of the public with regard to nuisance intact. The defendants are under no obligation to supply gas. Sect. 88 of the Act of 1869 provides "that nothing in this Act shall prevent the company from being liable to an indictment or information for nuisance, or to any other legal proceedings to which they may be liable in consequence of any such operations." The case of the St. Helen's Smelting Company v. Tipping (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 776; 11 H. of L. Cas. 642, 650) establishes the doctrine that the great powers which are given to companies, although given for public purposes, are not really given for public purposes, but really to a private company, and must be exercised so as not to create a nuisance. The words of the Lord Chancellor in that case mean simply this: "When you are considering the question of nuisance by interference with the personal comfort, it is quite right and proper to consider all the surrounding circumstances, and in fact the court does not interfere on account of merely trivial annoyance. It is no justification of this kind of nuisance that there are other works in the same neighbourhood which produce nothing like the same nuisance; or, even if they did produce considerable nuisance, it is clear law that another company is not at liberty to come into the same neighbourhood and add another nuisance equal to or greater than anything already existing, and thereby make life still more uncomfortable." Large volumes of sulphuretted hydrogen issue from these works, which is very injurious to health. The emission is not accidental and on rare occasions, but very constant, though not continuous. In Saltan v. Du Held (2 Sim. N. S. 183) there is a definition of a public nuisance which covers this case.

Benjamin, Q.C., Davey, Q.C., A. L. Smith, and Hornell, for the defendants.—We are in precisely the same position as if we were ordered by Act of Parliament to supply gas, within the limits of our district, of a certain degree of purity. We are also bound to make it at Bromley, because we have no authority to go elsewhere. The Attorney-General v. The Conservators of the Thames (1 H. & M. 1) shows that a parliamentary authority to do what could not otherwise be done without committing a nuisance, implies an authority to commit the nuisance. [Fay, J. referred to Rees v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30) as an earlier case on the subject.] By the Act of 1854, sect. 6, we are directed to supply gas in our district if required. The Act of 1860 stands higher than a private Act, because it is a public Act, and certain public duties are imposed on the gas companies by it. Sect. 2 incorporates the Gasworks Clauses Act of 1847, except so far as the provisions are inconsistent with the Act; sect. 6 assigns the limits of the districts, enables the Secretary of State for the Home Department to alter the districts, and creates a monopoly for each company in its district; sect. 14 makes it obligatory on the company to supply gas as long as it is a going concern. It is not necessary now to consider what would be the consequences if the company brought themselves within the provisions of the Winding-up Act. Sect. 17 obliges the company to supply gas where required, and sect. 22 obliges them to light all public lamps where required to do so by the local authority. The Imperial Gas Company's Act of 1869 recites, that under the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, the company is under an obligation to supply gas to the district confided to them. Sect. 44 provides for the appointment of "referees," and sect. 52 provides that they shall ascertain and prescribe a degree of purity for the gas supplied by the company which may be attained without causing a nuisance to the neighbourhood in which the works are situate. If they make a mistake, and order us to supply gas of a purity which we cannot do without committing a nuisance, nevertheless we must obey their orders. We are under a statutory obligation to supply gas, and if in order to comply with the directions of the statute, it is necessary to create a nuisance, we are at liberty to do so: (Rees v. Pease, 5 B. & Ad. 30.) The words of Blackburn, J., in the Mersey Docks v. Gibbs (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 1 H. L. 93), show that it does not make any difference that we are a company established for the purpose of making a profit for our shareholders, and not a public body. The case of The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Leeds turned upon a special Act, and was referred to by the Master of the Rolls in The Attorney-General v. Ockermouth Local Board (L. Rep. 18 Eq. 172; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590). [Kay, Q.C. called attention to the 29th section of the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847, which provides that "Nothing in this present or the special Act contained shall prevent the undertakers from being liable to an indictment for nuisance, or to any other legal proceeding to which they may be liable in consequence of making or supplying gas." In Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas Company (7 H. of L. Cas. 600), an injunction was granted on this section, and it was held that, in consequence of that section being introduced, the right of action against the company was not taken away: (The Hammersmith Railway Company v. Brand, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238; L. Rep. 4 H. L. 171.)] That provision means that nothing in the Act shall exempt the company from indictment, but it does not take away any defence they had before. There is no obligation to make gas in the Act of 1847. The Act of 1860 compels us to make gas in such a way as to cause a nuisance; and it would be inconsistent with the Act to make us liable to indictment at the same time.

Fay, J. did not call for a reply, and, after stating the facts, continued:—This information is filed upon the ground of public nuisance to Her Majesty's subjects. Now, it was admitted by the learned counsel for the defendants that a public nuisance had been created; and therefore it would appear at first sight a matter of course that an injunction should go in terms of the prayer. But then the learned counsel for the defendants justified that nuisance; and their argument was this. They said: "We are under an obligation to supply gas to a given metropolitan district, which is defined by the Gas Metropolis Act of 1860." They said, by the effect of the Act of 1869—that is, the Imperial Gas Act of 1869—we are further under an obligation to supply that gas with not more than twenty grains for every 100 cubic feet of sulphur compounds other than sulphuretted hydrogen for every 100 cubic feet of gas manufactured and supplied." They say further, that under the Act of 1869 they had authority to take the land by which they are carrying on their manufacture at Canning Town, and they said: 'As a matter of fact, we undertake to prove that we cannot perform the obligations cast upon us by the Acts of 1860 and 1869 without creating a nuisance, and therefore we are justified.' Now, I think that to that line of argument two answers—and sufficient answers—have been given. In the first place, it is to be borne in mind, as has been recently pointed out by Mr. Kay, that the General Consolidating Statute of the Gasworks Clauses Act of 1847 contains an express provision that nothing in that Act or in the Special Act shall prevent the undertakers from being liable to legal proceedings to which they may be liable in consequence of the making or supplying gas. It is to be borne in mind that that Act, except so far as its provisions are inconsistent with the Act I am about to refer to, was incorporated with the Metropolis Gas Act of 1860. Therefore, I take it to be clear that the whole of the obligations imposed by the Act of 1860 were made liable to that condition, and that a company performing the obligations of that Act of 1860 could not justify themselves from proceedings on the ground of nuisance by setting up incapacity to make or supply gas without creating a nuisance. I therefore think that the foundation of that argument fails as a question of construction. But, even if it did not do so, I am of opinion that the defendants have not succeeded in their justification. It is to be borne in mind that the full burden of proof in this case rests entirely upon those who say that they cannot do what they are bound to do without creating a nuisance. That would be the result of the ordinary law upon the subject, and in this case it is especially true, because the provisions which fixes the maximum of impurity allowed, which is to be found in the Act of 1869, is in these terms. The Act appoints referees, who are to consider the means to be adopted for purifying gas and preventing nuisance. Having done so, it provides (sect. 52) that the "referees shall from time to time ascertain with what degree of purity the company can reasonably be required to make and supply gas continuously without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbourhood in which the works are situate, and shall thereupon prescribe and certify the maximum amount of impurity in each form with which gas supplied by the company should be allowed to be charged." Gentlemen of eminence and skill have been appointed referees. They have, in the discharge of their duty fixed a maximum, and they have fixed it at an amount which, in their judgment, may be reasonably required without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbourhood in which the works are carried out. This is therefore the judgment of public officers appointed for the purpose, to the effect that this maximum can be attained without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbourhood. The defendants say, and say truly, that in this court the judgment of those referees is not binding, and that they are at liberty to show that the referees have fallen into error. They have accordingly had an opportunity of so convincing me if they could do so. They have given abundant evidence with that view; but they have failed, in my judgment, to discharge the burden of proof cast upon them by the general law, and cast upon them by the particular section to which I have referred. It is not necessary for me to say whether, if the affirmative had been on the plaintiffs, I should have come to the conclusion that the gas might be manufactured at the required degree of purity without committing a nuisance. It is enough for me to say that the defendants, on whom the burden rests, having to convince me, have failed so to convince me. [His Lordship then went through the evidence, and continued:] It follows that I am of opinion from what I have already said that the injunction must go. But there is one other fact to which it is impossible I should not advert, which, in my opinion, is conclusive of this litigation, irrespective of the conclusion I have arrived at with regard to the general process. It is this: From some time in the year 1874 down to about the month of Sept. 1876 the whole of the refuse lime from three other works of the defendant company was brought in barges to the dock upon this land; was transhipped from the barges to trucks without being covered over with breeze or anything else to protect it from the operation of the air, and was then carried from those trucks. It was tipped out on the land, where no doubt it was covered; and the evidence before me to my mind is conclusive to show that that operation must have been attended with a great increase of the nuisance from the works, estimated at something like half of the whole smell and nuisance which resulted from the operations carried on there. Now it is not pretended there was any obligation to do that upon this land; and with regard to that, it appears to me the defendants' case is really an undefended one, and that the suggestion that the injunction should be limited because this Act was not itself connected with the immediate process of manufacture on the land is not well founded. It appears to me enough to justify the injunction during the period in controversy. The defendants were committing upon their land that which is admitted to be a public nuisance, and they were not doing that under any statutory obligation. The injunction must therefore go in the terms asked for; and, of course, the costs must be paid by the defendants.

At the request of the defendants, his Lordship suspended the injunction for three months, with liberty to apply to himself, as, under the general order of the Lord Chancellor, interlocutory applications are not to be made to him (Fry, J.) unless he so directs.

Urban sanitary authority—Liability of—Negligence in executing work instead of and for owner—Public Health Act 1875, ss. 21, 22, 23.

By sect. 23 of the Public Health Act, in the case of a house being insufficiently drained, the local authority "shall by written notice require" the owner to make a covered drain emptying into any sewer which they may use; and, if the notice be not complied with, may do the work required, and recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owner.

Held, that, if the owner waive his prima facie right to make the drain himself, and procure it to be made by the servants of the local authority with their consent, the local authority, in their public capacity, are liable for the negligence of their servants.

THIS was a case reserved for further consideration by Lush, J. The facts appear from the written judgment.

Our. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—LUSH, J.—The question reserved by me at the trial, and which was argued a short time ago, is whether the defendants, being the urban authority of the borough of Batley under the Public Health Act 1875, are liable for the negligence of their servants in the mode of constructing a drain for the plaintiffs leading from their mill to a common sewer, whereby the front wall of the mill sank, and considerable damage was caused to the building. The facts are these: In May 1876 the defendants constructed a sewer in Wellington-street in the borough, and, in so doing, they came across an old drain of the plaintiffs which led from their mill, and which emptied into an ancient common drain which ran along that street. On opening out the plaintiffs' drain it was found to be choking up; and, at the instance of the plaintiffs, and with a view to the future construction of a new drain in substitution for the old one, the foreman of the defendants, who had charge of this description of work done by them, as the urban authority, put in an elbow, so as to connect the drain with the newly-constructed sewer. The expense of this communication between the drain and the sewer was charged to the plaintiffs, and paid by them to the corporation. In the following November it was found that the time had arrived when the new drain must be made. The foreman of the defendants, by whom the elbow had been put in, was sent for by the plaintiffs, and told that they wished the drain to be made by the defendants; and after some inquiries as to the quality and size of the pipes which would be required, and the probable cost of the work, it was arranged that the foreman should apply to the engineer of the defendants for his sanction, and that being obtained should proceed at once with the work. Shortly afterwards the work was commenced by and under the direction of the foreman, and was done by workmen in the employ and pay of the defendants. The drain was commenced at the point of junction with the sewer, and carried up under the street for a part of the way. It then diverged towards and was carried on to the mill under the paved footway, and the trench dug for it, opposite to the mill, was dug close up to and was considerably deeper than the foundation of the building. The digging of this trench along the whole line of frontage at once, instead of opening it by degrees and undermining the wall as it proceeded, was the negligence complained of, and it caused the front of the mill to sink. There was considerable contest at the trial as to whether the line of the drain was selected by the plaintiffs or by the foreman; also whether the foreman had been misled by any representation of the plaintiffs as to the depth of the foundation. The questions put to the jury, which were agreed by the counsel on both sides to be the questions raised by the evidence, were, first, whether the foreman was misled, and prevented from taking such precautions as he otherwise would have taken; and, secondly, if he was, whether, in the course of the digging, the foundations were disclosed so that it could be seen what their depth and character were. The jury found against the defendants; and it was agreed that the damages should be referred to arbitration if the verdict was sustainable in point of law. The objection taken at the trial, and which has been elaborately argued before me, was that the act of the urban authority in doing such work as volunteers at the request of the plaintiffs was ultra vires, and therefore, although the individuals who did or who sanctioned the doing of it might be responsible in their own persons, this action, which sought to charge the liability upon the rates, could not be maintained. Agreeing as I do with the general scope of the argument on the part of the defendants, I am of opinion that it is not applicable to this particular work. It is not like the case put of the urban authority entering into a contract to build a house, or a wall, or to do any other work unconnected with their functions as a sanitary body. The 21st section of the Act gives a right to every owner of property in the district to construct his drain so as to cause it to empty into the sewer, on giving notice and complying with the requisition of the urban authority in respect of the mode of communication; and the 23rd section makes it the duty of the urban authority, when a house is without a drain sufficient for effectual drainage (which was the case here), to require the owner to make a drain so as to carry off the sewage from his premises. It is true that they could not have compelled the plaintiffs to carry their drain as far as Wellington-street, because the sewer there was more than one hundred yards distant from the mill; but if the plaintiffs had refused to do so, they might have compelled them to empty into some cesspool. By some means or other they might have compelled them to carry off the drainage from the mill, so that it should not become a nuisance, and in the event of their not complying with such a requisition, might have done what they actually did—namely, make the drain themselves and charge the plaintiffs with the cost of the work. The conditions prescribed by the 23rd section as a preliminary to the sanitary body taking the work out of the hands of the owner have regard solely to his rights. It is not permitted to them arbitrarily to interfere and do the work at the owner's expense without first giving him the opportunity of doing it himself. But if they were to do so, he is the only person who could complain. The Act requires that the work shall be done by the one party or the other, and surely the owner may waive the option given him by the Act if he pleases, and agree with the urban authority that the drain shall be made by them as if the preliminaries had been observed. So far from this being work implicitly forbidden by the Act to be done by the urban authority, which is the point of the argument, it is precisely the work which they are required to do in the event of the owner declining to do it himself. The objection therefore certainly fails. It is too late to contend, after the cases cited in the argument, that the defendants are not responsible for this negligence. The persons who were guilty of it were the servants employed by them to do this particular work. If damage ensues as the consequence of work properly done, it must be sought for by a claim for compensation; but if as the result of negligence in the doing of it, it is properly the subject for an action. My judgment therefore is for the plaintiffs.

Q.B. DIV.]

GREAT YARMOUTH (apps.) v. CLERK OF THE PEACE
OF THE CITY OF LONDON (resp.) (a)

Poor law—Derivative settlement—Wife—39 & 40
Vict. c. 61, s. 35.

A criminal lunatic pauper was adjudged to be settled in the appellants' parish, in which her husband was born. The husband had acquired no settlement; but his derivative settlement, which his father had acquired, was elsewhere than in the appellants' parish.

Held that, by the 35th section of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, this was a case excepted from the operation of that Act, and that the pauper's settlement was her husband's derivative, and not his birth, settlement.

This was an appeal from the adjudication of a legal settlement between the parish of Great Yarmouth (apps.) and the Clerk of the Peace of the City of London (resp.); in which a special case was stated between the parties by consent and by order, under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

1. On the 5th Feb. 1877 Hannah Louisa Fisk was indicted at the Central Criminal Court for the wilful murder of James Day.

2. Upon her being arraigned, evidence was given of insanity, and she was found by the jury not to be in a fit state of mind to plead to the indictment, whereupon the court ordered her to be kept in strict custody until Her Majesty's pleasure should be known.

3. On the 8th Dec. 1872 the said Hannah Louisa Fisk, then Hannah Louisa Day (spinster), married James Fisk.

4. James Fisk was born on the 9th Dec. 1843 at Great Yarmouth, in the appellants' parish, and is the son of George and Mary Fisk, but the said James Fisk never acquired a legal settlement in his own right.

5. A few weeks after the birth of James Fisk his parents George and Mary Fisk, taking him with them, went to reside in the parish of Gorleston, in the county of Suffolk.

6. George and Mary Fisk, with their son James Fisk, continued to reside in that parish until Michaelmas 1859, when they returned to Great Yarmouth.

7. During his residence in the parish of Gorleston, and before the said James Fisk was sixteen years of age, the said George Fisk acquired a settlement in Gorleston parish, and did not before the said James Fisk attained the age of sixteen years acquire any subsequent legal settlement.

8. James Fisk was not emancipated until about two months after George Fisk returned to Great Yarmouth in 1859, when he attained the age of sixteen years, and he has never acquired an independent settlement, nor has his wife, the said Hannah Louisa Fisk, ever acquired a settlement in her own right.

9. On the 15th Feb. 1877, Hannah Louisa Fisk was in custody by order of the court as aforesaid in the gaol of Newgate, which is in the city of London.

10. On the said 15th Feb. 1877 two justices of the city of London, by authority of the 7th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, made an order by which they adjudged Hannah Louisa Fisk to be legally settled in the parish of Great Yarmouth, on the ground that her husband was born in Great Yarmouth, and directed the appellants, the guardians of the poor of that parish, to pay weekly to the superintendent of the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, to which Hannah Louisa Fisk was about to be removed, the sum of 14s.

11. The appellants have appealed to the quarter sessions for the city of London against the above order, upon the ground that Hannah Louisa Fisk's settlement is the settlement of George Fisk, as her husband James Fisk never did acquire any settlement apart and distinct from his father's settlement, and that the 35th section of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 by its proviso exempts from the operation of that section the case of a wife, and the status of a wife as to settlement is unaltered. The appellants further allege that the Act of 1876 not being retrospective can have no application to this case.

12. The respondent on the other hand contends that, as sect. 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) abolishes derivative settlements subject to certain exceptions within which this case does not fall, the said James Fisk cannot take the settlement of his father George Fisk, which he had acquired in Gorleston, but can only take his presumptive birth settlement in the appellants' parish of Great Yarmouth. The respondent, therefore, contends that the order appealed against was rightly made.

13. The opinion of this court was sought as to whether the order was rightly made upon the parish of Great Yarmouth, and it was agreed between the parties that a judgment in conformity with the decision of this court, and for such costs as this court should adjudge, should be entered on motion by either party at the next quarter sessions to be held for the city of London after the decision of this court shall have been given.

The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) was passed on the 15th Aug. 1876.

By sect. 35:

No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement. If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

By sect. 36:

The provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any pauper removed under any order of removal, or without such order under the provision in that behalf contained in the Union Chargeability Act 1865, before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief lawfully given, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act.

Besley and Poyser appeared for the appellants, but were stopped by the Court.

Poland (with him Mead) argued for the respondent.—Here the criminal lunatic had derived a settlement from her husband, and that settlement, whatever it is, must be her legal settlement, whether the Act of 1876 applies or not. If that Act does not apply in any way, then the respondent must fail on this appeal; but the first words of sect. 35 provide that no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in two specified cases: no doubt the first exception applies to this woman so far as the derivation of her settlement from her husband extends, but that settlement cannot be derived from anybody else. As, therefore, James Fisk acquired no settlement, his wife's settlement must be his birth settlement. By the last clause of the 35th section, James Fisk's children, if he had any, would be settled where they were born, unless they took their father's birth settlement. It never could have been intended to separate children from their parents.

COCKBURN, C.J.—When that anomaly becomes manifest, perhaps we shall have another statute on the subject, and it is to be hoped that it may be more easy to interpret than this Act of 1876. The present case, however, is clearly excepted from its operation, and the lunatic's settlement is that of her husband, as it was before the Act passed. The appeal must be allowed.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BARTON REGIS (apps.) v. LIVERPOOL (resps.) (a)

Poor law—Derivative settlement—Child—Pending order—Quashed order—39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, ss. 35 and 36.

By an order of removal from the respondents' parish to the appellants' union, made in 1875, a pauper's settlement was adjudged to be his father's birth settlement. After the passing of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, this order was quashed on appeal by the High Court of Justice on the ground that the pauper's settlement was that acquired by his grandfather, neither he nor his father having acquired any settlement. An exactly similar order was then made between the same parties, which was admittedly in pursuance of the 35th section of the Act of 1876.

Held that, notwithstanding the alteration of the law, the parties were concluded by the quashing of the previous order of removal; and further, that the previous order was pending in respect of this pauper at the time of the passing of the Act of 1876, and therefore his settlement was not subject to the operation of the Act.

THIS was a special case reserved at quarter sessions, and stated by the parties in an appeal from an order of removal of a pauper, in which the guardians of the poor of the Barton Regis Poor Law Union, partly in the city and county of Bristol, and partly in the county of Gloucester, were appellants; and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Liverpool, in the borough of Liverpool and county of Lancaster, were respondents.

On the 15th May 1877 an order for the removal of the pauper, John Davis, from the respondents' parish to the appellants' union was made under the hands and seals of two justices of the borough of Liverpool, and was duly served on the appellants on or about the 23rd May 1877, together with a statement of the grounds of removal signed by the respondents.

On or about the 19th June 1877 the appellants gave notice and delivered grounds of appeal to the respondents.

The said appeal came on for hearing before the Recorder of Liverpool at the quarter sessions holden in and for the borough of Liverpool on the 7th July 1877, and it appearing that no facts were in dispute, and that the case turned upon questions of law only, it was then agreed by and between the appellants and respondents that the said appeal should be respited upon certain terms not material to be set forth, and that in the meantime the present special case should be stated, and the opinion of this court obtained thereon.

The appellants and respondents admitted respectively the several allegations in various grounds of removal and appeal, which included the following facts:—

In 1795 Richard Davis, the pauper's grandfather, acquired a settlement by apprenticeship in the parish of Bedminster, which is no part of the appellants' union.

In 1809 John Davis, the pauper's father, was born in the appellants' union.

In 1810 the last legal settlement of Richard Davis was, at the instance of a parish in the appellants' union, adjudicated to be in the parish of Bedminster; and Richard Davis and his son John Davis, the pauper's father, were ordered to be removed to Bedminster from the appellants' union. No appeal was made against the order, but it appeared that Richard Davis and his son, John Davis, the pauper's father, afterwards received out-door relief in that parish of the appellants' union from which they had been ordered to be removed, such relief being by consent and at the expense of the Bedminster parish.

John Davis, the pauper's father, has acquired no settlement to the present time.

On the 17th Nov. 1842 the pauper was born in the appellants' union.

On the 30th Nov. 1875 an order was made, at the instance of the respondents, by two justices of the borough of Liverpool, by which the last legal settlement of the pauper was adjudicated to be in the appellants' union, and the pauper was ordered to be removed thereto from the respondents' parish.

BARTON REGIS (apps.) v. LIVERPOOL (resps.)

[Q.B. Div.]

In Jan. 1876 the appellants appealed against this order to the Liverpool Quarter Sessions, when the recorder found as a fact that the removal order of 1810 was never executed, excepting so far as acquiescence by the payment and relief aforesaid was an execution of the order. The recorder held that the parish of Liverpool, not being a party to the said order of 1810, was not bound by it under the circumstances, and therefore affirmed the said order of 30th Nov. 1875, subject to a special case.

On the 21st April 1877 this special case came on to be argued in this court, and was reported as Clifton Union (apps.) v. Overseers of Liverpool (resps.) (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 540); the appellants' union, which is now called Barton Regis, being then known as the Clifton union. The Court held that the arrangement for the relief of the pauper and his father amounted to an execution of the order of removal of 1810, and that the order was therefore binding upon all the world. The order of removal of the 30th Nov. 1875 was accordingly quashed.

The order of removal in the present appeal was made subsequently to the quashing of the previous order.

The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) was passed and came into operation on the 15th Aug. 1876; sects. 35 and 36 are to be found set out in the report of the last case (Great Yarmouth v. City of London).

The appellants affirmed, and the respondents denied, that, at the time of the passing and coming into operation of the said Act, the said order of the 30th Nov. 1875, and the said order of sessions, and the said order of the High Court of Justice made quashing the same respectively, were or one of them was a pending order of removal within the true intent and meaning of the 36th section of the said Act.

The respondents affirmed, and the appellants denied, that, under the circumstances of the quashing of the said order of the 30th Nov. 1875 at the time and in the manner aforesaid, and of the passing and coming into operation of the said Act, and of the said pauper being chargeable to the respondents' parish on the said 15th May 1875, it was competent according to law for the justices to make the order of removal of the said 15th May 1877; and that under and notwithstanding the facts respectively admitted as aforesaid the said order of removal of the said 15th May 1877 was and is a good and valid order of removal according to law.

In case the High Court of Justice should be of opinion that the said order of the 30th Nov. 1875 was not a pending order of removal within the true intent and meaning of the said Act, and that the said order of the said 15th May 1877 was and is a good and valid order of removal according to law, the said appeal of the 19th June 1877 was to be dismissed with costs, such costs to include all costs of the appeal to the Liverpool Quarter Sessions, except the costs of the day of hearing at such sessions. In case the said court be of the contrary opinion on either of the above-mentioned points, the said order of the 15th May 1877 was to be quashed with costs, such costs to include all costs of the appeal to the Liverpool Quarter Sessions, except the costs of the day of hearing at such sessions.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the respondents' order of the 15th May 1877, under the circumstances above detailed, was a valid order.

Charles, Q.C. and Greene argued for the appellants.—There are two questions to be considered: first, whether the order of this court quashing the previous order of removal is conclusive between these parties, who are the same as before; and, secondly, whether this is a pauper in respect of whom any order of removal was pending at the passing of the Act of 1876. According to Burn's Justice, vol. iv. "Poor," pp. 822, 825, and 831 "Order confirmed binds all the world;" and "Order quashed binds the parties;" although "Order quashed does not bind third parties." This is so without reference to the Act of 1876, sect. 36 of which expressly excepts from the provisions relating to settlement in that Act "any pauper removed under any order of removal," "or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act." The quashed order must be binding on the parties thereto, notwithstanding that the existing law has abolished the derivative settlement upon which it was based. This must be the effect under any circumstances, but a fortiori when the pauper is one in respect of whom, as in this case, an order of removal was pending on the 15th Aug. 1876, and in consequence the case is expressly excepted from the operation of the Act.

E. Clarke for the respondents.—The appellants must show that the present order is in contravention of the decision of this court before the respondents can be estopped. The effect of the order of removal of the 30th Nov. 1875, which has been quashed, was merely that the last legal settlement of the pauper was in the appellants' union. This division of the High Court has said that under the then existing law that settlement was not in the appellants' union. Since then, however, the derivative settlement, upon which that decision was based, has been abolished by sect. 35. The decision of 21st April 1877 was given with respect to the old law existing before the passing of the statute of 1876, and is not necessarily conclusive, even between the same parties, under the changed circumstances of the new law. In Beg. v. Wye (7 A. & E. 761) it was held competent to give in evidence the dissolution of a marriage as void ab initio, subsequent to a previous order of removal, for the purpose of upsetting an order based on the previous order, although the previous order had been confirmed on appeal. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That was an alteration of fact, not of law.] It is admitted that if the previous order had never existed this one would have been valid, and sect. 35 now clearly prevents the respondents from removing the pauper to Bedminster, as they might have done under the old law. The 36th section was not intended to protect from the operation of the Act every pauper about whose settlement there happened to be a discussion at a particular moment. At the passing of the Act the order then under appeal was not pending.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this order cannot be upheld, and must be quashed. An order in respect of this pauper was made in 1875, on behalf of the respondent parish, directing removal to the appellants' union. There was an appeal to quarter sessions, and afterwards to this court, the effect of which was to quash the order.

Q.B. Div.]

BENTHAM (app.) v. HOYLE (resp.)

[Q.B. Div.]

Whether the determination of that appeal was in accordance with a subsequent statute or not, it must be binding and conclusive for ever between the parties thereto: it could not have been intended that a settlement should be determined otherwise than under the law existing at the time of an order of removal; and when judicially determined, or not appealed against, the settlement cannot be altered by any subsequent change of the law. When an order is quashed, that decision is conclusive between the parties to the order, although it is not binding upon any one else. As to the 36th section of the Act of 1876, I think a similar distinction may perhaps be drawn. I would guard myself from saying that a pending order is free from the operation of the Act, if questioned by parties not concerned by the order. I would not say that the existence of an order of removal, not yet finally determined on appeal, is sufficient to hedge the pauper, to whom it relates, from the application of the principles of the new law: it is enough that in this case an order concerning this pauper was pending between these parties at the time of the passing of this Act, which of itself would be sufficient to exempt this second order from the operation of the Act. The decision of that first order is conclusive between these parties; but independently of the estoppel, there was litigation pending within the meaning of the 36th section, and the present order must be set aside. I merely add that, if Mr. Clarke's argument were good, and a fresh state of circumstances were created by an alteration of the law, the monstrous consequence would ensue, that any settlement, which has at any time been determined, might be called in dispute, if not according to the provisions enunciated for the first time by the 35th section of the Act of 1876. I think the appellants are right on both grounds.

MANISTY, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. The Legislature seems to have contemplated just such a case as this in the last part of the 36th section. But even without that provision, I do not think the 35th section was intended to alter any settlement determined by an order of removal made before the Act passed. The quashing of the previous order is, between the parties concerned, conclusive, notwithstanding the alteration of the law.

Railway—Bye-law—Travelling by a class superior to ticket—Intention to defraud—8 Vict. c. 20, ss. 103, 108, 109.

A bye-law of a railway company provided that a person travelling in a carriage of a superior class to that for which his ticket was issued should be subject to a penalty not exceeding 40s.; and should, in addition, be liable to pay his fare according to the class of carriage in which he was travelling from the station whence the train originally started, unless he showed that he had no intention to defraud.

The appellant was convicted of this offence, and fined 10s. and costs, although he showed to the satisfaction of the justices that he had no intention to defraud.

Held, upon a case stated, that unless the proviso at the end applied to the whole, the bye-law was inconsistent with sect. 103 of the Railways Clauses Act, and bad; and that the conviction could not be sustained.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the Bacup and Rawtenstall Petty Sessional Division in the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 45, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law, which arose as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Bacup aforesaid on the 16th May 1877, an information and complaint preferred by John Butterworth Hoyle, of the township of Newchurch, in the said county, ticket collector on behalf of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (hereinafter called the respondent), against William Bentham (hereinafter called the appellant), charging for that he (the appellant) on the 12th April 1877, at the township of Newchurch, in the said county, unlawfully did travel on the Ramsbotham and Bacup line of the said company without permission in a certain carriage of a superior class to that for which he (the appellant) had obtained a ticket, that was to say, by travelling from Stacksteads to Bacup in a first-class carriage, he (the appellant) having then only a ticket for a second-class carriage, contrary to the 8th bye-law of the said company, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, were heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present; and upon such hearing the justices convicted the appellant in the mitigated penalty of 10s. and costs.

The said justices, in compliance with the application of the appellant and the provisions of the said statute, stated and signed the following case:—

The appellant is the holder of a second-class contract ticket between Bacup and Manchester, available at intermediate stations.

Upon the hearing of the said information and complaint it was proved on the part of the respondent, and admitted as a fact, that the appellant did on the day in question get into a first-class carriage in company with his daughter, who had a first-class ticket from Stacksteads to Bacup, and that he (the appellant) passed through the Bacup station without showing his contract ticket or tendering the difference between the first and second class fare, namely, one penny.

It was contended on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact, that the appellant had no intention to defraud the company.

By the 8 Vict. c. 20 (the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1843), s. 103, it is enacted that

If any person travel or attempt to travel in any carriage of the company, or of any other company or party using the railway, without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person having paid his fare for a certain distance knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare to quit such carriage, every such person shall

BENTHAM (app.) v. HOYLE (resp.)

[Q.B. Div.]

for every such offence forfeit to the company a sum not exceeding 40s.

By sect. 108, it is enacted that

It shall be lawful for the company from time to time, subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act contained, to make regulations for the following purposes, that is to say (inter alia), and generally for regulating the travelling upon, or using and working of the said railway.

By sect. 109 it is enacted,

For better enforcing the observance of all or any of such regulations it shall be lawful for the company, subject to the provisions of an Act passed in the 4th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for regulating railways," to make bye-laws, and from time to time to repeal and alter such bye-laws, and make others, provided that such bye-laws be not repugnant to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or to the provisions of this or the special Act, and such bye-laws shall be reduced into writing, and shall have affixed thereto the common seal of the company, and any person offending any such bye-law shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 5l. to be imposed by the company in such bye-laws as a penalty for every such offence.

The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company made certain bye-laws, the 8th of which was as follows:

Any person travelling without the special permission of some duly authorised servant to the company in a carriage or by a train of a superior class to that for which his ticket was issued, is hereby subject to a penalty not exceeding 40s., and shall in addition be liable to pay his fare according to the class of carriage in which he is travelling from the station whence the train originally started, unless he shows that he has no intention to defraud.

It was admitted by the appellant that the bye-laws were duly made by and sealed with the common seal of the company, that they were duly allowed and certified by the Board of Trade, and were duly published by the company.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the bye-law constituted by inference two distinct offences and two penalties, viz. (first offence), that of a person travelling without permission in a superior class of carriage to that for which his ticket was issued, where the person so travelling had no intention to defraud; and (second offence), that of a person doing the same thing with an intention to defraud; and (1st penalty) not exceeding 40s.; and (second penalty) in addition to a penalty not exceeding 40s., to pay the fare from whence the train started; and whilst it was admitted that the appellant could not be liable to pay the fare from whence the train started unless there was intention to defraud, yet it was urged he was subjected to a penalty not exceeding 40s., though he had no intention to defraud, and that the words at the end of the bye-law, "unless he shows that he had no intention to defraud," were applicable only to the latter part of the bye-law.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the bye-law only created one offence in which the intention of the person was made an essential ingredient.

It was further contended on behalf of the appellant that, if the construction sought to be put upon this bye-law by the respondent was the literal and correct one, the bye-law had the effect of making that an offence without any intention to defraud which the Act only makes an offence when the intention to defraud exists, and therefore the bye-law would be "repugnant" within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 109, and ultra vires, and that the bye-laws could only be used for carrying out the Act, and not going beyond it.

The justices however were of opinion that the construction of the bye-law contended for on behalf of the respondent was the correct one, and that the appellant was legally liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s., notwithstanding that they found, as a fact, that he had no intention to defraud, and they thereupon gave their determination against the appellant as before stated.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court therefore were—

1. Whether or not the construction put upon the said bye-law on behalf of the respondent is the correct one.

2. If it be the correct construction, is the bye-law bad as being ultra vires, or on any other ground?

3. If the constructions urged by the respondent and appellant be both incorrect, what is the correct construction thereof?

If the court be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information and complaint are to be dismissed.

Beesley argued for the appellant.—The effect of this company's bye-laws was considered in Dearden v. Townsend (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 10); and although this particular bye-law was not that against which the defendant in that case was charged with offending, the judgment of the court applies equally to all of them. There the respondent was a passenger who travelled beyond the station for which he had a ticket, without any intention to defraud; and the collector demanded his fare from the original starting place of the train. Cockburn, C.J. pointed out in his judgment, that sect. 103 of the Railways Clauses Act made the fraudulent intention the gist and essential ingredient of the offence; and if the company, he said, "were by a bye-law to constitute the same facts an offence, striking out the ingredient of intention to defraud, they would be altering an enactment of the statute, and legislating in a sense repugnant to the provisions of the statute." [COCKBURN, C.J.—That, however, was not necessary for the determination of that case, for I see another ground of our decision was the construction of the bye-law.] So here the bye-law can only be interpreted to make the offence depend upon the intention to defraud. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The proviso at the end of the bye-law imposes the burden of proving the absence of fraudulent intention upon the person charged.] To that extent the bye-law may be bad; but, if it be good, it must apply to the whole paragraph.

E. Clarke for the respondent.—Dearden v. Townsend was a decision applicable only to the facts of that case. There are no words in the bye-law to make the exception at the end applicable to any part of it beyond the liability to pay the fare from the original starting place. Moreover this bye-law cannot be said to be repugnant to the provisions of the statute. A bye-law which supplements them, or carries them further, is not necessarily rendered invalid.

Beesley was not heard in reply.

Q.B. Div.]

PALMER (app.) v. THATCHER (resp.)

[Q.B. Div.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this conviction cannot stand, and must be quashed. Mr. Clarke is, as it seems to me, on the horns of a dilemma; for either the last words of the bye-law, which exempt a passenger who shows that he had no intention to defraud, must apply to the whole bye-law, or that bye-law is unreasonable, and cannot be upheld. If, by the natural construction of the language, those words apply to all that goes before them in the paragraph, the appellant cannot be liable to the penalty imposed upon him, because he has shown that he had no intention to defraud. As to the meaning of the sentence, I admit there may be some doubt, but if it be other than to give a general application of the proviso to the whole, then I have no hesitation in saying that the bye-law is unreasonable. There must be a mens rea to constitute the guilt of a person charged with any offence, unless the words are very definite to the contrary. Here, in addition, we have the further assurance that such a mind must be an ingredient of this offence. The Act of Parliament cannot have intended to leave the companies to create offences as they might think fit, when the Legislature itself has taken the initiative, and described the circumstances which shall constitute those offences. Sect. 103 of the Railways Clauses Act makes it an offence to proceed in a carriage beyond the distance for which a fare is paid only if the passenger does so knowingly and wilfully, and with intent to avoid payment of the further fare. It is not competent to this railway company to alter by a bye-law the nature and quality of this offence. If, therefore, the words forming the proviso to the bye-law do not include the qualification contained in this 103rd section, the whole of the bye-law is inconsistent with the Act of Parliament, is ultra vires and bad. A company has no power, even with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to supersede the statutory provisions.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. This conviction cannot be supported. It is not necessary to decide whether the words of the proviso are to be applied to the whole of the bye-law, although I have myself no such doubt as that suggested by my Lord. The bye-law contains something like sense, if the exception applies to the whole of it; but the notion of imposing a penalty in a case which may be fraudulent or not, and adding an indefinite and uncertain amount to that penalty if fraud be established, seems to me to be contrary to any reasonable construction of the sentence. It is not necessary, however, to discuss this, for I think that with any other meaning the bye-law would be unreasonable and ultra vires.

PALMER (app.) v. THATCHER (resp.) (a)

Sale of wine—Merchant—Dealer—Licence—6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2—23 Vict. c. 27, ss. 3 and 4—32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 4—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, ss. 3 and 73.

The appellant was convicted under the Licensing Act 1872, sect. 3, for selling beer and wine without being duly licensed. He held a licence from the Inland Revenue (under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2) to exercise the trades of dealer in foreign wine and in sweets or made wine, for which he paid 5l. 5s. a half year, and of dealer in beer, for which he paid 1l. 13s. 0½d. a half year; but he had no licence either under the Refreshment Houses Act 1860 or any other Act, nor any certificate from justices under the Wine and Beer-house Act 1869 or the Licensing Act 1872. He kept a grocer's shop, and had never been in a wine merchant's business except in connection with the grocery trade; it was not proved that he ever sold so much as two gallons of foreign wine at one time. He was in the habit of selling foreign wine by retail not to be consumed on the premises, and never sold less than three dozen pints of beer at one time.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant was a wine merchant, who sold wine in pursuance of a wine dealer's licence within the words of sect. 73 of the said Act of 1872; that the licence he had was sufficient; and that the conviction was wrong.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the city and county of Bristol, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who had duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

1. At a petty sessions held at the council house in the said city and county, on 10th July 1877, the appellant, Richard Arnold Palmer, appeared in answer to a summons issued upon the information of the respondent, William Thatcher, a superintendent of the police of the said city and county under the third section of the Licensing Act 1872, for that he the said appellant (in the said summons named Robert Arnold Palmer) at Regent-street, in the parish of Clifton, in the said city and county, unlawfully did sell and expose for sale by retail certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, a quantity of beer and wine without being then and there duly licensed to sell the same, contrary to the statute, &c.

2. After hearing the evidence hereinafter stated, which was adduced by and on behalf of the said respondent and appellant, the justices adjourned the said summons to the 14th July, 1877, in order to consider their decision on the legal points raised by the appellant's solicitor as hereinafter stated, on which day they convicted the appellant for selling on the 6th of July 1877, by retail one bottle of sherry without being duly licensed, and the justices inflicted the penalty of 5s. with 12s. for costs.

3. The information was laid under the third section of the Licensing Act 1872, which enacts as follows:—

No person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same, or at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same. Any person selling or exposing for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor which he is not licensed to sell by retail, or selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquor at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same, shall be subject to the following penalty, that is to say:

For the first offence he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 50*l.*, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding one month.

The following sections of other statutes were referred to in the course of the argument.

Sects. 3 and 4 of 23rd Vict. cap. 27 (the Refreshment Houses Act):

3. Every person who shall keep a shop for the sale of any goods or commodities other than foreign wine, or who shall have taken out a licence as a dealer in wine (except persons expressly disqualified by this Act) shall, without producing or having any other licence or authority, be entitled to take out a licence under this Act to sell by retail and in reputed quart or pint bottles only in such shop, foreign wine not to be consumed on the premises where sold, anything in any former Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

4. Every sale of foreign wine in any less quantity than two gallons, or in less than one dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, shall be deemed to be a selling by retail.

The licence of a dealer in wine is authorised by the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, which merely describes the business as that of a "dealer in wine," without any restriction as to the quantity dealt in, except when the wine is consumed on the premises.

By sect. 73 of the Licensing Act 1872,

A licence, as defined by this Act, shall not be required for

(1) The sale of wine by retail, not to be consumed on the premises, by a wine merchant, in pursuance of a wine dealer's licence granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue; or

(2) The sale of liquors or spirits by retail, not to be consumed on the premises, by a wholesale spirit dealer, whose premises are exclusively used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, in pursuance of a retail licence granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under the provisions of the 24th & 25th of her present Majesty, cap. 21, intitled, "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain Duties of Excise and Stamps."

Sect. 4 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 enacts:

That from and after the 15th July 1869, no license or renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of beer, cider, or wine, or any of such articles, under the provisions of any of the recited Acts [including the Refreshment House Act, 23 Vict. cap. 27] shall (save as in this Act otherwise provided) be granted, except upon the production and in pursuance of the authority of a certificate granted under this Act. Any licence granted or renewed in contravention of this enactment shall be void.

In sect. 74 of the Licensing Act 1872 the words "licence," "sale by retail," and "intoxicating liquor," are severally defined as follows:

Licence means a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors granted by justices in pursuance of the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Act 1828, including a certificate of justices granted under the Wine and Beerhouse Acts, and including a licence for the sale of sweets which is hereby authorised to be granted in the same manner as if sweets were wine, and including a licence for the retail of spirits granted to a wholesale spirit dealer by the justices in pursuance of this Act.

Sale by retail in respect of any intoxicating liquor means the sale of that liquor in such quantities as is declared to be sale by retail by any Acts relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Intoxicating liquor means spirits, wine, beer, porter, cider, perry, and sweets, and any fermented, distilled, spirituous liquor which cannot, according to any law for the time being in force, be legally sold without a licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The appellant carries on business as a grocer at 7, Regent-street, Clifton, in the city and county of Bristol.

On the 6th of July a constable, acting under the orders of the respondent, a police superintendent, went to appellant's shop, in which there were several cards relating to the sale of various foreign wines, and pointing to one bearing the following words:

Sherry 21*s.* per dozen.

" 1*s.* 9*d.* per bottle.

The constable asked for a bottle, for which he paid 1*s.* 11*d.*, of which 2*d.* was charged for the bottle. The bottle was a reputed quart bottle, and when opened was found to contain sherry. The sale of the said bottle of sherry was made for consumption not on the premises.

5. The constable, after making the said purchase, asked the appellant if he had a licence; and he produced one which had been granted to him under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, of which the following is a copy:

No. 112.

Great Britain.

Dealer's Licence No. 312.

I, the undersigned, duly authorised by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, hereby grant licence to Richard A. Palmer to exercise and carry on the trades, and to sell the intoxicating liquors undermentioned, in the manner hereinafter described, at a house situated at 7, Regent-street, in the parish of Clifton, in the county of Bristol, from the day of the date hereof until and including the 5th of July next ensuing, he having paid for this licence the undermentioned duties in respect of the several licences to exercise the said trades, and which amount altogether to the sum of 6*l.* 18*s.* 0*d.*

Dated this 29th of Jan. 1877.

J. DRINKWATER,

Collector of Inland Revenue.

Note.—Any authority granted by this licence, which is founded upon a magisterial certificate, will cease if the magisterial certificate is forfeited, in pursuance of the Licensing Act 1872, or become void under any other provisions of that Act: (See 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 63.)

- (1) The spirit dealer's licence does not authorise the sale of less than two gallons of spirits of the same denomination at a time to the same person.
- (2) The beer dealer's licence does not authorise the sale of less than four gallons and a half, or two dozen reputed quart bottles.

6. There were also cards in the shop announcing the sale of ale and stout in quantities of not less than three dozen imperial pint bottles. There were also bottles of ale and stout, as well as foreign wine in bins in the shop, which was otherwise fitted up as an ordinary grocer's shop with tea, sugar, eggs, and dried fruits exposed for sale.

7. After this, on the same day, 6th July, the respondent laid an information on oath before one of the justices for the said city and county, and obtained a search warrant under the provisions of the 17th section of the Licensing Act 1874.

8. The warrant was put in force the same evening, and in the shop about three dozen bottles of foreign wine were found, in the house in upstairs rooms over twenty dozen bottles of champagne, fifty dozen of port, sherry, and claret, and about five dozen of ginger, orange, and other British wines were found, and in the basement seventeen casks of ale, beer, and stout, and 209 dozen of bottled ale and stout were found. These liquors with the vessels containing the same were seized by the police, and were removed from the premises under the warrant.

9. Subsequently the appellant was summoned as hereinbefore mentioned, and on the hearing on 10th July, himself gave evidence, and called witnesses, who proved that a new licence was ready for delivery to the appellant to enable him to sell, as a dealer in foreign wines, from the 6th July 1877, similar to the licence which expired on the 5th July; that it was not usual to renew on the 6th July, and, for the convenience of the Inland Revenue officer, notice had been given to the appellant requesting him to attend at the Inland Revenue office, Bristol, and pay his duties on the 18th July 1877.

10. The appellant had been informed by the Excise officers that, having a licence as a dealer in foreign wines, he could sell such wines for consumption off the premises in any quantity, however large or small; and the justices found he had an honest belief he could do so. It was also proved that the Inland Revenue office was in the habit of granting a wine dealer's licence to any keeper of a shop who applied for it, and informing the holder thereof that it authorised the sale of wine in any quantity, however small, although he had not previously obtained any licence from justices.

11. It was not proved that the appellant ever sold so much as two gallons of foreign wine at one time or so much as one dozen reputed quart bottles at one time; and the justices found as a fact that he was in the habit of selling foreign wine by retail, not to be consumed on the premises.

12. The appellant never sold less than three dozen imperial pint bottles of beer at one time.

13. The appellant was brought up as a grocer from his fourteenth year, and had never been in a wine merchant's business, except in connection with the grocery trade.

14. The appellant would have to pay to the Revenue 10*l.* 10*s.* for an annual licence as a dealer in foreign wines; but for a retail licence, under the 23rd Vict. c. 27, s. 3, he would have to pay to the Revenue 3*l.* 3*s.*

15. He had no such retail licence, and he had no licence or certificate from the justices.

16. The appellant contended that he was entitled to sell by retail foreign wines, although he had no other licence except a "dealer's licence" before described, and that he must be considered as having such a licence at the time he sold to the constable the bottle of sherry, because the new licence was in existence, and it was not through any negligence of his that it was not in his actual possession.

17. The appellant also contended that every person who deals in wine, although dealing at the same time in other commodities, is a wine merchant within the meaning of sub-sect. 1 of the 73rd section of the Licensing Act 1872, and that, provided he holds a wine dealer's licence, no licence from the magistrates was required.

18. And, further, the appellant contended that, having a licence as a dealer in foreign wines under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, he did not require any other licence or authority under the 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 3; and, in support of his contention, he referred to the said statute of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, and to the following documents and opinions of the Inland

Revenue Commissioners, and forming the instructions of the Commissioners to their officers, to wit:

Somerset House, London,
5th March 1863.

Ordered,—That the several officers of the Revenue take notice that licensed dealers in foreign wine are not required to take out a licence under 23 Vict. c. 27, for the sale of such wines by retail, and that they may sell in any quantity in the same manner as they did previously to the passing of that Act. THOMAS DOBSON.

(By the Board.)

Somerset House, London,
31st Aug. 1872.

Ordered,—No justices' or Excise licence is required for the sale of spruce or black beer; neither is a justices' licence required for the retail of wine not to be consumed on the premises under an Excise wine dealer's licence at 10*l.* 10*s.* ADAM YOUNG.

(By the Board.)

19. The justices decided, so far as it was a question of fact and material, that the appellant was not a wine merchant within the meaning of sect. 73 of the Licensing Act 1872, but that he was a grocer, and kept a shop for the sale of goods and commodities other than foreign wine within the meaning of sect. 3 of 23 Vict. c. 27; and that on the day in question he sold foreign wine by retail according to the definition contained in sect. 4 of the same Act; and that his trade in wine consisted in selling wine by retail as so defined.

20. The justices considered that the appellant had a wine dealer's licence on the 6th July, although he had not actual possession of it on that day; but they convicted him of selling intoxicating liquors—to wit, foreign wine—by retail without a licence, contrary to sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1872, because they were of opinion that the dealer's licence did not justify such sale by retail, as he was not a wine merchant.

21. The justices were of opinion that, under the circumstances stated in this case, he ought to have obtained a licence from the justices as contended by the respondent, and were referred, in support of such contention, to 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 4, and the definition of "licence" in sect. 74 of the Licensing Act 1872.

22. If the justices had any discretion as to the forfeiture of the intoxicating liquor seized by the police, they would not have ordered it to be forfeited; but, having regard to sect. 17 of the Licensing Act 1874, they made no order on the subject.

23. The questions of law for the decision of this court were: (1) Whether the appellant was a wine merchant within the meaning of the 73rd section of the Licensing Act 1872? (2) Whether, upon the facts stated, the justices were right in holding that the appellant was not entitled, under the wine dealer's licence alone, to sell foreign wine by retail in his shop, to be consumed not on the premises?

24. If the justices were right in so holding that the appellant was not a wine merchant, and was not authorised to sell wine by retail for consumption not on the premises under his wine dealer's licence, this conviction is to be affirmed, otherwise to be quashed.

On the 17th Dec. 1877, before this case had been stated, J. Paterson obtained a rule nisi on behalf of the appellant, calling upon the justices of Bristol and the respondent, to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up this conviction to be quashed, on the ground that the justices had exceeded their jurisdiction.

The rule was subsequently directed to be argued with the special case.

Herschell, Q.C. (with him J. Paterson and Petheram) argued for the appellant.—This was a prosecution at the instance of the police, and the conviction is opposed to the view of the excise and revenue authorities, who have always considered that the holders of these grocers' licences required no certificate or licence from the justices. No doubt sect. 3 of the Act of 1872 requires a person selling by retail any intoxicating liquor to be duly licensed to sell the same; but the question arises whether the appellant was not duly licensed under the circumstances. There is nothing in this Act specifically referring to licences granted under the Act of 1825, unless, as the appellant contends, they are intended to be exempted from the operation of the Act by sect. 73. Now the words imposing excise duties, of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2, under the head "Wines," are: "Every dealer in foreign wine who shall not have an excise licence for retailing spirits, and a licence for retailing beer, 10*l.*" [afterwards altered to 10*l.* 10*s.*]; "every retailer of foreign wine who shall have taken out a licence for retailing beer to be drunk or consumed on his, her, or their premises, but shall not have taken out an excise licence for retailing spirits to be so drunk or consumed, 4*l.* 4*s.*; every retailer of foreign wine who shall have taken out excise licences for retailing beer and spirits respectively, to be so drunk or consumed, 2*l.* 2*s.*" A dealer in foreign wines with a licence from the Inland Revenue Commissioners under this Act might, until the passing of the Act of 1872, even if he carried on any other business, sell foreign wines in any quantity, whether large or small, provided they were not consumed on the premises. The first sub-section of sect. 73 of the Act of 1872 can only refer to this licence; and although the words "wine merchant" may not perhaps accurately represent a retail dealer, it cannot be supposed that they mean to exclude persons who carry on any other trade, and to refer only to a person who, when the Legislature comes to allude to a person similarly situated with respect to the sale of spirits in the following sub-section, is described as "a wholesale [spirit] dealer whose premises are exclusively used for the sale of intoxicating liquors." Sect. 68 contains a regulation as to the retail licences of wholesale spirit dealers which does not apply to wine dealers. There is nothing in the Refreshment Houses Act 1860, which touches the particular licence which the appellant holds.

Charles, Q.C. (with him Greene) for the respondent.—The interpretation of sect. 73 of the Act of 1872 should be considered with reference to the double object of legislation in respect of licensing. The Act of 1825 had revenue only for its object, and the Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), which, for the sake of order, placed the retail trade under the control of the justices, did not touch wine dealers' and retailers' licences under the previous Act. In 1860 facilities for retail licences, without regard to the justices, were further increased; but retail licences were more strictly limited and defined, and even a wholesale dealer was, by the Refreshment Houses Act of that year, required to have a separate retail licence, if he sold foreign wine in less quantity than two gallons or one dozen reputed quart bottles at one time. This, no doubt, is not the view of the revenue authorities, but it is the necessary meaning of the 3rd section, supported by other provisions in the same Act. If this be so, sect. 4 of the Act of 1869 must include all persons, even if they have wine dealers' licences, who sell by retail; and a justice's certificate thereby became a condition precedent to the due licensing of such sale. The meaning of sect. 73, sub-sect. 1, is explained by this interpretation of the previous Acts; it was not intended by that Act to make any alteration in those licences under which persons, having shops for other commodities, sold wine by retail for consumption away from the shops. Those licences were to continue subject to the certificate of justices, but relief was given to persons selling intoxicating liquors only, who, with a dealer's licence under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, were compelled to obtain a further licence, under the Act of 1860, to sell a sample bottle or any retail quantity. Such persons are accurately described as wine merchants who sell wine by retail in pursuance of a wine dealer's licence granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the words used in the first sub-section of sect. 73. And even if the words "wine merchant" in this sub-section were not intended to have this restricted limitation, it cannot be that they should have been used for the purpose of describing a person who, like the appellant, has never sold more than two gallons of wine at a time, and whose habit it is to sell by retail. The words can only refer to a person whose primary business, at all events, is that of a wine merchant, not to one who finds it convenient to sell odd bottles of wine as a secondary part of his trade in groceries.

Poland appeared on behalf of the justices to show cause against the rule for certiorari.—He followed in support of the respondent's argument, and further contended that, even if the conviction were quashed, the court should in their discretion discharge the rule for certiorari with costs, the justices, as he submitted, having fulfilled their duty in stating the case.

Greene, for the respondent, also asked to have the rule discharged with costs in any event.

J. Paterson, for the appellant, pointed out that the case was stated only after the rule was granted, and five months had then elapsed since the conviction and the arbitrary seizure of the appellant's stock.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This case has been the subject of a most exhaustive argument, but the whole matter for our consideration lies in a nutshell. We have only to look at what the Legislature says in this Licensing Act of 1872, and we have nothing to do with what may be inferred as to its intentions beyond its words. The Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, provides licences for dealers and retailers in foreign wines; and it seems that a dealer with a 10*l.* licence, whether his trade was limited to intoxicating liquors or not, might sell a quantity however small, provided it was not consumed on the premises. This was admittedly the law until the passing of the Act of 1860, sect. 3 of which gives a person keeping a shop or licensed as a dealer in wine, a right to a licence of three guineas a year to sell in reputed quart or pint bottles foreign wine not to be consumed on the premises. This looks at first sight as if it was intended to make a licence under this Act necessary even for a wine dealer in order to enable him to sell by retail. It is true that at first the section seems capable of a double construction; but I do not think the existing rights of a dealer would be taken away by any such mere inference from the words employed. My view is, that a man holding a dealer's licence at that time was by that provision to be thenceforth entitled to give up his 10l. licence and sell by retail in pints and quarts under a 3l. 3s. licence created by that Act. This construction of the Act of 1860 would leave a dealer with a 10l. licence under the Act of 1825 in the same position as before, if he chose to continue that licence; and that was his position at the time of the passing of the Act of 1869, which by the 4th section requires a licence for the sale by retail of wine, under certain recited Acts, to be granted only upon a justices' certificate. Now amongst these recited Acts is the Refreshment Houses Act 1860, but not the Excise Act of 1825; the 10l. dealer therefore was not touched by this Act of 1869, and he continued to have, when the Act of 1872 came to be passed, the same position as he had from the year 1825. This being so, it becomes necessary to consider whether since the Act of 1872 the appellant has been duly licensed under the 3rd section. No doubt the object of that Act, and also the previous one of 1869, was to extend the authority of the justices over the granting of licences; but we must observe the limits to which their authority has been extended, and we find not only that the interpretation of the word "licence" omits any reference to this Act of 1825, but also that sect. 73 expressly provides that a licence as defined by the Act shall not be required for the sale of wine by retail not to be consumed on the premises by a wine merchant in pursuance of a wine dealer's licence granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. It has been said that this exception was intended to apply only to a person who is a wine merchant in the restricted sense of one who carries on exclusively a trade in intoxicating liquors; but it seems to me that in words the section exempts from the operation of the Act everybody having a wine dealer's licence. I think the construction put by the Excise Commissioners upon these two Acts of 1860 and 1872 was the right one; licensed dealers were not required by the Act of 1860 to take out retail licences in order to sell by retail, and no justices' licence is required by the Act of 1872 for the retail of wine not to be consumed on the premises under an excise wine dealer's licence at 10l. 10s. The magistrates were wrong, and the conviction will be quashed. As to the certiorari which was obtained by the appellant whilst this case was pending, I think that in the exercise of our discretion the rule should not be made absolute; but as five months were allowed to elapse before the magistrates stated the case, and they seem to have unnecessarily granted a seizure of all the appellant's stock by their warrant, we refuse to allow their costs.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion on both matters. It can scarcely be contended that the appellant would not have been a wine merchant before the Act of 1860, even although he was also a grocer, and he is not less a wine merchant now because he can retail wines without a further retail licence.

REG. v. ALCOCK; Ex parte CHILTON. (a)

Justice of the peace—Disqualification by interest—Epping Forest Commissioners—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52—35 & 36 Vict. c. 95, s. 3.

The applicant, a commoner of Epping Forest, who objected to the proceedings of the Corporation of London as owners of the forest, removed and destroyed their notice boards and gave them warning that he should remove their fences and other obstructions. The corporation promptly commenced an action against him and obtained an injunction to restrain him from carrying out his threats. They also summoned him under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52 for destroying their boards. At the hearing of the summons before two justices, the applicant objected to one of them on the ground that he was disqualified by interest in adjudicating on the summons. This justice had made an affidavit on behalf of the corporation in the said action, in which he stated that he was a commoner, and that the corporation had by their proceedings rendered the forest better fitted for the use of the commoners and the public. The applicant also objected that no leave of the Epping Forest Commissioners had been obtained under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 95, s. 3 for this prosecution. The justices overruled these objections and convicted the applicant.

Held, upon a rule for certiorari, that the justice was not disqualified from adjudicating on this summons; that no leave of the commissioners was required for a criminal prosecution; and that the conviction was right.

On the 24th Jan. Tindal Atkinson, on behalf of John Chilton the younger, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the Corporation of London and the Justices of Essex to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up and quash a conviction of the said John Chilton by the said justices on the prosecution of the said corporation for doing malicious injury to property belonging to the said corporation under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52. The rule was granted on two grounds, viz., that one of the convicting justices was disqualified by interest; and that no leave had been obtained from the Epping Forest Commissioners under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 95, s. 3, before these proceedings were commenced.

The rule was applied for on the further ground that the said John Chilton did the acts with which he was charged as a bona fide claim of a reasonable right; but on this ground the rule was not granted.

On the 4th Dec. 1877 the said John Chilton appeared, and the said summons came on to be heard before two Essex justices, to one of whom, Charles Alcock, Esq., the said John Chilton's solicitor objected, on the ground that he was an interested party; the solicitor maintained, therefore, that the said Charles Alcock was disqualified from hearing and determining the said summons.

This objection was founded on the fact that the said Charles Alcock had made an affidavit on behalf of the said corporation in an action in the Chancery Division to restrain the defendant from doing threatened damage.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

Powell, Q.C. and Edwyn Jones appeared for the Corporation of London and showed cause against the rule.—Mr. Alcock was not in any way interested in the property injured, or at all events not so interested as to entertain any bias against the defendant Chilton with respect to these proceedings. Indeed, the bias of the magistrate, if any, would necessarily be in favour of the defendant, their interests being exactly the same, as commoners. The fact that a magistrate has given evidence in another matter against a person charged before him, or expressed an opinion about the policy of his proceedings, has never been considered sufficient to oust the magistrate's jurisdiction. As to the second ground for the rule, it cannot be maintained that sect. 3 of the Act of 1872 has any application to criminal proceedings. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is nothing in the Act to support such a contention.]

E. Clarke, for Mr. Alcock, followed on the same side.

J. O. Griffiths, Q.C. and Tindal Atkinson argued in support of the rule.—It must be borne in mind that this is a matter which might have been determined by a single justice under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52; and the words of the proviso to that section are: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of." [COCKBURN, C.J.—But the rule is not granted on that ground.] It is, however, important with reference to the interest of the justice. The rule with regard to the disqualification of a justice by interest was considered in Reg. v. Meyer (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 173), where Blackburn, J. said (p. 177): "The question is, was Mr. Meyer really substantially interested, though not in a pecuniary sense, in the proceedings as to which these informations were one step, so as to be likely to have a real bias in the matter?" He afterwards referred to a previous case in which the court said, "that we must not be understood to say that where there is a real bias this court would not interfere." He proceeded: "In the present case there is such a real bias. Mr. Meyer was sitting as a judge in an information arising out of a matter in which he was a litigant party with the defendant; and although he states he took no part in the conviction, yet he clearly ought not to have been on the bench; and we have no doubt that the rule must be made absolute." Here, if not an actual litigant, one of the justices who took an active part in the conviction had, just before the hearing, made an affidavit in behalf of the plaintiff in an action by the prosecutor against the defendant in respect of the same matter as that upon which the prosecution was based. The community of interest between the justice and the defendant does not lessen the disqualification.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The only question, for us is, whether one of these two convicting magistrates was disqualified by interest from adjudicating upon the charge against the defendant. The interest, such as it was, was that of a commoner with rights over the waste of Epping Forest, and was exactly the same in the magistrate and in the defendant. They had an identity of interest, and therefore the tendency to bias, if it existed, would naturally be in the defendant's favour. But it is said the magistrate, as appears from his affidavit in the Chancery suit, takes a view opposite to that of the defendant as to the corporation proceedings, which are avowedly in the commoners' interests. It is contended that therefore the magistrate is disqualified by his interest from adjudicating in a matter in which the defendant is concerned. It is preposterous to suppose that any one in the position of a magistrate would be biased in his administration of justice by the mere expression of his views as to what is for the advantage of a defendant's interests. There is not in this case the slightest appearance of a tendency to bias. There is no authority for saying that an expressed opinion is sufficient to oust a magistrate's jurisdiction. This seems to me to be but a sorry squabble; if a question of right be really desired to be raised, it should be done without violence, and in a dignified manner. The rule will be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two points to be considered, one as to the magistrate's interest, the other as to the leave of the commissioners. The second point has not been seriously argued, and indeed it is impossible to maintain that there was any intention in the Act of 1872 to interfere with criminal charges arising within or in respect of Epping Forest. The other point must be decided equally against the defendant. Both he and the magistrate are commoners, but his rights of common were not injured by the erection of these notice-boards, nor were the magistrate's rights injured by their being knocked down. The demolition of so many as twenty-three posts was certainly evidence of malice, and sufficient in my opinion to justify the exclusion of defendant's claim of right. The only remaining interest in Mr. Alcock is that suggested on the ground of his affidavit; but I know of no reason for saying that the expression of a man's opinion on any subject should render him unfit to adjudicate upon it. I agree with the case of Reg. v. Meyer, which has been cited, but I fail to see its application here. It must be necessary or probable that his interest in the subject matter of his adjudication should bias the magistrates in order to disqualify him.

2nd July, and served till the 1st Aug. He was then obliged by illness to be absent till the 2nd Sept., when he tendered his services, which were refused. He had in the meantime received on the 20th Aug. a letter from the defendants terminating the engagement. In an action brought by him for wages from the 1st Aug. to the 20th Sept., it was Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to wages for that period, and that it was no answer to his claim that the illness was caused by an act of misconduct on his part, which occurred before the contract, and which he did not know, at the time of the contract, would lead to his illness, and render him incapable of performing his work.

THIS was an action brought in the Lord Mayor's Court of London by the plaintiff, who was a mercantile clerk, to recover the sum of 16l. 13s. 4d., alleged to be due to him from the defendants, his employers, and the particulars stated the claim to be for the amount of his wages and salary at 120l. a year, from the 1st Aug. to the 20th Sept. 1877, according to an agreement between them dated the 27th June 1877. The plaintiff had been employed under that agreement at the above-mentioned salary of 120l., subject to increase in events which did not occur, and the employment was to be determinable on either side by one month's notice. He served under the contract from the 2nd until the 30th July, when he was unwell. He obtained the permission of his employers to absent himself from work until the 6th Aug. He remained away, however, and was under medical treatment, and was unable to return to his employment until the first week in September, when he returned and tendered his services, which the defendants refused; and they had moreover, in the meantime, namely, on the 20th Aug., given him notice, by letter of that date, terminating the employment, and stating that, as they could not do without a clerk to fill his place, they had engaged another person. They refused to pay him the amount claimed by him for wages during his absence, on the ground that he had, by his own misconduct, rendered himself incapable of performing his duties, and therefore was not entitled to any remuneration. The illness under which the plaintiff was suffering arose from venereal disease. The learned Common Serjeant of the City of London nonsuited the plaintiff, but a rule was afterwards obtained on his behalf calling upon the defendants to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff for the sum claimed, on the ground that there was no evidence at the trial in support of the defendants' plea.

The defendants' pleas were as follows:—First, denying that they agreed as alleged. Second, that the defendants were always ready and willing to continue to employ the plaintiff in the capacity of clerk until the plaintiff misconducted himself as hereinafter mentioned. Yet the plaintiff wrongfully absented himself from the defendants' service for a long and unreasonable time, namely, for three weeks or thereabouts, without any just, sufficient, or reasonable cause or excuse for such absence, and without the consent and against the will of the defendants, whereby the defendants were greatly delayed and injured in respect of divers matters and businesses in which they would otherwise have employed the plaintiff in his capacity aforesaid, and were forced to procure another person to serve them in the capacity aforesaid in place and stead of the plaintiff; and thereupon it became and was lawful and necessary for the defendants to discharge and dismiss the plaintiff from their service, and thereupon the defendants refused to suffer the plaintiff to continue in their employ, and discharged him therefrom, being the supposed breach. Third, that the plaintiff was not during any part of the time for and in respect of which wages are claimed ready and willing to render, and did not in fact during any part of such time render, to the defendants the alleged agreed or any services. Fourth, never indebted as alleged.

The following is a copy of the notes of the judge taken at the trial:

The plaintiff on being examined said: On the 2nd July I entered the defendants' service at 120l. a year and a month's notice. Towards the end of July I told my employers that I must consult a doctor, and they expressed their sympathy. On the 2nd Aug. I was ordered by my doctor to remain at home, but went on the 7th, 11th, and 14th in a cab to see my doctor, and on two of these occasions I called and told defendants, and they said, "We hope you will soon get better." Afterwards, on the 15th Aug., I wrote and told them I had to undergo an operation. On the 20th Aug. I got a letter (produced) terminating the agreement. I answered it the same day, and got an answer on the 21st Aug. On the 24th Aug. I wrote again, saying my doctor insisted on my going to the seaside. This letter was answered on the 2nd Sept. I called and offered my services for the remainder of the period of notice.

Cross-examined.—I served until 30th July, then I went away until 2nd Sept. My illness was originally caused by my own imprudence.

Re-examined.—I cannot trace the cause, but it occurred in the middle of June.

George Lichtenberg, surgeon to the German Hospital, said: I saw plaintiff towards the end of July, his glands were swollen, I advised his remaining at home, and on the 24th Aug. I sent him to the seaside.

Cross-examined.—The ailment arose from venereal disease.

The plaintiff was nonsuited, but leave was given him to move to enter the verdict for 16l. 13s. 4d.

THOMAS CHAMBERS.

Reed now showed cause on behalf of the defendants, and contended that in a contract of service capacity to serve is a condition precedent to the right to sue, and there is no right to sue unless the service is performed, or the inability to perform it arises otherwise than through the plaintiff's own act or default, as, for instance, by accident or the act of God. Even if the defendants did not know at the time they dismissed him that he had himself put it out of his power to serve, they may rely on that defence at the trial. See Spotswood v. Barrow (5 Ex. 110; 19 L. J. 226, Ex.) If the plaintiff put it out of his own power and rendered himself unable to continue his services, the defendants were at liberty to rescind the contract, or to sue for a breach of it. It seems to be assumed in all the cases that, though temporary illness which arises through the act of God is an excuse for the non-performance of services, the servant would not be excused where it arises, as it did in the present case, through his own misconduct. [HAWKINS, J.—The misconduct of the plaintiff in the present case occurred before the contract.] The incapacity to work followed immediately upon, and could be traced to, the misconduct. In Cuckson v. Stones (28 L. J. 25, Q. B.; 1 El. & El. 248), a plea similar to that in the present case was held good, Lord Campbell, C.J. there saying: "The plea is that the plaintiff was not, during any part of the time for and in respect of which such wages are claimed, ready and willing or able to render, and did not, in fact, during any part of such time render the agreed or any service! We think the gist of the plea is that the plaintiff, during the time in question, was not ready and willing to render, and did not render, any service in the sense that he voluntarily or wilfully refused or omitted to serve. If so, he could not claim his wages in consideration of his service, for the breach goes to the whole consideration. He could recover if he were ready and willing to serve, if he had been able to do so and was only temporarily prevented by the visitation of God." So in Boast v. Firth (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 264; L. Rep. 4. C. P. 1; 38 L. J. 1, C. P.), the learned judges (M. Smith and Brett, JJ.) confine the cases where illness excuses performance to those in which the illness is caused by the visitation of God. No doubt a temporary illness without the servant's own default would not suspend his right to wages, or constitute a breach of contract. But here this is not such a case, for the illness was caused by the plaintiff's own act, not to put it even as his own misconduct. In fact, all the cases support the proposition that to excuse performance the illness must arise without any default on the servant's part. The defendants were entitled to dismiss him the moment he absented himself beyond the six days' leave, as it was then equivalent to intentional absence, which, together with the moral misconduct, justified the dismissal. He cited also

Chandler v. Grieves, 2 H. Bl. 666 (note);

Glyn, for the plaintiff, contra, submitted that the defence was not raised by the plea. The misconduct alleged in the second plea is that the plaintiff absented himself for an unreasonable time without a sufficient or reasonable cause. His illness which came upon him unexpectedly is a reasonable cause, and the plea set up by the defendants is no answer to the plaintiff's claim. [He was here stopped by the Court.]

CLEASBY, B.—Some little difficulty has arisen here owing to the form of the pleading. The plaintiff in this case entered into the service of the defendants and was employed by them under an agreement by which he was to be paid a salary of 120*l.* per annum, and by the agreement he was to have one month's notice in case of dismissal. The plaintiff entered upon his duties on the 2nd July, and there is nothing to show that, at the time he entered into the agreement and subsequently thereto upon his duties under it, he concealed from his employers anything which he ought to have disclosed, or that he knew that he would not be able to perform his duties in the defendants' service. Therefore the contract is not tainted by a knowledge on his part of any circumstances which would render him unable to perform it. After a month's service illness supervened, and the plaintiff was unable to continue his attendance at the defendants' office. The question is whether or not illness is such an excuse as to disentitle him to recover wages during his absence from the employment in consequence of it. I think, prima facie, illness is to be attributed to the act of God, and we are not justified in going back for any length of time, and entering into an investigation as to what may have been the cause of it. We ought not, I think, to extend the effect of disability arising from illness. The illness which rendered him unable to perform his duties for a time came upon him unexpectedly, and we cannot go back to first causes and into the question of how it arose. The maxim "causa proxima non remota spectatur" is applicable here. As to how precisely the disease arose, there may be various different opinions, and there might be the greatest uncertainty as to the cause or matter which originally brought it about. It was a misfortune which could not have been foreseen at the time the contract was made, and I think the plaintiff is entitled to say that it is a reasonable excuse for his absence from his duties, and that our judgment should be given for the plaintiff, setting aside the nonsuit, and entering the verdict for him for the 16*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, the amount of damages claimed by him in this action.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the plaintiff had been aware, at the time of the making of the contract, that he would be incapacitated by illness from performing his duties, I am not prepared to say that he could recover in this action. But there is nothing to show that he knew anything of the illness which he subsequently suffered from until after the agreement had been entered into. There was no cross-examination on that point, and no question was put to get out of him, and there was no evidence to show that he had any suspicion of the misfortune which subsequently overtook him, or that he was aware that the seeds of the disease existed in him at that time. Now I base my opinion upon that fact, and I think, under these circumstances, that he is entitled to the amount claimed. The misconduct alleged in the pleadings is his staying away without a reasonable excuse. How can it be called misconduct if a man stays away, on the advice of a doctor, in order to get himself cured? The third plea is similar to the one set up in Cuckson v. Stones (ubi sup.); and as to that Lord Campbell, C.J. says: "We think that the gist of the plea is that the plaintiff, during the time in question, was not ready and willing to render, and did not render, any service, in the sense that he voluntarily and wilfully refused or omitted to serve. If so, we think he could not claim the wages to be paid to him in consideration of his service." Now, in the present case, the plaintiff did not voluntarily and wilfully refuse to serve, but was compelled to absent himself by an illness which came upon him during the time of service, and which was not the result of any misconduct that occurred after the agreement was made. As a matter of fact, I conclude that the malady was contracted before he entered into the defendants' service; and he did not improperly obtain admission there. At the time that he entered into the contract, which he did honestly, he neither believed nor knew that he would not be able to fulfil it. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to have the verdict for the amount claimed entered for him.

Turnpike roads—Steam locomotives used on highways—Construction of wheels of—"Shoes or other bearing surface"—Continuous pressure or "bearing surface"—Width of shoes—Locomotive Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70), s. 3.

Sect. 3 of the Locomotive Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 70), enacts that "every locomotive drawing any waggon or carriage shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than 9in. wide . . . and the wheels of every locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth-soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width of not less than 9in.

The appellants used on a highway a locomotive with wheels the tires of which were 18in. wide, and upon and across the tires were placed, on each side of the tire alternately, "shoes" or bars of iron 1in. thick, and 9½in. wide measuring across the tire, and 3in. wide measuring parallel to the circumference of the wheel, the space or interval between each shoe being 3in. except in the centre of the wheel where the tires met and overlapped each other by about 1½in. There was thus, as the appellants contended, never less than a width of 9in. of continuous "bearing surface," because, as soon as the bearing surface on one side of the wheel was exhausted, it was taken up by that on the other side. But, on appeal against a conviction of the appellants by justices, for contravening the requirements of sect. 3 of the Locomotive Act 1861, by using the locomotive on a highway, it was Held (affirming the conviction, and following the decision in Stringer v. Sykes, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152), that the wheels in question did not satisfy the statute, which required one uniform uninterrupted pressure of 9in. measured across the wheel; and (going further than that decision) that such "uniform uninterrupted pressure" must be continuous throughout the whole circumference of the wheel, save in so far as the joints of the material used may render perfect continuity impossible; and that no "shoes or other bearing surface" will satisfy the requirements of the statute, unless they are similar to the tires of such wheels as the statute has prescribed, namely, uniform, continuous, unbroken (save as aforesaid) and smooth-surfaced bands of the width of 9in. round the whole circumference of the wheel.

Quare, whether the deviation of a quarter of an inch from a flat surface, allowed by the statute of Geo. 4, in the "felles or tires" of wheels, would be permitted if a question arose as to the wheels of a locomotive being "smooth-soled" within the meaning of the Act of 1861.

(a) Reported by H. LNEIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was a case stated by justices in and for the county of Sussex, pursuant to the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty session held in Rye, in the said county, before three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, on 21st Dec. 1877, John Body the elder and John Body the younger were charged in and by a certain information, for that on the 25th Oct. then last, at Beckley, in the county of Sussex, they being the owners of a certain locomotive engine, did use the said locomotive on a certain highway there situated, the wheels of the said locomotive engine not being constructed in conformity with the statute in that case made and provided.

At the hearing of the said information the following evidence was given on oath:—

William Elphick: I am a sergeant in the East Sussex Constabulary, stationed at Beckley. On the 25th Oct., I saw a locomotive belonging to Body and Son, Wittersham, in Beckley-street; it was passing along the road towards Northiam, at about 11 a.m. It stopped to water, and the driver told me they were going to Sandhurst. I took the dimensions of the wheel. There were four wheels, the tires of the two driving wheels were 18in. wide, the shoes 10in. from outside to inside—they lapped 1in., and were 3in. wide and 1in. thick. There were 3½in. between each shoe. The engine went on towards Northiam. I took the dimensions the Saturday afterwards at Wittersham. Mr. Body, jun., told me it was the same engine that I had seen, and that I could do what I liked with it. The sketch now produced by Mr. Langham is, I believe, right. One shoe goes between the other, the uncoloured part on the sketch is an inch lower than the coloured.

Cross examined: When the shoes overlap they come up level, they are level so far as shown; where the 3in. are shown on the plan.

For the defence:

Robert William Eddison: I am a member of the firm of John Fowler and Co., manufacturers of steam ploughing machines at Leeds. Mr. Body's engine was made by our firm. I produce a drawing showing a section of the wheel (drawing put in and signed by chairman). I know it is correct; I have practical knowledge of these engines; there is always a bearing surface of 9in. width on the road, and a continuous surface, and it can never be less measured from side to side of the wheel in the ordinary way; the space of the lap is about 2½in., the space between the shoes is 3in.

Cross-examined by the bench: If the shoes went straight across the wheel leaving 2½in. between each shoe, it would be of advantage to the engine, but contrary to the Act of Parliament; on the soft road there would be an uneven pressure where the wheel touched the road.

It was therefore contended on the part of the defendants that the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70, s. 3 (which was the statute and section under which the information had been laid), had been strictly complied with, and that the wheels of the engine in question, although not smooth-soled, were used with a bearing surface of a width of not less than 9in., and that as the wheel rotated there was never less than a width of 9in. of continuous bearing surface, because, as soon as the bearing surface on one side of the wheel was exhausted, it was immediately taken up by the bearing surface on the other side. But the said justices being of opinion that the aforesaid wheels were not constructed in accordance with the statute, and the so-called shoes were not such as were contemplated by the Act, and were not a bearing surface with "one uniform uninterrupted line from side to side of the wheel," as laid down in the case of Stringer v. Sykes (L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 240), held that the offence had been committed, and accordingly the defendants were convicted and fined 10s. and 10s. 9d. for costs.

BODY AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. JEFFERY (resp.)

[Ex. Div.]

The question for the opinion of this court is whether the said determination was correct in point of law.

S. Tennant, for the appellants, contended that the magistrates had wrongfully convicted them, inasmuch as, in the construction of the wheels of their locomotive, they had strictly complied with the terms of the statute of 1861, and had properly therein conformed to the decision of this court upon the subject in the case of Stringer v. Sykes (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152; L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 240; 46 L. J. 139, Mag. Cas.), since which case the locomotive now in question had been constructed. In the locomotive in Stringer v. Sykes the tires of the wheels were, as here, 18in. broad, and the shoes were 4½in. wide measuring parallel to the circumference of the wheels, and 20in. in length or breadth, measuring across the tire from one edge of it to the other, and were bolted on transversely across the tires, in an oblique direction, with an interval of 3in. between each shoe; and this court there held that the 9in. in width required by the Act could not be made up of separate and interrupted portions of pressure, or by adding the 4½in. of one shoe to the 4½in. of the other; but that it must be the pressure of one uniform and uninterrupted "bearing surface" from one side of the tire of the wheel to the other of a width not less than 9in. in itself, such width being a portion of the circumference of the wheel. In that case the "bearing surface" was not continuous, the wheels having a space between any two shoes. Here, on the contrary, the "bearing surface" is perfectly continuous, though it is on alternate sides of the wheel. Were the wheels to be perfectly smooth-soled, or the "bearing surface" to be perfectly continuous and unbroken over the whole outside of the tire, the consequence would be that the engine would not work on a smooth road, but would come to a standstill, and do injury to the road by digging holes in it. If the roads are out up or damaged by these wheels, as now used, the remedy at common law for a nuisance is reserved by the Act, and the common law liability of the appellants remains.

Lumley Smith, for the respondent, contra.—A "shoe" is nothing more or less than an additional tire, and by sect. 3 it is required that the shoes or other bearing surface should be, as the tire is, a continuous bend round the circumference of the wheel. By sect. 1 of the Act toll is to be paid according to the width of the shoes, which would seem to show that what the Act means is a shoe going right round the wheel. If the respondent's construction of the Act is not correct, then cog-wheels would be allowable—a construction of tire that would utterly destroy the surface of the roads. The 4th section of the Act, which classes "shoes" with "fellies and tires," may be referred to as supporting the contention of the respondent.

S. Tennant replied. Our. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—HAWKINS, J.—We are of opinion that the determination of the justices was correct, and that this conviction ought to be affirmed. The sole question in this case is, whether the driving wheels of the locomotive used by the appellants upon a certain highway rested upon such shoes or other bearings as are required by the 3rd section of the Locomotive Act 1861. In considering this question we have derived considerable assistance from a reference to older legislation upon the same subject, to be found in the General Turnpike Acts passed in the reigns of George III. and George IV. By sect. 69 of the General Turnpike Act (13 Geo. 3, c. 84), it is enacted that "the tire of the wheels of all waggons, &c., to be used upon any turnpike road, shall be countersunk in placing the same upon the fellies in such manner that the nails shall not rise above the surface, and that the soles or surface of the wheels shall be quite flat." By the 2nd section of 16 Geo. 3, c. 39, after reciting the above provision, and that, according to the strict sense of the words, that provision could not be complied with, it is enacted, "that all wheels of the breadth or gauge of 6in. or upwards, the fellies or tires whereof shall not deviate more than 1in. from a flat surface, shall be deemed and taken to be flat according to the true meaning of the said Act." The 55 Geo. 3 c. 119, authorised the trustees of roads to exempt from certain tolls such waggons, &c., as should have the soles or bottoms of the fellies of all the wheels thereof of the breadth of 6in., or of 9in., or of 16in., or upwards, and be cylindrical, that is to say, of the same diameter on the inside next the carriage as on the outside, so that when such wheels shall be rolling on a flat or level surface, the whole breadth thereof shall bear equally on such flat or level surface. A similar provision is contained in the subsequent Act, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 9. The 2nd section of the General Turnpike Act (4 Geo. 4, c. 95) enacts "that the nails of the tires of the wheels of any waggons, &c. used on a turnpike road, shall be so countersunk as not to project more than one quarter of an inch above any part of the surface of such tires." Throughout these statutes will be found numerous provisions respecting the breadth or gauge of waggons, &c., used on turnpike roads. When those Acts were passed, it is probable that no waggons or carriages of the weight and with the breadth of wheel of the modern locomotive, travelled upon an ordinary road. In the year 1861, however, the use of locomotives being likely to become common on turnpike and other roads, it was deemed by the Legislature necessary to make provisions for regulating the use of them, and accordingly, by the 3rd section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 70 (the Locomotive Act 1861), it is enacted that, "every locomotive drawing any waggon or carriage shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than 9in. in width, and the wheels of every locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth-soled, or used with shoes or other bearing surface of a width of not less than 9in.;" and it goes on to subject the owner of any locomotive used contrary to the foregoing provisions to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*. It is clear to us that the object of the Legislature in passing this enactment was to protect, as far as possible, the surface of roads travelled over by locomotives, by insisting upon the wheels thereof being cylindrical within the meaning of the older enactments, and upon the tires of the wheels being smooth-soled and of a minimum breadth or gauge of 9in., so that, to use the language of the statute 55 Geo. 3, c. 119, "when such wheels shall be rolling on a flat or level surface, the whole breadth thereof shall bear equally on such flat or level surface." The use of shoes, or other bearing surface, is not mentioned in any of the earlier statutes, and we have no doubt that the proviso respecting them was introduced into the Act we are now called upon to construe in ease and favour of the owners of locomotives, by not insisting on the wheels themselves being smooth-soled (which might be very inconvenient in their general use), nor upon the wheels themselves coming in contact with the surface of the road travelled over, provided they are used either with shoes, by which we understand a smooth-surfaced shoe covering the whole surface of the tire, or, at the option of the owners, some other bearing surface of the minimum breadth of 9in., which shall in substance represent a smooth-soled wheel of that width, so that, when travelling along the road, the substituted bearing surface, as it comes in contact with the surface of the road, shall produce the same even, uniform, and continuous pressure which a wheel of the same dimensions and character would produce. In other words, we think that the Legislature, in permitting the use of shoes or other bearing surface, did not intend to confer upon the owners the privilege of using any but those which would produce upon the road travelled on the same pressure and effect as the wheels they had prescribed in the event of their being used without shoes or other bearing surface. We do not think the bearing surfaces used by the appellants upon the occasion in question were such as the statute intended to allow as a substitute for smooth-soled wheels, nor do we think that they would produce the same or similar pressure or effect upon the road travelled over. In Stringer v. Sykes (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152; L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 240; 46 L. J. 139, Mag. Cas.), this court decided that the bearing surface must be of a continuous width of 9in. across the wheel, and that a bearing surface of a width of 9in. made up of two flat bars each of the width of 4in., but with a break between them of 3in., bolted obliquely across the whole breadth of the wheel, was not sufficient to satisfy the statute, but that the statute required one uniform uninterrupted line of 9in. from side to side of the wheel; that is, that there should be one uninterrupted pressure of 9in. measured across the wheel. We entirely abide by that decision, and we go further and hold that such uninterrupted pressure must be continuous throughout the whole circumference of the wheel, save in so far as the joints of the material used may render perfect continuity impossible; for we do not intend to say that the bearing surface should throughout the whole circumference consist of one piece of material only, and we think that no shoes or bearing surfaces will be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute unless they are similar to the tires of such wheels as the statute has prescribed, viz., uniform, continuous, unbroken (save as aforesaid), and smooth-surfaced bands, of the width of 9in. at least round the whole circumference of the wheels. It is not necessary for us to pronounce any opinion as to the degree of smoothness required in the surface of the wheels, shoes, or bearing surface, nor do we intend to do so; but we may observe that, although in the early part of the reign of Geo. III. it was enacted that so long as the felloes or tires did not deviate more than 1in. from a flat surface, the wheels should be deemed to be flat according to the meaning of the Act, a deviation of a quarter of an inch only was allowed by the statute 4 Geo. 4; and it may well be that even that deviation would not be permitted if the question should hereafter arise whether the wheels of a locomotive are smooth-soled within the meaning of the Locomotive Act 1861. Our opinion being that the conviction was right, this appeal will be dismissed with costs.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF ARDSLEY.

Conviction affirmed with costs.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF ARDSLEY. (a)

Highway — Non-repair — Parish — Township — Repairs by adjoining township.

The parish of D. is divided into seven townships, each of which has repaired its own highways with two exceptions, and there is an immemorial custom for each to repair all highways with the two exceptions within its limits. Each township has its own surveyors and highway rates, and the parish at large had never done any highway repairs, nor levied any rates, nor had any surveyors of highways.

The two exceptions were the piece of road in the defendants' township mentioned in the indictment which had been repaired by the adjoining township W., but for so doing there was no evidence of any consideration, and another piece of road in the defendants' township which had been repaired by sums of money paid by turnpike trustees and another township.

Held, that the Chairman of Quarter Sessions was right in directing the jury to convict the defendants, there being no legal liability on the township of W. to repair; the proper inference from the facts being that the defendants' township was liable by custom to repair its own highways.

At the General Quarter Sessions for the West Riding of the county of York, held at Doncaster, on the 19th Oct. 1877, the defendants, the inhabitants of the township of Ardsley, were tried on the following indictment, which charged that a certain part of a highway within the said township of Ardsley, which said township is one of seven townships which together form the parish of Darfield, in the said riding, was out of repair, and that by an immemorial custom it was the duty of the defendants to repair the said highway.

West Riding of Yorkshire to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath, present that from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, there was and yet is a certain common and ancient Queen's highway leading from Wombwell, in the West Riding of the county of York, towards and unto Barnsley, in the said riding, used by and for all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, and her predecessors, by themselves, and with horses, coaches, carts, and other carriages, to go, return, pass, repass, ride, and labour at their free will and pleasure; and that a certain part of the said common and ancient Queen's highway, being part of a highway called Wombwell-lane, situate in the township of Ardsley, in the riding aforesaid, commencing at the boundary between the said township of Ardsley and the township of Wombwell, in the said riding, such a boundary being at a point in the said highway distant 145yds. in a north-westerly direction from a bridge over the river Dove called Oldham, otherwise Oldham Bridge, on the said highway, where there are two gateways, the one on the south side of the said highway giving access to an accommodation road leading to a house called Quarry House, in the said township of Ardsley, and the one on the north side of the said highway giving access to a footpath leading to the village of Ardsley, in the said riding, and to an accommodation road leading to Low Laithes Grange, in the said township of Wombwell, and extending from the said boundary in a westerly direction for a distance of 539yds. in length, and from 8yds. to 10yds. in breadth, on the 17th day of April in the year of our Lord 1877, and continually afterwards until the day of the taking of this inquisition, at and in the township of Ardsley aforesaid, in the riding aforesaid, was and yet is very ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in such decay for want of due reparation and amendment of the same, so that the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, in, through, and along the said part of the said common and ancient Queen's highway, by themselves, and with their horses, coaches, carts, and carriages, could not during the time aforesaid, nor yet can go, return, pass, repass, ride, and labour without great danger of their lives and loss of their goods, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, in, through, and along the said part of the said common and ancient Queen's highway, going, returning, passing, repassing, riding, and labouring, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen her crown, and dignity. And that the inhabitants of the said township of Ardsley, in the said West Riding of the county of York, the said part of the common and ancient Queen's highway aforesaid (so as aforesaid being in decay) from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary have been used and accustomed to repair and amend, and of right ought to have repaired and amended, and still of right ought to repair and amend when and so often as it shall be necessary.

2nd count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that, on the 17th day of April 1877, and long before, there was, and from thenceforth continuously hitherto, there had been, and still is, a certain common Queen's highway, leading from Wombwell, in the said West Riding of the county of York, towards and unto Barnsley, in the said riding, used for all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, to go, return, pass, and repass, on foot and on horseback, and with cattle, carts, and carriages, at their will and pleasure, and that a certain part of the said common Queen's highway being part of a highway called Wombwell-lane, and situate and being in the township of Ardsley, in the parish of Darfield, in the riding aforesaid, to wit, commencing at the boundary between the township of Ardsley aforesaid and the township of Wombwell in the said riding; such boundary being at a point in the said highway, distant 145yds., in a north-westerly direction from a bridge over the river Dove, called Oldham, otherwise Oldham Bridge, on the said highway, where there are two gateways, the one on the south side of the said highway, giving access to an accommodation road leading to a house called Quarry House, in the said township of Ardsley, and the one on the north side of the said highway, giving access to a footpath leading to the village of Ardsley, and an accommodation road leading to Low Laithes Grange, in the said township of Wombwell, and extending from the said boundary in a westerly direction, for a distance of 539yds. in length, and from 8yds. to 10yds. in breadth, the said 17th day of April 1877, and from thence continually, until the day of the taking of this inquisition at and in the said township of Ardsley, in the said parish of Darfield, in the riding aforesaid, was, and still is, very ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in great decay for want of due reparation and amendment of the same, so that the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen in, through, and along the said part of the said common Queen's highway, with their horses, coaches, carts, and carriages, could not, during the time last aforesaid, nor yet can go, return, pass, repass, ride, and labour without great danger of their lives and the loss of their goods to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, going, returning, passing, repassing, riding, and labouring, and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity. And that within the parish of Darfield aforesaid in the riding aforesaid from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary there have been, and still are divers townships or districts whereof the said township of Ardsley during all the time last aforesaid hath been and still is one; and that the inhabitants of the said township of Ardsley, in the parish aforesaid, in the riding aforesaid, from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary have repaired, maintained, and amended, and have been used and accustomed to repair, maintain, and amend, and of right ought to have repaired, maintained, and amended, and still of right ought to repair, maintain, and amend when and so often as it hath been or shall be necessary such and so many of the common highways situate, and being within the said township of Ardsley as would otherwise be repairable by the inhabitants of the said parish of Darfield at large; and that the said part of the said common highway hereinbefore mentioned to be ruinous, deep, miry, broken, and in decay as aforesaid now is and during all the time when the same part of the said common highway as above alleged to be ruinous, deep, miry, broken, and in decay as aforesaid, was a common highway situate in the said township of Ardsley, and which but for the said prescription and usage would be repairable, maintainable, and amendable by the inhabitants of the said parish of Darfield at large; and that by reason of the premises the inhabitants of the said township of Ardsley, in the parish of Darfield aforesaid, during all the time last aforesaid, ought to have repaired, maintained, and amended, and still ought to repair, maintain, and amend the same part of the said common highway so being ruinous, deep, miry, broken, and in decay as aforesaid, when and so often as it hath been and shall be necessary so to do.

3rd count.—And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that on the 17th April 1877, and long before there was and from thenceforth continuously hitherto there hath been and still is a certain common

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF ARDSLEY.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

Queen's highway leading from Wombwell, in the said West Riding of the county of York towards and unto Barnsley, in the said riding, used for all the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen to go, return, pass, and repass on foot and on horseback and with cattle, carts, and carriages at their will and pleasure, and that a certain part of the said common Queen's highway being part of a highway called Wombwell-lane, and situate and being in the township of Ardsley, in the parish of Darfield, in the riding aforesaid, to wit, commencing at the boundary between the township of Ardsley aforesaid and the township of Wombwell, in the said riding, such boundary being at a point in the said highway distant 145yds. in a north-westerly direction from a bridge over the river Dove called Oldham otherwise Oldham Bridge on the said highway, where there are two gateways, the one on the south side of the said highway, giving access to an accommodation road leading to a house called Quarry House, in the said township of Ardsley, and the one on the north side of the said highway, giving access to a footpath leading to the village of Ardsley, and an accommodation road leading to Low Laithes Grange, in the said township of Wombwell, and extending from the said boundary in a westerly direction for a distance of 539yds. in length, and from 8yds. to 10yds. in breadth, on the said 17th day of April 1877, and from thence continuously until the day of the taking of this inquisition at and in the said township of Ardsley in the said parish of Darfield in the riding aforesaid was and still is very ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in great decay for want of due reparation and amendment of the same, so that the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, in, through, and along the said part of the said common Queen's highway, with their horses, coaches, carts, and carriages could not, during the time last aforesaid, nor yet can go, return, pass, repass, ride and labour without great danger of their lives, and the loss of their goods, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, so going, returning, passing, repassing, riding and labouring and against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity. And that the said parish of Darfield, from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, has been, and yet is divided into several (to wit, seven) townships, whereof the said township of Ardsley is, and immemorably has been, one. And that within the said parish of Darfield, from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, there always has been, and still is, a certain ancient and laudable custom there used and approved of; that is to say, that each of the said several townships within the said parish of Darfield from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, have repaired, maintained, and amended, and have used and been accustomed to repair, maintain, and amend, and during all the time aforesaid of right, ought to have repaired, maintained, and amended, and still of right ought to repair, maintain, and amend all and every the Queen's common highways, situate, lying and being within their own respective townships, that would otherwise be repairable, maintainable, and amendable by the inhabitants of the said parish of Darfield at large, when and so often as the same should have been or might be necessary; and that the inhabitants of the said parish of Darfield at large have not during all or any part of the time aforesaid repaired, maintained, or amended, and have not been used or accustomed to repair, maintain, or amend the Queen's common highways within the said parish. And that the said part of the said Queen's common highway so being ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in great decay, is situate within the said township of Ardsley; and, but for the usage and custom aforesaid, would have been, and would now be, repairable, maintainable, and amendable by the inhabitants of the said parish of Darfield at large. And that the said part of the said Queen's common highway, from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, always has been, and still is, repairable, maintainable, and amendable by the inhabitants of the said township of Ardsley. And the jurors of our Lady the Queen do further present that the inhabitants of the said township of Ardsley, the said part of the said common Queen's highway so being ruinous, miry, deep, broken, and in decay as aforesaid, ought to have repaired, maintained, and amended, and still of right ought to repair, maintain, and amend, when and so often as it should or shall be necessary so to do.

The following facts were proved at the trial, and were admitted to be correct by both the prosecutors and the defendants.

The parish of Darfield, in which the township of Ardsley is situate, is divided into seven townships, each of which (with the two exceptions hereinafter mentioned) has repaired its own highways. There is an immemorial custom for each township to repair all highways (with the two exceptions hereinafter mentioned) within the limits of the respective townships.

Each township has appointed its own surveyors, and levied its own highway rates.

There have never been any repairs done by the parish at large, nor have any rates been levied for the parish at large, and no surveyors have been appointed for the parish.

The portion of road indicted is within the township of Ardsley, and is out of repair; although the portion of road lies within the township of Ardsley yet down to the year 1868, since which time Wombwell has denied its liability to repair the same, and so far as its previous history can be traced, it has always been repaired by the adjoining township of Wombwell, but there is no evidence to show when and for what consideration (if any) Wombwell commenced to repair the road in question.

There is also in the township of Ardsley another road which was till three years ago a turnpike road leading from Doncaster to Saltersbrook, 500yds. of this turnpike road situate in the township of Ardsley, have from time to time been repaired by the township of Darfield (one of the other seven townships into which the parish of Darfield is divided as aforesaid), Ardsley has repaired the remaining part of this turnpike road situate in Ardsley. These repairs (that is to say the repairs done by the township of Darfield, as well as those done by the township of Ardsley) were directed by the trustees of the turnpike road and paid for by them. The trustees paid a sum of money out of the tolls to the township of Darfield, and also a sum of money to the township of Ardsley to repair this road; and the sums of

By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 97, s. 20, it is enacted that

From and after the 10th Oct., in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, so much of the said schedule as is contained in the following words (that is to say): "Waters, videlicet, all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state to be used for the purpose of compounding or making any of the said waters," shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

A rule nisi was moved for and granted, and came on for argument in the Exchequer Division, before Kelly, C.B., and Cleasby and Huddleston, BB. The Exchequer Division discharged the rule, giving judgment for the Crown.

The defendant appealed.

The case in the court below will be found fully reported 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 247.

Dicey (with him the Solicitor-General) for the Crown.

The arguments were the same as in the court below.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment must be reversed. I do not agree with the majority of the court below. The first question for us is, whether in the reign of George III., directly after the passing of the Act, this article would have been within the description of articles contained in the schedule. Now, this is a preparation in a solid state to make a certain water. Is what is made from it a water of such a description as is contained in the schedule, or is it that and something else besides? Witnesses have been called on behalf of the Crown who say that the result of the composition is properly called a water "impregnated with carbonic acid gas." Now this description may have been wrong, and it might, perhaps, more properly have been described as a medicine, but the witnesses did not say so, but the contrary. It is said that, because there is another ingredient in the composition, it is not correctly called "a water impregnated with carbonic acid gas;" but surely that is wrong—at all events, I cannot agree with it. The next question is, does the Act which repeals this part of the schedule under the head "waters" cause this composition to come within the enumeration in the tail of the schedule? Now, it is possible that this composition would have come under the tail of the schedule if it had not been specifically mentioned in the schedule itself; but the question is to be considered with reference to the particular enactments with respect to mineral wherein the person making, preparing, uttering, vending, or exposing for sale the same hath or claims to have any occult secret or art for the making or preparing of the same, or hath or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed to sale under the authority of any letters patent under the Great Seal, or which have at any time heretofore been, now are, or shall hereafter be by any public notice or advertisement, or by any written or printed paper or handbills, or by any label or words written or printed, affixed to, or delivered with any packet, box, bottle, phial, or other inclosure containing the same, held out, or recommended to the public by the makers, vendors, or proprietors thereof, as nostrums or proprietary medicines, or as specifics, or as beneficial to the prevention, cure, or relief of any distemper, malady, ailment, disorder, or complaint incident to or in any wise affecting the human body."

waters. There is a general injunction against selling them without a stamp, and before the repealing Act was passed this article was taxable under the schedule, and not under the general words at the tail of the schedule. It would have been taxable as an artificial mineral water, whether claimed under a patent or by a person claiming an occult secret in the manufacture, or advertised and praised as a medicine. Then comes the repealing Act, which says that so much of the schedule as are contained in the following words: "Waters, viz., all artificial mineral waters, and all waters impregnated with soda or mineral alkali, or with carbonic acid gas, and all compositions in a liquid or solid state to be used for the purpose of compounding or making any of the said waters," shall be repealed. The repealing Act says in effect, though not, in words, that artificial mineral waters are not to be taxed. The schedule has made certain things taxable; it is then repealed. The argument for the Crown is, that the taxation of the mineral waters is not repealed if you continue to sell them as patent medicines, or advertise them in the manner pointed out in the tail of the schedule. The effect of the repealing Act in my view is this: In the first place, the schedule taxes all artificial mineral waters, whether patented or not. The tail of the schedule says they must still be taxed if they are patented or advertised, &c.; but the repealing Act says, you must not tax artificial mineral waters at all. It is said that you cannot look at the repealed portion of an Act in order to make out the meaning of the remainder. If that is true, it follows that a clause in an Act, which at the time it is passed has one meaning, may obtain another meaning if some other part of the Act is repealed. That, in my opinion, would be an absurd result. It is right to say that when a portion of an Act is repealed it is as though it never had existed with respect to the particular matters dealt with by that portion. So much for the words of the statutes, and now for the substance of the matter. I think the intent of the Legislature was to exempt these waters from taxation, and not to make them taxable if the vendor said they were good for diseases. If that were not so, the Legislature might have said "the part of the schedule which refers to artificial mineral waters shall be repealed, provided nothing shall be repealed which in any way comes under the provision of the tail of the schedule." But it has not done so, and I think it meant to exempt such articles from taxation.

BRETT, L.J.—In this case there are two main questions. The first, under what part of the 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, does this composition come? and the second, what is the effect of the repealing statute? The one is a question of fact, the other of the construction of the first statute. This must be construed as if on the day after it was passed. It is for taxing certain medicinal compositions, and it uses this term, "all artificial mineral waters." That is intended, I think, to include what would be generally known and understood both by scientific and commercial people as "artificial mineral waters," and also to include what perhaps would not be so known, namely, "waters impregnated with carbonic acid gas." I do not think it makes a difference if an extraneous substance is used in the composition of the waters, whether it is a mineral or not. Now for the remaining part of the schedule. A schedule is part of a statute, and as much an enactment as any other part. Then under which part does this composition come? If it were such as people could not call it a water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, I should have thought that it was put in that specifying part of the statute. Was it a composition which when used with water would be a medicine, or something other than a medicine, within the words at the tail of the schedule? I think that the admitted facts are that, when compounded and mixed with water, it produced a carbonic acid gas water, with a foreign substance contained therein, and this is what the scientific witnesses said at the time. I am of opinion that it still remains a water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, such as to fall under the schedule, and that it would have been taxable under the schedule. The next question is, what is the effect of the repeal of part of the statute? The whole matter, no doubt, is to be construed as if the repealed part had never existed. The first thing you look at in a repealing statute, is that part of the original statute with which the repealing statute deals, where in the statute there are several enactments some of which are repealed. Here are two distinct enactments, one of specified waters, and the other of other substances. The two enactments are distinct, the one is repealed, and the other has nothing to do with it.

CORROD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Crown here claims duty as upon a water advertised on paper as good for certain diseases, and the question here is, What is the effect of the repealing Act? And, first, as to the construction of 52 Geo. 3, the defendant says, "I was taxable under that Act, but it has been repealed." The Crown says, "No; you would not have been taxable under that, but under the tail of the schedule; or, at any rate, after the repeal of that part of the schedule you would have been liable under the tail of the schedule." As a matter of construction, is the preparation within the first part of the statute? If it is, it cannot be in the tail of the schedule. The Act was aimed at compositions which were sold as medicines. The witnesses for the Crown call it a mineral water that has medicinal properties. The question is, Can it be said that this production is a carbonic acid gas water? If it is something else in substance, then it is not within the schedule. I think it is not within the tail of the schedule, and that the Legislature did not intend to make such articles as this subjects of taxation. I am of opinion that the defendant is not liable.

LEWIS v. BOETFEUR. (a)

Charitable legacies—Pure and impure personality—Direction to pay charitable legacies out of pure personality—Direction to marshal—Residue—Construction.

A testator gave his wife a legacy of 1000*l.*, and bequeathed out of his pure personality a sum of 9000*l.* to trustees for his wife for life, and ultimately between certain charities; he then gave to the same trustees all other his real and personal estate for conversion, directing them to hold it, after paying the 9000*l.*, and after payment, out of such residuary estate as should not be wanted for the said legacy, of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, upon trust to pay the income to his wife for life, and after her death to raise out of his said residuary estate certain legacies for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and then legacies in favour of charities to the amount of 40,000*l.*, directing these latter legacies to be paid out of his pure personality; then, as to the "ultimate residue" of his said residuary estate, he directed his trustees to hold one-tenth for A., another tenth for B., and the remaining eight-tenths for a charity, and declared that the said "ultimate residue" should be marshalled so that the eight-tenths might be paid out of that part of his estate which might lawfully be appropriated to charitable purposes. There was only a sum of 2000*l.* impure personality. The testator's estate was not sufficient to pay all the legacies in full. On the death of the widow the question arose whether this 2000*l.* was chargeable in exoneration of the pure personality with the whole, or only rateably with the pure personality with its proportion of the debts, costs of administration, and legacies (other than the 9000*l.*)

Held, that there was nothing in the words of the will to controvert the general rule of the court, and that the debts, costs, and legacies were payable out of the pure personality (less the 9000*l.*) and impure personality rateably.

PETITION.—Alexander Boetfeur, by his will dated the 26th May 1868, after bequeathing to his wife, the defendant, Matilda Maria Allemora Constant Boetfeur, the sum of 1000*l.*, to be paid to her immediately after his decease, bequeathed "out of such part of my personal estate as may be lawfully applied to charitable purposes and preferably to any payment thereof" the sum of 9000*l.* to his wife, and the plaintiffs and petitioners, Richard Lewis and Charles Reeve, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust for investment as therein mentioned, and to pay the income thereof to his said wife for her life, and after her death upon trust to divide the said sum of 9000*l.*, or the securities for the time being representing the same, among certain charities which he particularly mentioned. The testator then devised and bequeathed unto the same trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all his real and personal estate which was not thereby otherwise disposed of, upon trust to sell, get in, and convert the same as therein mentioned; and he directed that his trustees should hold "all my residuary estate, after satisfying in the first place out of such part of my personal estate as may lawfully be applied for charitable purposes the said legacy of 9000*l.*, and after paying out of such part of the said residuary estate as shall not be wanted for the said legacy my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses (all which debts and expenses I charge thereon), upon trust to pay" the income to his wife for life, and after her death, "to raise out of my said residuary estate and pay the legacies following," i. e., two legacies of 200*l.* and 50*l.*, and a legacy of 250*l.* to each of the plaintiffs, and then numerous charitable legacies amounting to 40,000*l.*, and directed that "the said last-mentioned legacies for charitable purposes shall be paid exclusively out of such part of my residuary personal estate as may lawfully be appropriated for such purposes, and preferably to any other payment thereout (except the said legacy of 9000*l.* directed to be paid in the first place and the legacies to the said Richard Lewis and Charles Reeve)," and as to "the ultimate residue of my said residuary estate," he directed his trustees to stand possessed as to one-tenth thereof in trust for one of the plaintiffs, and as to another one-tenth in trust for the other plaintiff, and as to the remaining eight-tenths thereof for the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, and the testator declared "that in the division of the said ultimate residue, the same shall, if and so far as necessary, be marshalled so that the two equal tenths shall be paid out of such parts thereof as cannot lawfully be appropriated for charitable purposes, to the intent that the remaining eight equal parts may consist of such personal estate as may be lawfully appropriated for such purpose."

The testator died on Dec. 30th 1869, having no real estate, though shortly before his death he had contracted for the sale to the Metropolitan Railway of a leasehold house for 2000*l.* It was admitted in argument that this sum of 2000*l.* was impure personalty, and that eight-tenths of the residue of this sum, after payment of what was payable thereout, was undisposed of. There was an administration suit respecting the testator's estate, and Mrs. Boetefeur, the tenant for life, having now died, the object of the present petition was to obtain a division of the funds in court among the unpaid legatees, and the question arose whether, on the construction of the will, this 2000*l.* impure personalty was chargeable in exoneration of the pure personalty with the whole, or only rateably with the pure personalty with its proportion of the debts, costs of administration, and legacies to the plaintiffs, the petitioners.

Sir Henry Jackson, Q.C. and Macnaghten for the petitioners.—This petition, which practically takes the place of a further consideration—that having been accidentally not reserved—is for the purpose of having it decided whether the 2000*l.* is to be drawn upon rateably with the other funds, or is wholly liable for payment of debts, costs, &c., in exoneration of the other legacies to charities. It is clear, on the authority of Harrison v. Harrison (1 Russ. & M. 71), that this 2000*l.* is impure personalty, and the case will be argued on that assumption. The testator has, by the words of the will, created a demonstrative fund out of which the charitable legacies are to be paid; but there are no words in the will sufficient to convert the ordinary rules of this court applicable to the distribution of assets. The debts, costs, and legacies to the petitioners are therefore payable rateably out of the pure and impure personalty, and the minutes as framed are perfectly right.

Daniel Jones for the representatives of the widow.—By the terms of the will the 1000*l.* legacy to Mrs. Boetefeur must be paid first in full, for the legacies out of "residuary estate" cannot have priority over a legacy given first. It is "residue" after payment of the 1000*l.* legacy, and the directions as to preference apply only to legacies out of residue. Next, as to the payment of the debts and costs, it will be contended on behalf of the charities that Miles v. Harrison (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 190; L. Rep. 9 Ch. 316) governs this case; but I submit that it does not. That case went entirely on the particular words of the will, which are not the same as here. The costs, debts, &c., are therefore payable rateably out of the pure personalty and the 2000*l.* impure personalty. Then, as to any portion of the impure personalty which is not disposed of by this means, there will be an intestacy, to one-half of which the widow would be entitled, as there are no children. I ask that this one-half, when ascertained, may be paid out to us at once, and the other half carried over. By this means we shall save the expense of a second application.

Rigby, for the Attorney-General, representing the charities.—Though the court will not marshal assets in favour of charities as a general rule, yet it will do so if the directions in the will are sufficiently explicit:

Miles v. Harrison (sup.);

Wills v. Bourne, L. Rep. 16 Eq. 487; and ours is a stronger case even than these. The testator directs the charities to be preferred to all other claims, and therefore the costs of suit, the debts and legacies, must all come primarily out of the impure personalty:

Sturge v. Dimesdale, 1 L. T. Rep. 252; 6 Beav. 462; Tempest v. Tempest, 29 L. T. Rep. 101; 7 De G. M. & G. 470.

were also referred to.

B. B. Rogers (Westlake, Q.C. with him) supported the contention of the Attorney-General.

Sir Henry Jackson, Q.C. in reply.—Unless there is a declaration to the contrary, each fund, pure or impure, must bear its own share rateably. In the cases before Lord Selborne (Wills v. Bourne) and Lord Cairns (Miles v. Harrison) words sufficient were found; but here the testator has avoided disturbing the general rule.

BACON, V.C.—I think the arguments which have been addressed to me, and the cases which have been cited, show that this is a question of construction. Miles v. Harrison and Wills v. Bourne (sup.), the cases that were before Lord Cairns and Lord Selborne, which I have been looking at during the course of the argument, proceed upon the words of the wills there existing, which were different to the words contained in this will. In the case before me the testator has plainly pointed out what he calls his residue, and he has charged upon this residue the payment of his debts and so on, which would unquestionably include, according to the practice of this court, the costs of this suit; having done that he gives the charitable legacies out of such part of his estate as may by law be applied to the payment of them, and he directs that the general residue which he has spoken of shall be marshalled. From the words of the will, a preferential payment of the charitable legacies is clear beyond all doubt; but it is a payment out of that property, the pure personality, which might be applied for that purpose. The direction to deal with the fund is equally clear. The direction to marshal, only has the effect of separating into two classes that which before was one, the residuary estate, which residuary estate is charged with the payment of the costs. Then comes the rule of the court, that where there are two legacies or two sets of interests they bear their proportions to the costs in the same proportion as they derive benefits under the will, and that is what the minutes in this case propose. I need not say that, if the cases cited applied to this case, I should be bound by them, and there would be nothing to reason about or to consider; but they do not, in my judgment, apply to this case, because here, guiding myself only by the words the testator has used, I find that he divides his estate into two classes—one goes to the payment of the charitable legacies and the other to the other legatees; and before either of them can claim anything the costs of the suit must be paid. The minutes will therefore be as proposed by Sir H. Jackson, and there being an intestacy as to any portion of the impure personality which remains undisposed of after bearing its share of the costs, debts, and legacies, Mr. Jones's clients will, upon production of satisfactory evidence of no issue, be entitled to have one-half of this sum when ascertained paid out to them, and the rest must be carried over.

FRANCIS (app.) v. MAAS AND ANOTHER (resps.). (a)
Seeds—Adulteration—Appearance—Kind—Quality
—32 & 33 Vict. c. 112, ss. 2 and 3.

The respondents were charged under the Adulteration of Seeds Act 1869 with causing to be dyed, with intent to enable some other person to defraud, certain clover seeds.

They were proved to have submitted clover seeds to a process of sulphur-smoking, whereby their appearance was greatly improved, but still represented no other sort of seed. The magistrate refused to convict.

Held, upon a case stated, that the Act being expressly directed to adulteration, and the offence of dyeing being limited to process by which the appearance of another kind of seed is acquired, this was not a fraud within the application of the Act; and that the magistrate was right.

This was a case stated by one of the Metropolitan police magistrates sitting at Southwark Police Court, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, in order to obtain the opinion of the High Court of Justice upon the question of law therewith submitted, at the request of the complainant, who was dissatisfied with the judgment on a summons heard on Dec. 10, 1877, as being in law erroneous.

Messrs. Frith and Maas, seed merchants, appeared to a summons taken out against them by Alexander Francis, under the Seeds Adulteration Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 112), "For that they did unlawfully, with intent to enable some other person to defraud, cause to be dyed certain seeds within the true intent and meaning of the Act, viz., clover seeds," &c.

It was proved to the magistrate's satisfaction at the hearing that the defendants had in fact submitted the seeds in question to a certain process of sulphur-smoking, whereby their appearance had been greatly improved, and that in short a very inferior and comparatively worthless sample of old clover seed had by the process been made to resemble new and valuable clover seed; but it was not proved, nor alleged, that there was any representation that the seed was other in sort than what it really was, viz., clover seed.

In the interpretation clause of the Act (sect. 2) the term "to dye seeds" means to give to seeds, by any process of colouring, dyeing, sulphur-smoking, or other artificial means, the appearance of seeds of another kind. It was argued for the complainant that these words would include manipulation of seeds by such process or artificial means in order fraudulently to present the appearance of improved quality.

The magistrate was of opinion that the words of the statute, "seeds of another kind," meant a totally different thing from old and inferior seeds of the same kind altered so as to pass for new and reliable seeds; and holding that the conduct of the defendants, however reprehensible, did not bring them within the penalties of the Act, he dismissed the summons.

If the court should be of opinion that the magistrate was wrong, he prayed that the case might be remitted to him for re-hearing.

Grain argued for the appellant.—There can be no doubt that the respondents, upon the facts proved, would have been within the words of the 3rd section, if the meaning of that section were not limited by the interpretation clause: "Every person who, with intent to defraud or to enable another person to defraud, does any of the following things; that is to say—(1) kills or causes to be killed any seeds; or (2) dyes or causes to be dyed any seeds; or (3) sells or causes to be sold any killed or dyed seeds, shall be punished as follows, that is to say," &c. The title of the statute, which is an Act to prevent the Adulteration of Seeds, and the preamble, "Whereas the practice of adulterating seeds in fraud of Her Majesty's subjects, and to the great detriment of agriculture, requires to be repressed by more effectual laws than those which are now in force for that purpose," both go to show that the object of the Legislature was intended to apply to the fraud established in this case. The word "kind," although technically different from "quality," may be said to include that meaning in popular language.

Lyon for the respondent.—Even if the word "kind" can be taken to mean "sort," there is no evidence here of an offence against this Act. There was no adulteration, and the quality of the seed was not injured by what the respondents did. [MANISTY, J.—The magistrate sufficiently finds an intent to defraud; the apparent quality was altered.] The words of the Act do not cover any such alteration.

[O.P. Div.]

Grain in reply.—The adulteration was accomplished by the mixture of sulphur smoke. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But the clover was not corrupted by foreign substance.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—We have arrived at the conclusion to which I consider myself forced by the words of the statute. It is impossible, without violence to the language used, to carry out what would seem to be reasonably the object of the Legislature. There can be no doubt this was a detestable and abominable fraud; but we are called upon to say whether it is such a fraud as to come within the provisions of a penal Act of Parliament. I can come to no other conclusion than that this statute does not touch the matter. The preamble shows that it was directed to repress the practice of adulterating seeds. Now, adulteration means the infusion of a foreign article, and it does not seem to me that sulphur-smoking meets that definition. We must next look at the nature of the offence described in the Act itself, and we find that "to dye seeds means to give to seeds, by any process of colouring, dyeing, sulphur-smoking, or other artificial means, the appearance of seeds of another kind." The effect of sulphur-smoking is described in this case as giving these clover seeds the appearance of being greatly improved; but it is expressly stated that the seeds were not thereby made to represent anything but clover seed. The word "kind" cannot mean quality, and, although these seeds are made to appear of another quality than they really are, yet they still appear to be clover seeds. I should willingly apply the Act to this case if I could do so without forcing the language beyond its sense.

MANISTY, J.—It is fair to express the regret which we cannot but feel that we are unable to include this case in the application of the Act. The preamble points to the practice of adulterating seeds as the repressive object of the Act. In construing a statute there is nothing of necessity to prevent its provisions from going beyond the preamble; but in my opinion what was done in this case by the respondents was certainly not adulteration. Another canon of construction is, that if the meaning be not reasonably clear, the words of a statute are not to be interpreted to impose a penalty for an offence charged against them. Reading the facts proved by the light of the interpretation clause, the respondents are charged only with giving clover seeds the appearance of an improved quality upon that which they really possessed by a process of sulphur-smoking. I fear upon all sound principles we must adopt the view which the stipendiary magistrate has taken of the charge.

HALLIWELL v. COUNSELL. (a)

Master and servant—Apprentice—Surety—Discharge of—Grievous bodily harm—Reasonable ground for fear.

To a statement of claim alleging that the defendant had become surety on an indenture of apprenticeship for the faithful service of the apprentice, and that the apprentice had not faithfully served, but had absented himself, the defendant pleaded that while the apprentice was in the plaintiff's service the plaintiff assaulted him and inflicted personal injury upon him, and threatened to do him grievous bodily harm, and that the apprentice, fearing that grievous bodily harm would be inflicted upon him, left the plaintiff's service.

Held, that the statement of defence should be amended by adding an allegation that the apprentice had reasonable ground for such fear.

DEMURRER to a statement of defence.

The statement of claim alleged that the defendant had become surety by covenant for the due and faithful fulfilment by an apprentice of his contract of apprenticeship, and that the apprentice had broken his said contract by unlawfully absenting himself from the service of the master. The statement of defence admitted the contract of suretyship, and pleaded that while the apprentice was faithfully serving the plaintiff, the plaintiff actually assaulted him, and inflicted personal injury upon him, and further threatened to do him grievous bodily harm, and that the apprentice, fearing that if he remained longer in the service of the plaintiff grievous bodily harm might in fact be inflicted upon him, left the service of the plaintiff before the expiration of the term stipulated for in the contract of apprenticeship, which was the grievance alleged. The plaintiff demurred to the above statement of defence.

Bigham, for the plaintiff, in support of the demurrer.—The facts alleged are no real defence to the action. The slightest corporal chastisement, such as that which a master has a right to inflict upon a boy for misconduct, would satisfy the allegation that an assault had been committed, and personal injury inflicted. As to the grievous bodily harm, it is not alleged that any was in fact sustained, and the mere fact that a timid boy was afraid it might be is surely not enough to justify a breach of the contract of service. His fear might have been wholly unreasonable.

Mattinson for the defendant.—There is no modern authority establishing that a master may chastise his apprentice at all; and the dicta that refer to his right to do so might just as well be relied upon to justify him in beating at adult servant. "Grievous bodily harm" is something well recognised by the criminal law, however difficult it may be to define, and does include slight punishment. If such a threat was uttered, that would make the fear of the apprentice reasonable.

GROVE, J.—I am inclined to think that the statement of defence, as it stands, is not a good plea. It alleges that personal injury was suffered, which may mean very little; and that grievous bodily harm was feared in consequence of a threat used by the plaintiff. If it had gone on to say that the apprentice had reasonable grounds for fearing that grievous bodily harm would be inflicted upon him, I should have had no doubt that it would have been sufficient. FIELDING v. RHYL IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS. (a) Public Health—Local government—Bye-laws—Public Health Acts 1848 and 1858—Towns Improvement Act 1847—Building—Notice to town surveyor.

The appellant was convicted by two justices for an offence against certain bye-laws made by local improvement commissioners under powers conferred by the Public Health Acts 1848, 1858, and a private local Act which incorporated the Towns Improvement Act 1847. The bye-laws in question provided (inter alia) that notice should be given to the town surveyor of any new building which it was intended to erect, and that detail plans and sections of the same should be deposited at his office, showing the position, form, and dimensions of such building, and of the water-closet, privy, well, and all other appurtenances, with a description of the materials and of the intended mode of drainage. The bye-laws had been published in accordance with the requirements of the Public Health Act 1848, but not with those of the Towns Improvement Act 1847. The appellant, who was about to build a number of cottages, erected two brick structures within the district without complying with the above bye-laws. One of such structures was intended for a brick-kiln, the other for the storing of tools and the general convenience of the workmen; and the justices found as a fact that the appellant intended to pull down both structures upon the completion of the cottages.

Held, first, that the bye-laws had been sufficiently published by compliance with the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848.

Held, secondly, that the structures in question were not "buildings" within the meaning of the bye-laws; and that, if the bye-laws had been intended to include them, they would have been unreasonable.

Query, how far an excessive delegation of the powers of a local authority to a town surveyor may render such bye-laws illegal.

APPEAL from justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The following case was stated:—

This is a case stated by the undersigned, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Flint, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before us as hereinafter stated.

1. At a petty sessions holden at Rhyl, in and for the division of Rhuddlan, in the county of Flint, on the 30th April 1877, and thence adjourned until the 28th May 1877, an application preferred by Arthur Rowlands, clerk to the Rhyl Improvement Commissioners (hereinafter called the respondents), against James Fielding (hereinafter called the appellant), under the bye-laws Nos. 36 and 41 of the said commissioners, made on the 1st Dec. 1865 (and duly confirmed by Her Majesty's Secretary of State), charging for that he, the said James Fielding, on the 19th Feb. 1877, at the parish of Rhuddlan, in the said county of Flint, unlawfully did erect certain new buildings and works within the district of the said Rhyl Improvement Commissioners, without giving (and the said James Fielding did then and there omit to give) notice to the town surveyor of Rhyl aforesaid of his (the said James Fielding's) intention so to do, and without at the same time leaving, or causing to be left, detail plans and sections of such buildings and works for the approval of the said surveyor, contrary to the bye-laws in that behalf duly made by the said commissioners then in force in the said district, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being then present; and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 2*l.*, to be paid and applied according to the law, and also to pay the complainant, the said Arthur Rowlands, the sum of 7*l.* 17*s.* for his costs in that behalf, and if the said several sums were not paid forthwith, we ordered that the same should be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said James Fielding.

2. And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this honourable court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the statute in that behalf.

3. Now, therefore, we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case.

4. Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondents, and found as a fact, or admitted on the part of the appellant, that on Feb. 19, 1877, certain structures of brick and mortar were in course of erection on land of the appellant, situate within the district of the Rhyl Improvement Commissioners. Structure No. 1 was built with 9in. walls, and contained two rooms, one of which had a fireplace and chimney. Structure No. 2 consisted of upright walls some two feet thick in the form of a square, having an opening at either end, and measuring about twelve yards on each side. The appellant had in contemplation the building of a number of cottages in the immediate neighbourhood of such structures, and the first-mentioned structure was for the storing of tools and general convenience of the workmen proposed to be employed in the erection of such cottages; the other being for the purpose of a brick-kiln. Both structures were intended to be pulled down by the appellant upon the completion of the cottages in question. Notice was sent by the town surveyor to the appellant that he was infringing the bye-laws of the commissioners, to which the appellant replied by inquiring which of the bye-laws was being infringed. The surveyor pointed out that he was infringing the bye-laws relating to the erection of new buildings within the district of Rhyl. No notice in writing or detail plans and sections of the structures or of the proposed cottages were at any time sent or submitted to the town surveyor. The adoption of various sections, including sections 115 and 116 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) and sect. 34 of the Public Health Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. s. 98) by the Rhyl Improvement Commissioners was proved.

The bye-laws in question were put in evidence, and proved, as was also their printing and publication, in conformity with sects. 115 and 116 of the Public Health Act 1848. A copy of such bye-laws accompanies this case. On the part of the appellant it was contended, firstly, that the bye-laws were bad; (a) from insufficient publication, and that proof should have been given that such bye-laws were published in the manner directed by sect. 105 of the Towns Improvement Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), which Act is incorporated in the Rhyl Improvement Act 1853, and that a copy thereof should have been painted and placed on boards and hung upon some conspicuous part of the locality to which the same relate, and that the publication, as directed by the Public Health Act 1848, was insufficient; (b) that such bye-laws exceeded the powers given by the Act under which they were made; (c) and that they were unreasonable, and therefore bad at law, in leaving the approval and disapproval of plans in the hands of the town surveyor. Secondly, that the structures in question, being only temporary erections, were not buildings within the meaning of the bye-laws and of the Act of Parliament under which the bye-laws were framed.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that proof of publication of the bye-laws, as required by sects. 115 and 116 of the Public Health Act 1848, was sufficient, and that the Town Improvement Act 1847 did not govern the matter; that the bye-laws in question were just and reasonable; that the structures in question were buildings within the meaning of the bye-laws and of the Public Health Act 1858; that the question whether they were or were not of a temporary character did not become an element in the matter; and even if it did, that in face of the fact that no notice whatever had been given by the appellant to the surveyor of the proposed erections, or of their character or purpose, or of the cottages proposed to be erected, the respondents were compelled to treat them as ordinary and permanent structures.

We, however, being of opinion that the publication of the said bye-laws was properly proved, that they were just and reasonable and within the powers given by the Act of Parliament in that behalf, and that the structures in question were buildings within the meaning of such bye-laws, gave our determination against the appellant in manner before stated.

The questions of law for the opinion of this court therefore are, first, whether publication of the said bye-laws was sufficiently proved? Secondly, whether such bye-laws are just and reasonable within the powers for that purpose given by the Public Health Acts 1848 and 1858? Thirdly, whether the structures in question are buildings within the meaning of the said bye-laws? If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, then such conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said conviction is to be quashed. Signed by the Justices.

By sect. 28 of the Rhyl Improvement Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. civ.), it was enacted that the Rhyl Improvement Commissioners might make bye-laws with regard to certain specified matters, including the regulation of all new buildings within the district; and it was further provided that the provisions of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, with respect to bye-laws, should apply to all the bye-laws so made, and to all the bye-laws respectively authorised to be made by that Act, and that the prescribed manner of confirmation should be as the local government board should in each case determine.

The commissioners had accordingly made certain bye-laws, of which the following were referred to and are material:

36. Notice, Plans, &c., of New Buildings.—Every person who shall intend to erect any new building shall give a week's notice to the town surveyor of such intention, by writing delivered to the said surveyor or left at his office, and shall at the same time leave or cause to be left at the said office detail plans and sections of every floor of such intended new buildings, drawn to a scale of not less than one inch to every eight feet, showing the position, form, and dimensions of the several parts of such building, and of the water-closet, privy, cesspool, ashpit, well, and all other appurtenances; and such plans and sections shall be accompanied by a description of the materials of which the building is proposed to be constructed, and of the intended mode of drainage and means of water supply.

37. Powers of the Town Surveyor to disapprove of Plans.—If the town surveyor disapprove of the mode proposed in such notice, section, and plans, he shall within six days after receiving the same give notice in writing to such person of the particulars of such disapproval, and of the requirements of the commissioners in respect to the proposed work; and it shall not be lawful to begin to build or rebuild any such building, or to construct any drain, privy, water-closet, or ashpit, until the section and plans have been approved by the town surveyor, and no person shall deviate from such approved section or plan.

40. Notice by Town Surveyor in case of Irregularity.—If in doing any work, or erecting any building, anything is done contrary to the rules herein contained, or anything required by these rules is omitted to be done, or if the town surveyor finds, on surveying or inspecting any building or work, that the same is so far advanced that he cannot ascertain whether anything has been done contrary to the rules herein contained, or whether anything required by such rules has been omitted to be done; the town surveyor shall (within six hours after such survey or inspection) give to the builder or person engaged in erecting such building, or in doing such work, notice in writing, requiring such builder or person, within forty-eight hours from the date of such notice, to cause anything done contrary to the rules herein contained to be amended, or to do anything required to be done by such rules which has been omitted to be done; or to cause so much of any building or work as prevents such town surveyor from ascertaining whether anything has been done or omitted to be done, as aforesaid, to be to a sufficient extent cut into, laid open, or pulled down.

41. Penalties for not giving Notices, &c.—If any owner or person shall construct, or cause to be constructed, any works, or do any act, or omit to do any act, or comply with any requirement of the commissioners, or the town surveyor, contrary to the provisions herein contained, he shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and he shall pay a further sum not exceeding 40*s.* for each and every day during which such work shall continue or remain contrary to the said provisions; and the town surveyor may, if he shall think fit, cause such work to be removed, altered, pulled down, or otherwise dealt with, as the case may require, and the expenses incurred by him in so doing shall be repaid by the offender, and be recoverable from him in a summary manner.

FIELDING v. RHYL IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

It was proved that the commissioners had adopted sects. 115 and 116 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), and sect. 34 of the Public Health Act 1858, and that the bye-laws made by them had been published in conformity with those provisions. The requirements of the Towns Improvements Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34) had not been complied with, so far as the publication of the bye-laws was concerned.

Wills for the appellant.—First, we say that the bye-laws were insufficiently published. The mode of publication prescribed by the Rhyl Improvement Act 1852, and by the Public Health Act 1847, has not been followed; and it is not sufficient to have complied with the regulations of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 116. Secondly, the bye-laws themselves are illegal. The powers delegated by them to the surveyor are unreasonable and excessive (bye-laws 37, 41). Thirdly, the structures in respect of which the appellant was convicted were not buildings within the meaning of the bye-laws.

Higgins (Musgrave with him) for the respondents.—The bye-laws were properly made and published under the Act of 1848. We had no power to make bye-laws under the Towns Improvement Act 1847, and therefore could not publish them according to the provisions of that Act. The power deputed to the surveyor is not excessive, and the bye-laws are therefore reasonable:

Hall v. Nixon, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 153.

They are not confined in their operation to dwelling-houses, and include the structures in question.

Wills in reply.

DENMAN, J.—In this case the appellant Fielding complains of the decision of two justices in favour of the Rhyl Improvement Commissioners, the respondents, under which the appellant was fined under a bye-law made by the commissioners. The bye-laws on which the justices professed to act were bye-laws 36 and 41 of those made by the respondents; and it is argued that the appellant ought to succeed on the first point made in this case, because there was no sufficient publication of these bye-laws. The answer given to that is, I think, a sufficient one; for, as far as I can see, it appears to me that the particular matter to which this bye-law applies was not a matter which came within the statute which requires publication by means of a board, but within the statute which only requires publication by putting up a copy of the bye-laws in a certain part of the place or office. It is not, however, on that ground that I am going to decide the case, as there is another reason, much more free from doubt, for deciding it in favour of the appellant. The second question raised is, whether the bye-laws are just and reasonable within the powers given to the commissioners by the Public Health Acts of 1848 and 1858. On that second question it appears to me that the answer depends upon the construction to be put on the bye-laws themselves; and if I could come to the conclusion that the bye-laws could fairly bear the construction put on them by the respondents, I should think them unjust, unreasonable, and absurd; and it is because I think that would be the result of deciding in favour of the respondents, that I am now holding them to be reasonable and just. The third question is, whether these structures are buildings within the meaning of the bye-law. The word building, which is the word used, is a general word and might mean anything that could possibly be called a building; but I do not think the bye-law can be construed in that way, when we look at all its provisions as we are bound to do. The bye-law relied on by the respondents is r. 36, and it is to the effect that every person intending to erect a new building within the district shall give a week's notice, and leave or cause to be left at the office of the town surveyor detail plans and sections of every floor of such intended new building, showing the position, form, and dimensions of all the parts, and of the water-closet, privy, cesspool, and all other appurtenances thereof. It is true that the word building is a large word, and in itself might include any erection which could in any sense be designated by such an expression. But looking at the whole, it would be a reductio ad absurdum to apply these bye-laws to at least one of these structures. One of them is a blank wall, apparently erected on ground without any residential quality whatever, and for the purpose, as is alleged, of having bricks burnt within it. It would be absurd to suppose that was a building for which plans and sections as described above were to be supplied. It cannot have been intended to apply to such a building as this. So far as that part of the case goes the argument is very strong. With regard to the other structure there is more difficulty. That is described to be a structure of brick and mortar in course of erection on land of the appellant with nine-inch walls, containing two rooms, a fireplace, and a chimney. Then it goes on to say this structure was intended to be used for the storing of tools and general convenience of the workmen. It does not say that anybody was to dwell in it, or that it was to serve any purpose but the storing of tools and the general convenience of the workmen; and it does by inference say that it was a temporary structure, to be used merely for the purposes contemplated in what I have just read. It would be, in my opinion, absurd to hold that this was a building within the bye-law, so as to render it necessary to give notice of its erection and deposit plans with the local commissioners. I think therefore the justices were wrong.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the true construction of the 36th bye-law. I may say, first, on the preliminary point, that I think it may be properly held that these bye-laws were made under the Act of 1848, and not under the Act of 1847; and in that case the objection which has been taken to the sufficiency of their publication falls to the ground. Coming to the bye-law itself, we must look first at the general drift of the laws, and consider their headings and subdivisions. The heading of bye-law 38 is, "Notice, plans, &c., of new buildings." Now, we have not in this case to determine, what might be a difficult question, as to whether any particular building is a building or not, where it is not a temporary one, because I understand from the case that these buildings were temporary. I understand that the justices were satisfied that they were temporary merely, and that the builder intended to pull them down after a short time. That is not saying merely that the builder said he intended to remove them, but that they were actually temporary as a matter of fact. I cannot think that this bye-law is applicable to such a structure as this. It is quite obvious that the persons who framed these laws never dreamed of their being applied in such a way; and, if there were any words in them which did force me to think they did apply, I should think them unreasonable and absurd. But I do not see any such words, and hold that, on the true construction of this bye-law, it does not apply to such structures. I need not allude further to the other points raised, or decide how far these bye-laws exceed the proper limits of the delegation of authority, but I was considerably impressed by that part of the argument. It is, no doubt, a very considerable delegation of authority. Our judgment must be for the appellant.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Dec. 5 and 6, 1877.

(Before KELLY, O.B., POLLOCK and CLEASBY, BB.)

THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA v. WILSON. (a)

Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Separate dwelling-house—Premises occupied for the purpose of trade only—Telegraph company—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, sched. B., rules 6, 14—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36—32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11.

The building, known as Nos. 65 and 66, Old Broad-street, consisted of a basement, ground floor, and of upper floors running over the ground floor of the premises No. 66, as well as over a portion of No. 65. There was an entrance hall on the ground floor of No. 66, with a staircase leading to the first and upper floors. No. 66 comprised the basement under this hall, the hall itself, and the whole of the first and upper floors. No. 65 consisted of the remainder of the ground floor and basement. The two premises had distinct and separate entrances into the street, but a second entrance to No. 66 was afforded through No. 65, by means of a door in a lobby leading from the entrance of No. 65 to the entrance hall of No. 66. This door afforded the sole internal communication between the two premises, and was kept open during banking hours, in order to afford a second entrance into No. 66, but, when closed at night by the bank porter, completely separated the two premises. No. 65 was occupied by the appellants, and No. 66, with the exception of a room occupied by a caretaker employed by the appellants, was let to a telegraph company, and used by them solely for the purposes of their business.

Held, that the premises No. 65 and 66 were properly rated to the inhabited house duty as one inhabited house.

Held also (Kelly, O.B. and Pollock, B.; Cleasby B. dissenting), that premises occupied for the purpose of carrying on the business of a telegraph company are premises occupied for "the purposes of trade only," within the meaning of 32 &

33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, and are therefore exempt from assessment to the inhabited house duty.

CASE, stated under 37 Vict. c. 16, s. 9, by commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties, on appeal against an assessment to the inhabited house duties for the year ending 5th April 1874, of 5500*l.*, being the full value of the whole of the appellants' premises, Nos. 65 and 66, Old Broad-street, in the city of London, the appellants claiming exemption under the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11.

The premises, constituting Nos. 65 and 66, Old Broad-street, are situate at the corner of Old Broad-street and Austinfriars. They consist of a basement, ground floor, and of upper floors running over a portion of the premises known as No. 65. There are two separate main entrances from the street, one in Old Broad-street, known as No. 65, and the other in Austinfriars, known as No. 66. The entrance to the portion of the premises known as No. 66 is in Austinfriars. There is a lobby on the ground floor, containing a staircase leading to the first and upper floors, and a staircase leading to the basement under this lobby. These premises No. 66 comprise the basement under this lobby, the lobby itself, and the whole of the first and upper floors.

The entrance to No. 65 is in Old Broad-street, and the premises consist of the remainder of the ground floor and basement. The basements of No. 65 and No. 66 are completely separated by brick walls and approached by separate staircases.

The premises No. 65 are in the occupation of the appellants, and used by them as a bank and for the purpose of carrying on their business as bankers.

The premises No. 66 are (with the exception of two rooms on the third floor, occupied by a caretaker, employed by the appellants, and his wife, who reside there for the protection of the entire premises) let to the Eastern Telegraph Company (Limited), and are occupied by them solely for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company. The whole of the orders for the management of the business of the company are issued from the premises so occupied by the company, and all the accounts between the company and their customers, and between the company and their own shareholders, are kept on such premises.

With the exception of the caretaker and his wife, no person sleeps on any portion of the premises No. 65 or 66.

The entrance to No. 65 from Old Broad-street opens into a lobby, through which is the access to the appellants' bank premises.

The only internal communication between Nos. 65 and 66 is through this lobby.

The regular entrance to the premises No. 66 is by the door from Austinfriars; but during banking hours the iron doors between the lobby to No. 65 and that to No. 66 are allowed by the appellants to be open so as to enable the Eastern Telegraph Company, by crossing the lobby to No. 65, to have an access to their premises from Old Broad-street, which is to some more convenient than the entrance from Austinfriars. At the close of the bank business of the day these iron doors are, with the entrance No. 65, Old Broad-street, closed and locked by the bank porter who keeps the keys of both doors, and when this is done the bank premises are completely shut off from the rest of the building, and the only approach to the premises No. 66 is from Austinfriars.

In the valuation list made for the City under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, in the year 1870, the premises were valued as one building and were thenceforth until 1875 rated to the poor as one building; but upon the appeal of the appellants against the new valuation list made in the year 1875 the assessment has been divided and Nos. 65 and 66 are now separately assessed and rated to the poor.

The appellants contend, first, that no part of the premises form an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, sect. 2, and that, even if they come within that section, they would still be exempt under the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, inasmuch as they were used for the purposes of trade only. Second, that the bank premises are occupied for the purpose of trade only, and that they are so structurally severed from the rest of the building as to be a different tenement for rating purposes, and that, even if the premises in the occupation of the telegraph company are not exempt and are not occupied as trade premises within the meaning of this statute, yet the assessment is wrong inasmuch as the whole of the premises are rated therein. Third, that whether this is so or not, the assessment was bad as being to the full value, although a considerable part of the premises were in the occupation of the appellants for the purposes of trade only.

In the year 1870 the appellants were assessed to the inhabited house duty for the year 1869 ending the 5th April 1870, as the occupiers of the premises No. 65, and having by mistake paid the amount, it was, on their application to the Board of Inland Revenue, refunded on the ground that the premises occupied by the appellants were exempt under the 11th section of the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14. During the whole of that year 1869-70, the premises No. 66 were unoccupied, with the exception of the two rooms on the third floor, occupied by the caretaker, but from that time the occupation has been as at present.

The premises were again assessed for 1872-3, and an appeal was made against that assessment on the 12th June 1873, when it was contended on behalf of the Crown that this case should be governed by case No. 2845, decided by the judges, in which it was stated that in their opinion the booking offices, waiting room, board room, and other offices of the South-Eastern Railway Company, were liable as not being used for the purposes of trade, and as these premises were similarly occupied by the telegraph company and the bank, they were also liable. The commissioners confirmed the assessment on that occasion, and the duty for 1872 was paid.

The appellants, however, have taken the first opportunity of appealing against the assessment since the statute allowing an appeal was passed.

Finding on the present occasion that the circumstances were unaltered, the commissioners again confirmed the assessment, whereupon the appellants declared their dissatisfaction with the decision, and duly required them to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The Act under which the inhabited house duty is levied is that of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, the assessment being regulated under the rules of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, sched. B.

32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11:

Any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse, for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, or building used as a shop or counting-house, shall be exempt from inhabited house duty, although a servant or other person shall dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for the protection thereof.

F. M. White, Q.C. (Saunderson with him) for the appellants.—The two houses in respect of which this assessment has been made are distinct and separate tenements, and should therefore, if liable to taxation, be separately assessed. But they are exempt from assessment as premises occupied for purposes of trade only, within the meaning of the exemption contained in sect. 11 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14. The business of a telegraph company is a trade within the meaning of that section, even though no actual buying and selling takes place. On the first point he cited

The Attorney-General The Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, 1 Ex. Div. 489.

Sir H. Giffard, S.G. (Dicey with him) for the Crown.—The first question is this—Does the building fall within the exemption of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11. It is not occupied for "the purposes of trade only." It is clear from the definitions given in Webster's and Richardson's Dictionaries that trade means actual buying and selling. Under the Bankruptcy Acts the test as to whether or not a man was a trader was, whether his business was one of which buying and selling was a necessary and indispensable constituent. The business of a life insurance company has been held not to be within the exemption:

The Edinburgh Life Assurance Company v. The Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Cases in the Court of Session, 4th series, vol. 2, p. 394.

He was proceeding to argue the question as to whether the premises in question formed one inhabited house, when he was stopped by the Court.

KELLY, C.B.—We think we are justified in pronouncing our judgment in this case in its present stage. With regard to the question which has been argued by counsel for the appellants, and which has not yet been argued by the Solicitor-General, speaking for myself alone, I might, independently of the authorities in this court, have been disposed to entertain some doubts whether this was really to be deemed one tenement, and so to be liable to the duty in question. But my learned brethren are decidedly of opinion that it is to be deemed one tenement, and that therefore it is liable to duty; and on looking to the authorities, whatever doubts I might have been disposed to entertain, I do not feel disposed to differ with my brethren, and therefore upon that point our judgment must be for the Crown. But with regard to the question of whether this tenement, or whatever it may be called, is to be deemed a tenement occupied as a house for the purpose of trade only, I am clearly of opinion that it is to be deemed a house or tenement occupied for the purposes of trade. The main ground upon which I found that opinion is that in these days, and in this great commercial country, we are bound to put a large and liberal construction upon any terms of an Act of Parliament where the construction proposed to be put upon it is in favour of the trade and commerce of the country. Undoubtedly, if we are to take the words "for the purposes of trade" as relating only to a business of buying and selling, no one could say that there is any buying and selling in carrying on the business of a telegraph company. But I think it was never the intention of the Legislature, in a provision of this nature, so to limit the meaning of the word "trade." It is not only the literal meaning of the word which is to be regarded. In literature of all descriptions, both in prose and verse, whether with regard to commerce or with regard to any other subject with relation to which the term may be used, we find that the word "trade" is often used in a much more extensive signification than merely the operation or occupation of buying and selling. And why are we to limit it in a case of this nature to buying and selling? When we find that from improvements in machinery, and the advancement of science, and the vast accumulation of subjects and materials and operations which have come into practice and use in the world, and especially in this great commercial country; when we find the word "trade" used not singly and simply by itself; and where we also find it in a provision of this nature, I cannot feel any doubt but that the real object of the section was to protect the commerce and the whole of the commercial business of the country. Whatever may be the precise nature of the occupation, if it is one which is practised for the commercial benefit of the country the section was intended to exempt such a case from the liability to this tax. We find the word does not stand alone, but that the section not only says "part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purpose of trade only," but goes on to say, "or as a warehouse for the special purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein." Now, I apprehend that not only in the city of London and in the metropolis, but in Manchester, Liverpool, and all the great commercial towns of this country, a warehouse is the scene of larger and more numerous commercial operations than any description of building that can well be imagined. There may well be warehouses where there is nothing like buying and selling, but where goods are deposited, and there may be persons who may be traders in other respects, and who likewise carry on that business independently of their own particular trade. When we find, then, this example given in the section, "a warehouse for the purpose of lodging goods, wares, and merchandise therein," and nothing like buying and selling referred to, or at all pointed at, I think we may apply the maxim, Noscitur a sociis, and construe the earlier provision about a house used "for the purposes of trade only" upon the same principle as the provision which next follows respecting warehouses, which has been given as an example by the Legislature, and in which there is nothing like buying and selling carried on. The section then proceeds to mention the words, "a shop or counting-house." Now, a shop undoubtedly is a place in general in which nothing is carried on but buying and selling. I say "in general," because it is not always so. I have heard the expression repeatedly, and we find it in books, that a banker's is a "shop;" and yet in a bank there is nothing like buying and selling as generally understood; but it is a trade or business of a description quite sui generis. Then we come to a "counting-house." Now, a counting house is a building or apartment in which every description of commercial business which can be imagined is usually carried on. A tradesman doing any large amount of business has, independently of his shop, a counting house in which the business of that department of the concern is carried on. Merchants who live by buying and selling have it, and so have a variety of descriptions of commercial men—in fact, almost every description of man of business has something like a counting-house in which he carries on his business or a portion of his business. Therefore there again we have one of the largest and most comprehensive terms which the English language contains introduced into this provision for exemption. I think therefore, applying the maxim noscitur a sociis, we may reasonably infer that the Legislature never intended by the use of this word "trade" to limit the business carried on, which is to exempt the occupier of the tenement from the tax in question, to purely buying and selling. We may reasonably say that it was intended to embrace a great variety of different operations, though all of a commercial character—something, therefore, like a warehouse, like a shop, like a counting-house. All these separate parts of this exemption are, in my opinion, to be construed upon the same principle of construction, which is, that a large and literal interpretation is to be put on the exemption which the Legislature has provided for persons who do in fact carry on, or assist in carrying on, the commercial business of the country, whatever may be the precise mode of doing so. I have only a word to say about the Scotch case which has been cited. I have the greatest respect for the decisions of the Court of Session in Scotland upon commercial, as well as other, questions. But when we consider that the judgment of the learned judges in that case related to a life assurance company, there is something so totally different in a life assurance company from anything in the nature of a telegraph company that I cannot think the authority in question has any bearing upon the present case. The difference is substantial in every way. A life assurance company, in one sense, may be said to be a commercial undertaking; but, on the other hand, it is one of a very peculiar character, and indeed of a very limited character. A life assurance is an agreement or contract made between one man and another, or between an individual and a company, that, in consideration of certain payments made by him during his life, his executors shall at his death become entitled to receive from the company a particular sum of money. I do not know that there is anything of a commercial nature or of a commercial character in a transaction of that kind. It is quite different from the business of a telegraph company. I content myself therefore with saying that, in my opinion, the difference between the two is so manifest both in principle as well as in fact, that I do not consider the case in Scotland at all applicable to the case which is now before the court. Under these circumstances it appears to me that we are bound to put a large and liberal construction upon the exemption, and that therefore upon this point the appellants are entitled to the judgment of the court.

[EX. DIV.]

CLARKE, B.—I confess I think that judgment ought to be given for the Crown, although I deemed it quite unnecessary to have any further argument, because we are all agreed upon the question which the Solicitor-General has not yet argued. Now, as to the first question, I do not entertain any doubt that these premises are to be regarded, for the purpose of applying the law of inhabited house taxation, as an inhabited house. It is a question of considerable difficulty in the first instance; but it has really been considered and decided already, and therefore it is impossible without waste of time to go back, in every case where no essential difference exists, and have a difficult question, which has already been settled by authority, argued over again. Various cases have been referred to; among others, the Weavers' Hall case, and the Westminster Buildings case. The question of part of a tenement was particularly considered in the former of these two cases, and I endeavoured to point out in that case that, on reference to the 57 Geo. 3, you find that, when it speaks of a tenement or part of a tenement, it refers to that which might have been taxed as part of an inhabited house, and that part of a tenement was one tenement in that sense which was subject to taxation. That appeared to me to be decisive of the question that it becomes the same as one house with a separate private entrance altogether—it was part of a tenement in the simple and ordinary meaning of the word, but it was an inhabited house for the purposes of taxation. That is the only explanation, in my opinion, of that term "part of a tenement;" we must read it with the recital of the 57 Geo. 3, from which it appears that it must be part of a tenement which was the subject of taxation as an inhabited house. Now in this case we have this morning seen the lease which has been referred to. I think it would be a waste of time to read the words of it, but the result is this, speaking generally. All the upper floor is let no doubt, but there is a common entrance during the day; that is a great feature of the case. The tenant has a right to go through the entrance of the bank to his premises during the day, and he has a right to put his plate upon the door of the bank, giving a character of unity as it were to the whole; but still more, there is one person living in one part, that is the telegraph part, who has the care of the whole. Those circumstances give to this tenement the character of one house, and in a way which certainly has not occurred in any case which has been decided. There is one person living and sleeping in the apartments, and having common access to the whole. I would particularly desire not to make a mistake upon that. "The premises No. 66 are (with the exception of two rooms on the third floor occupied by a caretaker, the caretaker not being employed by the telegraph company, but employed by the appellants, who resides there for the protection of the entire premises) let to the Eastern Telegraph Company." But upon this a remark occurs which places the appellants in an unfavourable position as regards a part; for if the learned counsel's argument is correct, that these are separate tenements, it is then quite plain that the telegraph part must be assessed as an inhabited house, and for this reason, that assuming the opinion of my learned brothers to be correct (as we will for the purpose), that this is a trade, that part is not exempt, because there is a person who lives there who is not a caretaker of those premises, but who takes care of other premises as well. Therefore, if that conclusion were really the correct one, it must, in my opinion, convey the obligation to have that part of the premises assessed. Now we come to the next part of the case, and after what I have heard from my Lord, I cannot say that I come to the same conclusion. I quite agree that the Scotch decision is not upon the same facts as the present case, because you can see a considerable difference between an insurance society and a telegraph company, and passing by the case of a mutual assurance society, it appears to me that the principles laid down in that case are quite correct, and that if you apply them to the present case we should come to the conclusion that the telegraph company does not come within the exemption of the section. It is necessary, however, to go back to the history of the legislation upon the subject in order to see how one arrives at this conclusion, because it is to a certain extent a system of legislation, and you cannot take one part of it alone without regard to the rest. I will begin by taking the learned Solicitor-General's suggestion that every house that is occupied is an inhabited house. Then you have an exemption made by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, and the importance of referring to this Act arises from the fact that the language of the 57 Geo. 3 is the same as the language of 32 & 33 Vict. I have very little doubt that I am almost repeating the previous argument of the learned Solicitor-General, but not having had the advantage of hearing it, I must give it as my own view. It is said there that, "whereas it is become usual in cities and large towns and other places, for one and the same person, or for each person where two or more persons are in partnership, to occupy a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses for their residence, and at the same time one or more separate and distinct tenements or buildings, or parts of tenements or buildings, for the purposes of trade, or as warehouses for lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as shops and counting-houses, and to abide therein in the daytime only for the purposes of such trades respectively which have been charged with the said recited duties." With regard to the question before us the words which are important are "for the purposes of trade;" it does not say for the purposes of trade only. There is clearly no difference between that Act of Parliament and the one we are now considering, though perhaps it may occur in the enacting part, but it does not in the recital. A little further on we come to the enactment which says "as a house for the purpose of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house." There we come to the enactment. This enactment, having been made and acted upon, was felt to be a grievance to a certain class of persons who did not occupy premises for the purposes of trade, but who occupied premises for the purpose of some employment by which they gained their livelihood. This led to the enactment of 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4 of which is in these terms. After reciting the Act of 57 Geo. 3, it says, "Whereas by an Act passed in the fifty-seventh year of Geo. 3 provision is made for granting exemptions"—I will not read them in detail—"and whereas it is expedient to extend the same exemptions to the cases herein mentioned, be it further enacted

THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA v. WILSON.

that, upon all assessments to be made for any year commencing from and after 5th day of April 1824, the provisions in the said Act contained for granting exemptions from the said duties to persons in trade in respect of houses, tenements, or buildings in the said Act described, shall and may be extended and applied by the respective commissioners and officers acting in the execution of the said Act and of this Act, on due proof, to all and to every person, or any number of persons in partnership together for and in respect of any house, tenement, or building, or part of a tenement or building, in the said Act described, which shall be used by such person or persons as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business, or calling by which such person or persons shall seek a livelihood or profit." You have here, therefore, in reference to this particular subject of taxation, a clear distinction drawn between premises occupied for the purposes of trade, or as warehouses, or counting-houses, or shops, and premises which are occupied as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of carrying on any business of profit. That is the way in which the law stood until we come to the Act of 32 & 33 Vict. The Acts of Parliament, hitherto, did not allow any person to sleep on the premises at all; they must be upon the premises by day only. When the enactment took place which we are now considering, however—whether intentionally or unintentionally it is not for me to say, it may or may not have been intended—the enactment is made to apply only to these premises mentioned in the 57 Geo. 3, that is to say, counting-houses and so on, and it is not made to apply to those matters enumerated in the 5 Geo. 4, where persons occupy offices or counting-houses for the purpose of carrying on any business whereby they obtain a livelihood. The language of the larger section, which I am now considering, is precisely the same as the language of the 57 Geo. 3, with the exception of the addition put at the end—but I do not think that can have any bearing upon the present question—"or being used as such." I do not think that can make any difference. It was upon this that they proceeded in the Scotch case—that the Legislature had drawn a distinction between premises used for the purposes of trade, and offices or premises occupied for the purposes of carrying on any vocation or business. Those are the Acts of Parliament, and there is a distinction made, and there is nothing whatever to repeal it; and I should feel myself departing from the distinction which the Legislature itself has pointed out, if I were to say that those premises, which would in my opinion clearly come within the 57 Geo. 3, as being offices for the purpose of carrying on business, were offices or premises occupied for the purposes of trade only. I think we should be saying there is no distinction between the two; but the Act of Parliament says there is, for these are plainly the offices of the telegraph company, and occupied by them, and would be exempt from taxation as an inhabited house if no person slept there by night, and if they were only used by day; but if a person does sleep there by night they do not come within the words of this exemption. For the reasons which I have stated, I think the Crown is entitled to our judgment.

POLLOCK, B.—In my opinion the appellants are entitled to our judgment; and, inasmuch as there is no difference of opinion, or any reasonable doubt, after so many decisions upon the same subject with regard to the character of the premises, I think it will be quite sufficient for me to give my reasons for agreeing with my Lord upon the question of whether or not this telegraph company can be said to be using these premises for the purposes of trade. Now, no precise description of the business of this company is given to us; but there is some material, although not much, for us to infer what is the nature of the business. They are described in the case as a telegraph company (limited). It is said that these premises are occupied by them solely for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company. The whole of the orders for the management of the business are issued from the premises so occupied by the company, and all the accounts between the company and their own shareholders are kept on such premises. Now, as I understand the business of a company like that, they have not merely to transmit by electric apparatus messages from one part of the world to the other, but they have also to do all those things which are conditions precedent to their doing so, in the way of acquiring machinery and telegraphic communications by wires and cables, and arrangements for the repairs of their cables, involving either the direct purchase of the materials or the entering into contracts for their repairs by others who do purchase those materials; and they have also to keep up correspondence and communication with many parts of the world, receiving money and paying money, and having clerks who keep their accounts. Now, that being so, can this business, which is carried on by them, be properly said to be within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, or these series of Acts of Parliament, for I entirely agree with my brother Cleasby that we must take them as a series with which we have to deal, of such a nature that the telegraph company can be said to occupy these premises for the purpose of trade? Now one is almost tired of citing rules and principles whereby statutes are to be construed; but there is one rule which I think is perfectly clear, and that I find so well expressed by Sir Benson Maxwell in his very able work on the interpretation of the statutes, that I will take his words rather than use my own. He begins his second chapter of the 1st section in this way: "In interpreting a statute it is to be borne in mind at the outset that language is always used secundum subjectam materiam, and that it must therefore be understood in the sense which best harmonises with the subject-matter." That, I think, is a very good and a very clear proposition. Now, that being so, what was the subject-matter of this statute, and what was the spirit of the distinction to be created? It was a distinction between persons who inhabited houses for the purposes of residence and persons who occupied "houses" as they were then called, for the purposes of trade; and you find coupled with the word "trade," as my Lord has said, such places as warehouses for lodging goods, wares, and merchandise therein, or shops or counting-houses, thereby expressing that as the antithesis, as it were, which it is the intention of the statute to establish. Now I think, if I am right in the construction which I have put upon the statute and the spirit in which I construe it, that it would be a somewhat dangerous rule to depart from the meaning which the words would require upon that principle, because I find in the subsequent statute other words introduced for a more extended purpose by the Legislature. If it is for me to choose between the two rules of construction, I would rather prefer the construction adopted by my Lord, than that which has been adopted by my brother Cleasby, in the construction of the latter statute; but I regard it as a very important matter, and I do not think it is a matter to be treated lightly, nor do I think it is a question which is perfectly free from doubt; but I have applied my mind, as best I can, to see what is the fair and reasonable meaning of the words "for the purposes of trade" in the section. Now some citations were made in the course of the argument from dictionaries, and I would only say that I would personally avoid citing any word from dictionaries as implying in any sense a definition, because such a course is dangerous; but one may cite from a dictionary, or a work of good repute, to see what is the common acceptance of a word. Yesterday two dictionaries, one Richardson's and the other Webster's, were cited for the purpose of giving us a definition of the term, but I have found a definition in Johnson's which seems to me to be more near the spirit in which I am construing the words. It is the second meaning which he gives, in which trade is described as an "occupation or particular employment, whether manual or mercantile, as distinguished from the arts or the learned professions." That is a very fair expression of the meaning of the word in common parlance, when you are speaking of whether a person exercises a profession or whether he carries on a trade; and in the same way, whether a person occupies a house for the purpose of dwelling therein personally, or whether he occupies it for the purpose of carrying on a trade. Now another head of argument, and one of course to which we ought to attend with the greatest care, is that which is used by the learned Solicitor-General in regard to the Bankruptcy Act; and no doubt the word trade was originally there intended as applying only to persons who either bought or sold, or whose business was immediately cognate to the buying or selling of goods; but even then you find from time to time the words used in a much looser sense, and although we have no right to refer to the enlargement of the number of persons who have been made liable to become bankrupts by different statutes from time to time, we may look at these statutes to see in what sort of sense they used the word themselves. I find in one statute as far back as James I. that a scrivener may be bankrupt. In the 21 James I. c. 19, s. 2, the words used are, "Or that shall use the trade or profession of a scrivener, receiving other men's moneys or estates into his trust or custody." Therefore, even there you find the word used in a wider sense than that of mere buying or selling. And in Christian's Bankruptcy Law you find thirty or forty pages devoted to considering all the different cases in which, apart from the statute law, persons have been made bankrupts who have not actually been traders in the limited sense of buying or selling, or bartering. I do not think, however, myself that that is a true guide to our conclusion in this case. I would rather say that, although the statutes relating to bankruptcy present some analogy, they do not present a true analogy, because the contemplation of the statute and the common law too was devoted to a very different purpose from that which was the object and intention of the statute which is now under our consideration. I thought it right to say so much, because, as I said before, this is an important matter, and it is a matter in which one is desirous of giving the ground of the conclusion at which we have come. Upon these grounds I think the appellants are entitled to our judgment.

LORD v. MULKERN.

LORD v. MULKERN. (a)

Building society—Mortgage to the society by a member—Action to redeem—Reference to arbitration—Friendly Societies Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56), s. 27—Construction.

In a suit by a member of a benefit building society (enrolled under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and not re-registered under the Building Societies Act 1874) to redeem property mortgaged by him to the society and for an account, the defendants asked that all matters might be referred to arbitration.

The rules of the society provided that any dispute arising between the society and any member thereof should be referred to arbitration pursuant to 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27.

Held, that the arbitration clause in the Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, only applied to disputes between the society and its members as members, and did not apply to a redemption suit where the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee existed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls. The action was brought by a member of the Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society against the trustees of the society, for the redemption of property which he had mortgaged to secure a loan of 14,000*l.* and interest which they had advanced to him. The society had entered into possession of the property. The society was enrolled in April 1851, under the Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), by which the provisions of the Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, which relates to friendly societies, are made applicable to benefit building societies. By sect. 27 of that Act it is enacted that "provision shall be made by the rules of every such society specifying whether a reference of every matter in dispute between any such society or any person acting under them and any individual member thereof, or person claiming on account of any member shall be made to any of His Majesty's justices of the peace as may act in and for the county in which such society may be formed, or to arbitrators to be appointed in manner hereinafter directed . . . and whatever award shall be made by the said arbitrators, or the major part of them, according to the true purport and meaning of the rules of the society, shall be binding and conclusive on all parties, and shall be final to all intents and purposes, without appeal." The rules of the Birkbeck Society provide that, "in case any dispute arises between the society and any member thereof, or the legal representatives of any member, reference shall be made to arbitration pursuant to 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27, unless such dispute can be amicably arranged," and arbitrators appointed. The plaintiff having moved before the Master of the Rolls for preliminary accounts, the defendants applied for an order that all matters in dispute between the parties should be referred to arbitration pursuant to the rules of the society.

The Master of the Rolls having ordered a reference to arbitration, the plaintiff appealed.

Davey, Q.O. and Bush, for the appellant, contended that neither the rules of the society, nor sect. 27 of the Act of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, had any application to disputes between the society and its members in their character of mortgagor and mortgagee, but only to disputes between the society and its members in their character of members. This point was not taken before the Master of the Rolls, because it was thought that his Lordship, in a recent case of Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (L. Rep. 5 Ch. Div. 726), had adopted an opposite view. That case, however, was under the Building Societies Act of 1874, in which the arbitration clause differed in its terms from the 27th section of the Act of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56. In support of the present contention, they relied upon Morrison v. Glover (14 L. T. Rep. 183, 204; 4 Ex. Rep. 490), which, they submitted, was exactly a case in point. There a building society lent money to a member on mortgage of leasehold property, and the member covenanted to observe the rules of the society, and also to pay the rent reserved by the lease, and the trustees of the society having sued for breaches of both these covenants, it was held that, as some part of the plaintiff's claim was not a matter in dispute between the society and the defendant as member, but only as mortgagor, the society was not bound by its rules to refer to arbitration the subject-matter of the action. They also referred to

Fleming v. Self, 24 L. T. Rep. 101; 3 De G. M. & G. 997;

Cutbill v. Kingdom, 10 L. T. Rep. 114; 1 Ex. Rep. 464;

Moseley v. Baker, 6 Hare, 87; 1 Hall & T. 301;

Seagrave v. Pope, 19 L. T. Rep. 173; 1 De G. M. & G. 783;

Crispe v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394.

Waller, Q.C. and Owen, for the trustees, contended there was no material difference between the Building Societies Act of 1874 and that of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and that the court would put an end to what was clearly intended by those Acts, if parties were not to be allowed to go to an arbitrator instead of incurring the expense of a suit in the High Court. In the case of Prentice v. London (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 251; L. Rep. 10 P. C. 679), the question was between the trustees and a member, with regard to a mortgage transaction, and it was considered that questions between a building society and a member were properly referable to arbitration. They also cited

Reeves v. White, 17 Q. B. 995; 21 L. J. 169, Q. B.

[BAGGALLAY, L.J.—In giving judgment in the case of Prentice v. London, Lord Coleridge said: "The case seems to me to fall directly into the principle on which Morrison v. Glover was decided;" and Brett, J. said substantially the same thing.]

JAMES, L.J.—There are some decisions which cannot be questioned. Here, the decisions in common law and Chancery which have been referred to have been recognised by several subsequent authorities, and they are perfectly good law, and are binding upon us; and it is not competent to us to overrule them. If you wish to overrule them, you must go to the House of Lords. I do not think that the Master of the Rolls intended in his judgment in Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society to overrule the other decisions. He merely said that they did not apply to the Act of 1874. In my opinion, if the cases which have been cited by Mr. Davey had been referred to at the time, the Master of the Rolls would not for a moment have thought of overruling those decisions.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—This case appears to me to be entirely within the authority of Morrison v. Glover. In fact, we rarely find two cases in which the circumstances are so similar, and Morrison v. Glover has been recognised in every case cited in the course of the argument, including those relied upon on the part of the respondent.

REG. v. CHARLES BRADLAUGH AND ANNIE BESANT. (a)

Obscene libel—Indictment—Omission to set out the words of the libel—Arrest of judgment.

An indictment for publishing an obscene book, which does not set out the passage or passages of such book alleged to constitute the offence, but only refers to the book by its title, is bad, and the defect is not cured by verdict.

THE defendants had been tried in the Court of Queen's Bench (into which court the indictment had been removed by certiorari), on an indictment which charged them with "unlawfully and wickedly devising, contriving, and intending, as much as in them lay, to vitiate and corrupt the morals as well of youth as of divers other subjects of the Queen, and to incite and encourage the said subjects to indecent, obscene, unnatural, and immoral practices, and bring them to a state of wickedness, lewdness, and debauchery, unlawfully, &c., did print, publish, sell, and utter a certain indecent, lewd, filthy, and obscene libel, to wit, a certain indecent, lewd, filthy, and obscene book, called 'Fruits of Philosophy,' thereby contaminating, &c." The jury found that the book was calculated to deprave public morals, but exonerated the defendants from all corrupt motive in publishing it.

REG. v. CHARLES BRADLAUGH AND ANNIE BESANT.

[CT. OF APP.]

Judgment was deferred to a subsequent day, in order that the defendants might move the Court of Queen's Bench to quash the indictment or to arrest judgment, which they accordingly did, on the ground that, in an indictment for this offence, the words said to constitute the libel ought to have been set out. The Court of Queen's Bench, however (consisting of Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J.), decided against the defendants, and judgment was entered, and sentence passed. The case below is reported in L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 569.

The defendants now brought error, assigning several grounds, the only material one, in view of the judgment, being the same as that on which they moved the Court of Queen's Bench, namely, that in an indictment for an offence consisting of words, the words themselves, alleged to constitute the offence, must be set out.

Jan. 29, 30, 31.—The defendants, Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, in person.—There is a mass of authority for saying that, where the alleged offence consists of words, the words ought to appear in the indictment. Many of them are collected in Archbold's Crim. Pl., p. 57, 18th edit. Zenobio v. Astell (6 T. R. 162) was a civil case; but the rule is the same in criminal cases: (Hunter's Case, 2 Leach, 631.) In that case, too, there had been verdict, and yet judgment was arrested. That was a case of forgery, and was before the statute of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 123, by which such necessity was removed in cases of that offence. Ree v. Mason (2 T. R. 581) was a similar case of false pretences, and was not overruled by Reg. v. Goldsmith (28 L. T. Rep. 881; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 74). The same was held in a case of seditious libel: (Ree v. Horne, 20 St. Tr. 793.) Archbold's Crim. Pl. 805, 806, 18th edit., states what it is necessary to set out. In Wright v. Clements (3 B. & Ald. 503) judgment was arrested on this ground. Ree v. Sparling (1 Strange, 498) and Ree v. Popplewell (2 Strange, 685) were cases of swearing and cursing, and there it was held that the oaths used must be set out. So in Reg. v. Howe (1 Strange, 699), where the indictment was for speaking scandalous and contemptuous words of a magistrate in the execution of his office: (Russell on Crimes, 5th edit., vol. 3, p. 219, citing R. v. Sacheverell, 15 How St. Tr. 466; and Tabart v. Tipper, 1 Camp. 352.) In Sacheverell's case the opinion of the judges, ten in number, which is in favour of the defendants here, was not overruled by the House of Lords, before whom Sacheverell was impeached by the Commons; the House did not feel bound by it only because, whatever might be the rule in a court of law, by the law and usage of Parliament no such rule was recognised, and that was not a prosecution in a court of law but an impeachment. The opinion of the judges in Sacheverell's case is quoted by Lord Ellenborough in Cook v. Cox (3 M. & Sel. 110) and recognised by him as an authority. The note to Sacheverell's case, at p. 467, saying that in Layer's case (16 How St. Tr. at p. 317) "the judges without any doubt held this opinion" (of the judges in Sacheverell's case) "to be wrong" is not justified. Eyre, J., it is true, is surprised at it, having thought it was enough if a libel appear by its sense or in substance. Even if that were enough it has not been done here. In Ree v. Orull (17 How St. Tr.; 2 Strange, 789), also a case of obscene libel, all the words were set out. Also in Starkie on Libel, 4th edit., by Folkard, p. 699, it is said that "the libellous matter must be set out in the indictment." There is all this authority in our favour, and no English decision against us. But some American cases will be cited for the prosecution. In Commonwealth v. Holmes (17 Massach. Rep. 335) the libel was not set out, it is true; but, at any rate, there was a count excusing such omission, and giving a reason for it. Commonwealth v. Tarbox (55 Massach. Rep. 66) is in my favour, for there it was held insufficient to paste the libel on to the indictment. But American cases cannot be used as authority, as they do not proceed on English common law, but on the law as contained in the American revised statutes. Commonwealth v. Sharples (2 Serj. & Rawle, Pennsylv. Rep. 91) was a case of a picture, and is not therefore in point. Reg. v. Goldsmith (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 881; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 74; 22 L. J. 94, M. C.) is not against us; Bovill, C.J.'s judgment is expressly in our favour. That was a case of false pretences, an offence which is regulated by statute. In Sill v. The Queen (22 L. J. 41, M. C.), also a case of false pretences, it was held a fatal defect to omit to state on the indictment whose property the money obtained by false pretences was. In Hearne v. Stowell (12 A. & E. 719) judgment was arrested for a defect in a declaration, which caused the connection between the alleged libel and the plaintiff to fail. These cases plainly show the common law rule, which has been altered in some cases by statute, but not in this case. This is not a mere formal defect, but a substantial one, and fully justifies the rule which has made it fatal.

Sir H. S. Giffard (S.G.), and Mead for the Crown.—This defect in the indictment, if it is one, is aided by verdict, for the jury have found the allegation in the indictment, as to the nature and character of this book, to be true. Sacheverell's case (15 How. St. T. 566), though not conclusive one way or the other, shows, at any rate, that it is only a question of practice. The test of what defects verdict will cure is in the answer to the question, Is it an allegation which, though so imperfect and insufficient as that it might be bad on demurrer, is nevertheless proved, and must have been proved, in its particularity, before verdict could have been given thereon? Then, if verdict has been given, the defect must be held to have been cured:

Heyman v. Reg. 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 162; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 102, per Blackburn J.;

Pippet v. Hearn, 5 B. & Ald. 634;

Reg. v. Aspinall, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; L. Rep. 2

Q. B. Div. at p. 57;

Reg. v. Goldsmith, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 881; L. R.

2 C. C. R. 74, which overruled

Ree v. Mason, 2 T. R. 581.

In Sill v. The Queen, 22 L. J. 41, M. C., it was owing to the statute requiring the ownership of the money to be shown that the omission of an allegation stating whose it was was not cured by verdict. In murder, it is true, you must be more particular, but that is by reason of the peculiarity of the offence. Each case depends on its own circumstances. There is less necessity for such a rule now than there was when most of the cases cited were decided; for now, since Fox's Act (32 Geo. 3, c. 60), libel or no libel is not a question for the judge but for the jury. All that can be for the judge is to say that it cannot possibly be a libel. How much must be set out, and what is merely a formal and what a substantial defect, are only questions of degree. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 25, gave a full power of amendment in the case of mere formal defects, provided only that objections to such defects should be taken before the jury were sworn. The book being designated under a videlicet makes no difference. It is a material allegation, and no other libel could have been proved under this indictment. And evidence is admissible to identify a thing named on the indictment, as always had to be done where the indictment named the instrument with which the mischief of which the prisoner was accused was done. And there is no hardship suffered by the defendants. If they lose the power of taking the opinion of a court as to whether the indictment shows any obscene libel to have been published, they get an equivalent, and substantially the same, ground of demurrer in the omission. Layser's case (16 How St. Tr. 93) has destroyed the authority of the opinion of the judges, not acted on, in Sacheverell's case (15 How St. Tr. 467). In Dugdale's case (Dear & P. C. O. 64) there was a similar omission to this, and yet no objection to the indictment on that ground was taken by counsel, nor was such omission noticed by Lord Campbell, who presided. In Reg. v. Aspinall (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 59) the indictment merely amounted to "you conspired to defraud," and yet it was held enough. What distinction can be drawn between conspiracy and this offence for this purpose? The conspiracy was the offence there, so here is the publishing. The court should be careful not to sacrifice substance to form; the jury have seen the book, and have found it an obscene libel. In Reg. v. Perrott (2 M. & Sel. 376.) the indictment contained no allegation that the pretence was false, and therefore was defective, even after verdict; for a verdict of guilty only means guilt of the premises in the indictment contained. In Reg. v. Knight (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801) there was no allegation of defendant's bankruptcy, although it was necessary, but the defect was held to be cured by verdict. In Tarbo's case (55 Massach. Rep. 66) the libel was affected to be set out, but being done in an irregular mode, viz., by pasting on to the indictment, the indictment was held bad. Having affected to set it out, of course they should have done so regularly and accurately.

Mead with him.—The word libel is used in a different sense in obscene, to what it is in defamatory and other libels, and implies a different class of offence altogether. Therefore it may well be that what would be necessary in an indictment for defamatory libel would not be so in one for an obscene libel. The gist of this offence is that it is contra bonos mores; it is not a libel in the ordinary sense: (Reg. v. Ourlil, 2 Strange, 783.) In Archbold's Crim. Pl. p. 314 (18th edit.) is given a precedent for a similar offence which, throughout, does not contain the words "libel" or "publish," but only "sell and utter." A similar precedent occurs in Chitty's Crim. L. vol. 2, p. 46, a book of great authority. That there is some distinction between this and other libels appears also from the fact that an obscene libel is capable of being tried at quarter sessions, whereas other libels were removed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38 from its jurisdiction. The courts will also excuse the setting out of words when they are so obscene that it is undesirable they should be perpetuated on the record. The American decisions cited by the defendants (Commonwealth v. Holmes, 17 Massach. Rep. 335; Commonwealth v. Sharples, 2 Serj. & Rawl. 91; and Commonwealth v. Tarbo's, 55 Massach. Rep. 66) show that that is the law in America; and they are authorities here, as American criminal law is founded on our common law. There is some small English authority, too, in a precedent in Chitty's Crim. L. p. 45, where the libel is alleged to be "in terms or expressions not fit or proper to be named or mentioned in any language, or in any court of justice." It is true there is no such express allegation in this indictment, but the epithets employed are peculiarly strong, and amount to such an allegation by implication.

The defendants in reply.—There is no such distinction as has been contended for between obscene libel and any other. The definition of libel in Russell on Crimes, vol. 3, p. 177, is broad enough to cover all. A blasphemous libel, at any rate, is within the same class of offence, and in R. v. Williams (26 How St. Tr. 653), which was a blasphemous libel, the words were set out. In Archbold's Crim. Pl. 814, the precedent immediately before the one read by Mr. Mead was exactly of this sort, and there the words are set out, and the word libel is used. So also in Starkie on Libel by Folkard, p. 773, form 35. Wilkes's case (4 Burr. 2527) was an obscene libel, and the words were set out. In Curl's case (2 Strange, 789) the discussion on the word libel was merely as to the jurisdiction of spiritual or temporal courts. In that case, too, the words were set out. If the word libel is removed from this indictment, no offence is charged. Fox's Act made no such alteration in the law as is contended; it gave additional protection to defendants. Reg. v. Aspinall (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 57) is in our favour.

Cour. adv. vult.

Feb. 12.—BRAMWELL, L.J.—The question we have to decide is a purely technical one: it is a pure question of law, and does not affect the merits of the defendants' case in the least. It arises in this way. The defendants were indicted for that they "did print, publish, sell, and utter a certain indecent, lewd, filthy, bawdy, and obscene book called 'Fruits of Philosophy,'" and were tried and found guilty. They thereupon moved the Court of Queen's Bench to quash the indictment, and also in arrest of judgment. That rule was refused them, and they now come before us to ask us to say that the Court of Queen's Bench was wrong in that decision. The objection taken to the indictment is that it states that an offence has been committed, but does not show what that offence is—it does not show, on the face of it, what the offence is that is said to have been committed; and, on the other side, it seems to be allowed that this objection would have been a good one if taken on demurrer, but, it is said, it is now taken too late, and is a bad objection in arrest of judgment. Now, the general rule on the subject is clear and beyond all doubt, and by it the indictment must show, on the face of it, the particular offence committed, and how it was committed. That is the general rule at common law, and this case rests wholly on common law principles, no statute being applicable to it. For instance, in an indictment for murder, it is not enough to say a man is indicted "for that he committed murder," or "for that he murdered A. B." So in the case of burglary, it will not do to allege merely that the man committed burglary, but you must set out that the prisoner did, at such and such a time, on a certain day, "break and enter the dwelling-house of A. B.," &c. And there are three reasons given for requiring this particularity, two of which are perhaps unimportant at this day, but the third of which is still a substantial reason. The first reason was that the defendant might know what precise charge he had to meet; the second, that, in the absence of this particularity, it might become difficult afterwards to prove of what precise offence the defendant had been convicted or acquitted, as the case might be. At the present day perhaps these reasons have little weight, as it rarely could happen that there was any real doubt as to the offence the defendant was charged with. But the third reason is even now a substantial one. The third reason for requiring particularity was in order that the defendant might have an opportunity of taking the opinion of a court, either on demurrer, or in arrest of judgment, as to whether the offence he was charged with was an offence at all, or constituted any ground for an indictment. And it was, and is, reasonable that a defendant should have such an opportunity of challenging the indictment, and it is therefore reasonable to require that the indictment shall set out the specific offence which is charged. It follows, therefore, that where the offence consists in words, written or spoken, the words themselves must be stated and set out; and that, where they are not set out, the indictment is on that account defective. So in an indictment for perjury, it has always been held necessary to set out the particular words which are said to constitute the offence: (Chitty's Crim. Law, p. 309.) So also in the case of forgery, it is necessary that the forged document be set out: (Chitty's Crim. Law, p. 1040.) Now, how does it stand in the case of libel? In defamatory libel there can be no doubt that it was necessary, and it seems almost to be conceded that, in that case, it still would be necessary that the words should be set out so that the court might be enabled to tell whether they could be, or indeed whether they were, a libel. To show that that was the law, Cook v. Cox (3 M. & S. 110) is a clear authority. Lord Ellenborough, in delivering judgment in that case, says: "A motion has been made in arrest of judgment, on an objection to the last count. . . . The objection is, that in a count for slander by words, the words themselves should be set out, in order that the defendant may know the certainty of the charge, and may be able to shape his defence. . . . The weight of authorities is against the setting out words by their effect only." And then he cites a number of cases in support of that proposition, and goes on to say that "there seems to be no reason for any difference in this respect between civil and criminal cases; the action arises ex delicto." Certainly, if there were any difference, it would not be that greater laxity was permitted in criminal than is permitted in civil cases. He concludes by saying: "If, however, the authorities cited are law, and they are supported by more ancient ones, it is of the substance of a charge of slander by words, that the words themselves should be set out with sufficient innuendoes;" and judgment was accordingly arrested. That was the opinion of Lord Ellenborough in a case of slander, and it is recognised as good law in the case of Solomon v. Lawson (8 Q. B. 823). The head-note of that case says that, "where a declaration for libel sets out a publication which refers to a previous publication, but, unless by reference to the language of such previous publication, contains no libel, such previous publication must be considered as incorporated in the publication complained of, and must appear in the declaration to be set out verbatim, and not merely in substance." These were both civil actions it is true; but undoubtedly, as is remarked over and over again in the judgments in these and similar cases, there is no difference in this respect between civil and criminal pleading; and if there were a difference, as I have already said, it would be that greater strictness would be required in criminal cases. These two cases then are clear authority for the necessity of setting out the words themselves in defamatory libel, and whatever reason exists for requiring that they should be set out in that case exists also for the same necessity in this. It has been argued that "libel" has a different signification in this and some other cases from what it has in the case of defamatory libel, and it is said that there is no case of a blasphemous or obscene libel where judgment has been arrested for not setting out the words constituting the offence. I certainly do not know of any such case, but neither do I know of one in which it has been held that they need not be set out; and reason suggests that it is as necessary in these as in any other libels. At any rate in E. v. Ourll (17 How. St. Tr. 154; 2 Strange, 789), which was a case of an obscene libel, the words were set out; and in E. v. Sparling (1 Strange 498) it was held a fatal defect in an indictment for cursing and swearing that the oaths themselves were not set out so as to appear on the face of it. Then another reason is given why an obscene libel should not be set out verbatim in the indictment. The records of the court, it is said, ought to be kept pure and undefiled. This seems to me a wholly fanciful and imaginary desideratum. And if such an objection is good in the case of an obscene libel, why is it not equally good, or even better, in that of a blasphemous libel, or an indictment for the use of seditious language? And why is it not also an objection in the case of a libel defamatory of private character? There, if anywhere, it seems to me, it should prevail. What can be more inconvenient and grievous, for instance, than the perpetuation and publication, by means of the record of the court, of a libel charging a man with the commission of an infamous crime? Therefore the objection is a fanciful one; but it is said to be supported by authority. The only English authority quoted is a precedent in Chitty (Chitty Crim. Law, 2 vol., p. 45); but a solitary precedent in a text book is of but little weight: you must have a mass of precedents before they can be used as authority. The other authorities consist altogether of American cases. Now cases decided by the American courts are not, strictly speaking, authority at all; they are only guides, though frequently most valuable guides; they contain the opinions of able men, well versed in our law, and therefore will always have great weight attached to them in our courts, but they are not authority by which we are in any way bound. But even if they were binding on us, they do not assist the case of the prosecution in any way, but make quite in the opposite direction. For instance, the case of The Commonwealth v. Tarbox (55 Massach. Rep. 66) has been relied on; but in that case there was an allegation in the indictment that the libel was so obscene it could not be put on the record, and it is clear that it was considered that, but for such an allegation, the words must have been set out. And the other American cases go no further to help the prosecution, but, as far as they go, equally aid the defendants' case. It is true that it is suggested in this case that, although there is no such specific allegation in the indictment, yet that one is implied in the epithets "lewd, filthy, bawdy, and obscene" applied to the libel; but as such epithets are employed in every indictment, they can imply nothing of the sort. This, then, is the state of the law down to recent times, certainly down to 1846, when Solomon v. Lawson (8 Q. B. 823) was decided. What is it that we are asked to do? We are not asked to say that the law has been altered, but we are asked to say nothing less than that all these cases are wrong, and all these judges have been mistaken as to the law from the beginning to the end. Cook v. Oos (3 M. & Sel. 110) we are to say was wrongly decided, and the statute of 23 Geo. 2, c. 11, altering the law in respect of perjury, was passed wholly without any necessity. And this we are invited to do on no other ground but that certain indictments in cases of false pretences do not set out the false pretences employed. Now I do not intend to go into these cases; I do not for a moment suggest they were not rightly decided; in a similar case I should feel myself bound by them. But in those cases the courts have held, not that there was a failure to state a necessary ingredient, but that there was merely an imperfect statement which was cured by verdict. That is clear from the case of Heyman v. The Queen, where Blackburn, J. uses the words "imperfectly stated" in pointing out the rule as to what sort of defect verdict will cure. So, also, in Reg. v. Goldsmith. In the report of my judgment in that case in the Law Journal, there is an evident error. On p. 98 I am reported to have said: "It is not impossible that if the false pretences used," &c.; it is plain that the word "not" ought to have been omitted. But these cases, whether right or wrong—and I think they were quite right—are for this purpose immaterial and irrelevant. It is impossible that the judges who decided them could have meant to overrule what was long and well-established law. They could not, because they ought not, and had no such power. Therefore the law remains as decided on the authorities that, in such a case as this, the words themselves must be set out, or the indictment will be bad on demurrer, or on motion in arrest of judgment. Now I come to consider the judgment of the court below: (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 569.) The Lord Chief Justice gives three reasons for his decision. The first reason is the great inconvenience that might arise from such a rule. He gives an instance of "what would be the monstrous inconvenience of setting out in extenso the whole of a publication which may consist of two or three volumes." With great deference to his Lordship's opinion, it seems to me equal inconvenience might arise from making such an exception to the general rule of law. For when is a libel to be considered too long to be set out? Is one of ten volumes too long, or two, or one, or one of one hundred pages? Where is the line to be drawn? And it has not been suggested that a defamatory libel need not be set out, and yet it may be of any length. And however long a libel is, it is admitted that it must be set out, or, on demurrer, at any rate, the indictment will be bad. Then his Lordship says the objection ought to have been taken on demurrer. That might be so if the Legislature had said so, but it has not, and it is not the law of the land. The law says, convenient or inconvenient, he may take the objection at any time, before or after verdict. His last ground is that it is communis nocumentum, and therefore, after verdict, need not have been set out; but I am not aware of any such exception being known to the law. Now, in the judgment delivered by Mellor, J., I find he says, "if it be essential to set forth the terms in which the libel was published, the point may still be taken upon error." I am glad to find those words, and glad also to see that the Lord Chief Justice himself says that he "leaves the ultimate decision of this matter to the court of error." I am glad to find those expressions, because they show that they did not consider they had concluded the whole question, but that it was deserving of being more fully discussed here. The result is that there are a number of authorities, unimpeached and binding upon us, and no good reason having been given us why we ought not to do so, we must act upon them. According to the law as contained in them, this indictment is wholly defective, and not merely imperfect, the words "to wit," with what follows them, not supplying the defect in any way, being mere words of identification. Therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merits, which it is not for us to do, and which we could not do, being wholly in ignorance on the matter, we come to the decision, on the dry point of law, that judgment ought to have been arrested, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division must be reversed.

BARR, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place I would remark that we are not called upon in this case to differ from any mature judgment of the court below. It is plain they had formed no strong opinion on this point which is now before us. And they had not the materials before them for forming such an opinion; for the authorities were not brought before them as they have been brought before us. The only cases the prosecution brought to their attention were the American cases and Dugdale's case (Dear & Pearce's C. C. 64), which, I think, is clearly not in point. On demurrer, they were prepared to have held the indictment would have been bad; we say it was so bad that verdict did not cure it. Now, there are three questions which arise for our consideration: first, what is it necessary to set out in such an indictment as this? secondly, what kind of omission can be cured by verdict? and, thirdly, is this such an omission? Now, the first question I cannot answer better than in the words of my judgment in Reg. v. Aspinall, which was a case carefully and laboriously considered. There it is said: "Every pleading, civil or criminal, must contain allegations of the existence of all the facts necessary to support the charge or defence set up by such pleading. An indictment must, therefore, contain an allegation of every fact necessary to constitute the criminal charge preferred by it.

As in order to make acts criminal they must always be done with a criminal mind, the existence of that criminality of mind must always be alleged. If, in order to support the charge, it is necessary to show that certain acts have been committed, it is necessary to allege that those acts were in fact committed; and then the judgment goes on to enumerate other ingredients of an indictment which are necessary in certain cases. Where, therefore, the charge is of a crime which consists in words, written or spoken, it follows from that that the words themselves must be set out; and in all libels, whether obscene, blasphemous, seditious, or defamatory, the words used are the crime. It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether the term libel is properly applied to obscene or blasphemous publications; I am aware that in Sir James Stephen's valuable Digest of the Criminal Law these offences are not classed under the head of libel at all; but for this purpose it is wholly immaterial to consider that question; it is clear that the offence consists in the words used. Other cases in which words constitute the crime are perjury, false pretences, forgery, sending threatening letters, and administering unlawful oaths. In every one of these cases there is authority for saying that the words must be set out, unless a statute expressly dispenses with such a necessity. Every such statute is an express authority for the proposition that, but for it, the words must have been set out. The earliest case bearing on this point is the case of Res v. Sparling (1 Strange, 498). The defendant was there indicted "for that he did, within ten days last past, profanely swear fifty-four oaths, and profanely curse 160 curses, contra formam statuti," and was convicted, but, the report says, "the court held the conviction naught for another exemption, that the oaths and curses were not set forth; for what is a profane oath or curse is a matter of law;" and the conviction was quashed. So in Res v. Popplewell (2 Strange, 685) the same decision was come to, in a similar case, on similar grounds. So also in Res v. Chaveney (2 Raymond Rep. 1368). In all these cases there had been conviction; therefore they are express authorities, and go the whole length of this case. Then, in the case of the offence of sending threatening letters, Lloyd's case (East Pl. O. 1122) is an authority to show that the letter must be set out, or a conviction obtained on such a defective indictment will be held bad. Yates, J. is there reported to have stated, "that he had caused inquiries to be made into the practice of the Old Bailey, and upon the Western and Home Circuits, and found that, in all indictments upon that Act of Parliament, the letter itself was generally set forth; and that the clerks did not remember an instance where the indictment did not state at least the substance of the letter." Then, in false pretences, R. v. Mason (2 T. R. 581) is an authority. Mellor, J. seems, in Heyman v. The Queen, to have thought that that case had been overruled, but I cannot find that that is the case; on the contrary, I find it constantly approved of and acted upon. Mason was indicted "for that he unlawfully, &c., did obtain from one Robert Scofield divers sums of money, that is to say, the sum of two guineas, of the proper moneys of the said Robert Scofield, by false pretences, with an intent," &c. He was convicted and sentenced to transportation for seven years, when he brought a writ of error, on which the court ordered the judgment to be set aside. Buller, J. says: "Several objections have been made on the part of the defendant; but the material one, on which I found my judgment, is that the indictment does not state what the false pretences were." And Grose, J. says, that, in his opinion, "the objection that the pretences are not specified is decisive. This is a charge for a precise crime, and therefore it must be alleged." There, after others have been enumerated, the fundamental reason for the rule is given, that the words are the crime, and must therefore be alleged. In Res v. Perrott (2 M. & Sel. 379), also a case of false pretences, the actual question was a different one. The defect in the indictment there was that it did not specifically negative the truth of the alleged false pretences, but the grounds of Lord Ellenborough's judgment apply equally to this case. "Every indictment," he says, "ought to be so framed as to convey to the party charged a certain knowledge of the crime imputed to him." The cases of perjury I do not intend to cite, as the statute (23 Geo. 2, c. 11) enacting that "henceforth in every indictment for perjury it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant" is decisive to show that, but for it, that would not have been sufficient. Hunters' case (2 Leach C. C. 624) is an authority in the case of forgery. In that case, the forged document was a receipt, which was not however totally omitted from the indictment, but was so defectively set out that, in Grose, J.'s words, "there was nothing to show that the instrument, which did not on the face of it import to be a receipt, was in fact a receipt, or was intended to be a receipt, or could have the operation of a receipt." It is clear from that judgment that the learned judge considered this omission to amount to an omission of the offence charged, and the indictment to be bad on that ground. R. v. Mason (2 T. R. 581) he cites with approval. Administering unlawful oaths is an offence regulated by statute. There are two statutes with respect to it, 37 Geo. 3, c. 123, and 52 Geo. 3, c. 104. Sect. 4 of the former statute, and sect. 5 of the latter, enact that, in indictments for this offence, it shall not thenceforth be necessary "to set forth the words of such oath or engagement, and that it shall be sufficient to set forth the purport of such oath or engagement, or some material part thereof;" clearly showing, that but for such a provision it would have been necessary to set forth the oath in full. Then I come to defamatory libels and slanders. Newton v. Stubbs (3 Mod. 71; 2 Show. 435) was an action, not an indictment. The declaration set out the slander in Latin, and not, as it was spoken, in English; and it was objected that the words used were not set out. The court held the objection good, even after verdict, and judgment was arrested. In Zenobio v. Astell (6 T. Rep. 162) the libel was in French, but the indictment, after saying that it was published in the French language, went on to say that it was "to the purport and effect following in the English language, that is to say," and then followed a translation of the libel in English. It was held, on motion in arrest of judgment, that such a declaration was defective, Lord Kenyon remarking that "the plaintiff should have set out the original words, and then have translated them." In Wright v. Clements (3 B. & Ald. 503) the declaration alleged that the defendant published certain libellous matters of and concerning the plaintiff, "in substance as follows: that is to say," and then set out the very words of the libel. On motion in arrest of judgment it was argued that, from some such a preface to the setting out of the libel, it must be concluded that the actual libel published was not set out verbatim, but in substance only; and the court allowed the objection, saying the libel ought to have been introduced by some such words as "to the tenor and effect following," which would have imported that the very libel itself was set out; and judgment was accordingly arrested. Cook v. Cox (3 M. & Sel. 110) is to the same effect. These cases were decided in 1814 and 1820, and therefore after Fox's Libel Act (32 Geo. 3, c. 60), passed in 1792, which is a sufficient answer to the argument founded on that Act. But it is quite clear that no alteration was, or was intended to be made in the law in this respect by that Act. This appears both from the principle of that enactment, and also from express provision contained in it. After that Act it was still left for the judge to say whether the words used could possibly be a libel, and therefore, since before he can decide that question he must have the libel before him, the necessity for setting out the libel was not removed. But the Act contains an express provision to the same effect. By sect. 4 it is provided, "That in case the jury shall find the defendant or defendants guilty, it shall and may be lawful for the said defendant or defendants to move in arrest of judgment, on such ground, and in such manner as by law he or they might have done before the passing of this Act; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." The last case that I shall refer to is a very remarkable one. In Rees v. Wilkes (4 Burr. 2527) the defendant was indicted for having published an obscene and impious libel, "to the purport and effect following, to wit;" and then followed the libel. Before the trial, the Attorney-General, Sir Fletcher Norton, applied to Lord Mansfield at chambers to amend the indictment by striking out the above words, and substituting for them the words "to the tenor and effect following, to wit;" which his Lordship, after hearing the other side against it, did. Now here it is worthy of notice that, although the actual libel was fully set out, yet the highest law officer of the Crown thought it inexpedient and unsafe to go on without substituting technical prefatory words, which were always held to signify that the actual words of the libel followed them, for other words which had not the same technical significance. So, taking a review of all these cases, we find in them a strong body of authority, derived from every kind of crime which consists in words, to the effect that in all such crimes the pleadings must set out the words themselves which constitute the offence. Now what are the cases which are said to be to the contrary effect? In Dugdale v. The Queen (Dear & P. 64) the indictment was for keeping in his possession indecent prints, and, in a second count, for obtaining and procuring indecent prints, in both cases with an intent to publish them. In neither case were the prints set out in the indictment, but it was not necessary, on such a charge, that they should be set out. The offence was complete though the defendant should never have looked at them, and therefore it was not necessary to the validity of such an indictment that they should appear on the face of it. This case is therefore distinguishable on that ground; but I think it would have been enough to say that there is a difference, in this respect, between indecent prints and pictures, and an offence consisting of words. Sedley's case (1 Keb. Rep. 620; Fortescue, 99) is also distinguishable on the same ground, that it was not a case of libel at all, but of indecent exposure. In Reg. v. Goldsmith (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 881; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 74) the prisoner was indicted for unlawfully receiving goods knowing them to have been obtained by false pretences, he did not get them himself by false pretences. Now, on such a charge, it was not necessary to prove that the prisoner knew what false pretences had been used in getting the goods, therefore it was not necessary to set out the actual false pretences in the indictment; just as, in an indictment for receiving goods knowing them to have been stolen, it is not necessary to show how or by whom they were stolen, since that offence can be committed by a man who is ignorant of the exact circumstances of the theft. Heyman v. The Queen was a case of conspiracy fraudulently to remove goods in contemplation of bankruptcy, and, as in Reg. v. Aspinall, which was also a case of conspiracy, the offence was held complete directly the agreement was come to, so that—after verdict at least—an indictment which alleged such an agreement, but omitted other particulars, was good. In those cases the crime did not consist in words, but in an agreement for a particular purpose. Then as to the last question, how far the omission must go to be incurable by verdict. The rule as to this point also is stated in my judgment in Reg. v. Aspinall. After stating the test for determining what is a mere imperfect averment—which the verdict will cure—to be to see if, "assuming the facts which are accurately alleged in the indictment to have been proved as alleged, and the facts which are imperfectly alleged to have been proved in a sense adverse to the accused, the charge is supported," the judgment goes on to give the test of an omission which verdict will not cure: "But if, assuming both the above-mentioned allegations of facts, the perfect and imperfect allegations, to be proved respectively as before stated, the charge would not be supported for want of the existence of some other allegation, affirmative or negative, which has been totally omitted, then the indictment is bad notwithstanding the verdict. The verdict is only to be taken as conclusive evidence that the facts alleged in the indictment, accurately and inaccurately, were proved in a sense adverse to the accused. If those facts, so proved, would not support the charge, the indictment is bad on a writ of error;" and the passage from Williams' Saunders (vol. 1., p. 261, edit. 1871) is to the same effect. The indictment must contain all that is put in issue; what is totally omitted is not in issue, whereas an inaccurate or defective averment is, and verdict accordingly cures the defect. Now is there such a total omission here? The introductory words, "a certain indecent, lewd, filthy, bawdy, and obscene libel," merely point out the class of offence under which the words which are to follow come. But all that follows is, "to wit, a certain indecent book called 'Fruits of Philosophy.'" There is no description even of

USILL v. BREARLEY; USILL v. HALES; and USILL v. CLARKE.

[CT. OF APP.]

the contents of the book, and a total omission of all quotation, and, according to the authorities I have examined, such an omission is fatal. Some American cases have been cited; but they do not help the prosecution, for they either are not the law of England, or, if they are, they are in the defendants' favour. They seem to say that where there is an averment that the libel is so bad as to pollute the records of the court if set out upon it, the libel need not be set out. But here there is no such averment. Even if there had been such an averment, I know no authority for saying that that is the law of England. It seems a more robust doctrine to say there is nothing in such an objection, when everyone that it is in court during the trial hears the obscenity over and over again. Therefore, in my opinion, this indictment is incurably defective, and the defendants are on that short ground, one entirely of law and quite apart from the merits of their case, entitled to our judgment.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Though merely one of criminal pleading, this is an important question, since it is most desirable that there should be certainty in our criminal law. Now the rule on this point, as to what it is necessary to set out in an indictment for a libel, is perhaps best stated by Lord Ellenborough in Cook v. Cox (3 M. & Sel. 110), which has been already frequently referred to. That rule was established a long time ago; it has been constantly and uniformly recognised since, as appears from the string of cases referred to by my brother Brett, and no case going in the opposite direction has been cited by the counsel for the prosecution. The only case at all of that character was Dugdale's case (Dear & P. C. C. 64), but that case was not really in point. Therefore the rule must be taken to be well and firmly established, and that being so, it is scarcely necessary to consider the reason of it. But one good and sufficient reason it is easy to see, viz., that the defendant may be able, by demurrer, to raise the question whether the indictment charges any offence at all. We must not look at the injustice or inconvenience of any particular case; here is a rule existing, and it is our duty to adhere to it. The court below plainly were not aware of these English cases laying down and confirming this rule. None of them were brought to their attention, American cases alone being cited. But do these American cases even justify such an omission as there is here? We should not be bound by them if they did, but they do not. They lay down a rule that, where there is an allegation that the libel is too bad to be put on the record, it may be omitted; and it is enough to say that there is no such allegation here. But do the English courts recognise that rule? They do not. Our courts do not allow libels to be perpetuated and disseminated under a pretence of judicial necessity, but that is as far as they go. Where it is relevant and necessary, there is no rule which allows matter to be omitted merely because it is impure or libellous. A court ought not to consider its records defiled by any matter which a defendant has a substantial interest in demanding to be placed on them. If it is desirable that there should be an exception in any such case, the Legislature must make it, as it has made exceptions in other cases. Is this omission, then, cured by verdict? The rule is simple; verdict will cure only defective statements. This is not a mere defective statement, there is an absolute and total omission. Such an omission has not been cured, and cannot be cured by verdict; therefore, according to settled and well-established rules of law, the defendants are entitled to our judgment.

USILL v. BREARLEY; USILL v. HALES; and USILL v. CLARKE. (a) Practice—Appeal—Security for costs.

Upon an application that an insolvent appellant shall find security for the costs of a pending appeal, the court will look into the subject-matter of the action, and, if the appeal appears to be unreasonable or frivolous, will order security to be found.

THE plaintiff brought three actions for libel against the defendants as the printers and publishers of the Standard, Daily News, and Morning Advertiser respectively.

The circumstances were as follows:

The plaintiff was a civil engineer and had employed persons to make the survey of an Irish railway for him.

Some of these persons made an ex parte application in one of the Metropolitan police courts with a view to taking criminal proceedings against the plaintiff. The sitting magistrate dismissed the application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, and that the applicants' remedy was by taking civil proceedings. The defendants correctly and without malice reported in their newspapers what had occurred before the magistrate, and the plaintiff thereupon brought his action.

At the trial before Cockburn, C.J. and a special jury, the learned judge held that the publication of the report was privileged, and directed a verdict for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed from this decision to the C. P. Div., who affirmed it. (Reported 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 65).

An appeal from the decision of the C. P. Div. is now pending in the Court of Appeal.

It was admitted that the plaintiff was hopelessly insolvent.

B. D. Yelverton, Barnard, and Bremner, for the defendants in the three actions respectively, now asked that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for the costs of the appeals. Bremner referred to Wilson v. Smith, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 471; L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 67; 45 L. J. 292, Ch. Div.

Shortt for the plaintiff.—In Bourke v. The Whittemoss Colliery Company (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160; L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 556) the court refused to order an insolvent appellant to give security for costs when the question at issue had not before been considered in a court of error. The subject-matter of this action has never been gone into as yet. [COCKBURN, C.J.—I think we are entitled to take into consideration whether the appeal is a reasonable one or not in deciding whether or not security should be given.] If so, there is this substantial question here, whether or not a report of statements injurious to the plaintiff, and made ex parte when there was no jurisdiction to act upon them, is privileged. This report is not justified within the rule in Wason v. Walter, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 73.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that this application should be acceded to, and that the plaintiff should find security for a moderate amount of costs. In coming to this conclusion we are justified in taking into account, not merely the pecuniary position of the plaintiff, but also the other circumstances of these actions. If this court were of opinion that there were reasonable grounds for going on with the appeals, we should not allow the insolvency of the plaintiff to stand in the way of the further consideration of the matter, and I therefore think we must look at the circumstances under which the actions were brought. Looking at the nature of the action, and all the circumstances, although there are no previous decisions on the point, it is clear that the fact of a magistrate having no jurisdiction does not take away the privilege that pertains to proceedings in a court of justice to which the public have a right of access, and the publication of which only enlarges the right of audience. The proceedings of a court of justice should be published without check. I think, therefore, we may freely take into account the character of this action, and the question which is professed to be involved in it. We may also take into account the nature of the plaintiff's proceedings, who has brought three actions on the same report. I think that is a vexatious course of proceeding on his part, and that he should be required to give security for costs of a moderate amount. Therefore, in all three actions, the plaintiff must either bring into court the sum of 50*l.* or give security to that amount; but if he gives security in respect of one appeal, he may select which he will proceed with. The rest of the Court concurred.

Order made accordingly.

BOWYER v. THE SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY. (a)

Burial fees—Incumbent's right in parishes and districts—Cemetery Act—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 129 (Local and Personal), ss. 18-22.

By a private Act to establish a cemetery it was provided that certain fees should be paid by the cemetery company to the incumbent of the parish or other ecclesiastical district or division from which any body should be removed for the purpose of interment in the cemetery.

The Act also directed that a portion of such fees should be paid over by the churchwardens, or chapelwardens, to be by them applied among the persons entitled by law or custom to share in the burial fees receivable in such parishes or districts by the churchwardens or chapelwardens.

After the passing of the Act three separate ecclesiastical districts—one with, and the other two without, a burial-ground—were formed out of the parish of Clapham—one of the parishes to which the Act applied. Before the cemetery was established the parish churchyard of Clapham was used as the place of burial of persons dying in the parish, and the vicar of Clapham for the time being was entitled to all fees on such burials.

Held (affirming the decision of the Ex. Div.), that the Act applied to future ecclesiastical districts with or without burial places; and, therefore, that the incumbents of the three districts were entitled to the fees under the Act, as against the vicar of Clapham.

Vaughan v. The South Metropolitan Cemetery Company (1 John. & Hem. 256; 30 L. J. 265, Ch.) approved and affirmed.

APPEAL from Exchequer Division.

An action having been brought by the Rev. Fitzwilliam Wentworth Atkins Bowyer, plaintiff, against the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company to recover 324*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of certain burial fees alleged to be due from them to him as rector of the parish of Clapham, and the Rev. Thomas Stantial, and the Rev. Aubrey Charles Price, and the Rev. George Forrester, having claimed to be respectively entitled to portions of the said sum; by an order of the Hon. Mr. Justice Field, dated 25th April 1877, it was ordered that all further proceedings against the South Metropolitan Cemetery Company be stayed, and that they should pay into court the sum of 324*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* after deducting their taxed costs, and also that the plaintiff and the claimants should proceed to the trial of an issue in which the said plaintiff should be plaintiff, and the said claimants defendants, and that the question between the said plaintiff and the claimants should be stated for the opinion of the court in the form of a special case. In accordance with the said order, the said parties have by agreement stated for the opinion of the Exchequer Division the following:

CASE.

1. The Rev. Fitzwilliam Wentworth Atkins Bowyer is rector of the parish of Clapham, and has been entitled to all dues and fees accruing and appertaining to the rector or incumbent of the parish of Clapham since the 25th Feb. 1872, at or about which date the rectory was avoided by the death of his predecessor.

2. The Rev. Dr. Stantial is the incumbent of the ecclesiastical district of St. John, the Rev. Aubrey Charles Price is the incumbent of the ecclesiastical district of St. James, and the Rev. George Forrester is the incumbent of the ecclesiastical district of St. Paul. The said districts of St. John, St. James, and St. Paul are wholly comprised within the limits of the parish of Clapham, as it existed at the time of the passing of the Act next hereinafter mentioned. The said several incumbents of St. John, St. James, and St. Paul have been entitled to all dues and fees accruing or appertaining to the inhabitants of the said districts respectively since the said 25th Feb. 1872. The said incumbent of St. John has been entitled to all dues and fees accruing or appertaining to the incumbent of the said district since the 15th Jan. 1875.

BOWYER v. THE SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

3. The South Metropolitan Cemetery Company were incorporated by the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 129, and it is by the said statute amongst other things enacted as follows:

Sect. 18:

And be it further enacted, that upon the interment of every person within the consecrated part of the said cemetery who shall appear by the books of the company to have been removed for the purpose of interment from the parish in which the cemetery shall be situated, or from any parish in the county of Surrey adjoining thereto, or from any of the parishes of Lambeth, Battersea, and Wandsworth, in the said county of Surrey, or from any parish within the cities of London or Westminster, or the borough of Southwark, according to the limits thereof settled and described in an Act passed in the second and third years of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An Act to settle and describe the divisions of counties and the limits of cities and boroughs in England and Wales so far as respects the election of members to serve in Parliament," the said company shall pay unto the incumbent for the time being of the church or chapel in the parish or other ecclesiastical district or division of the parish from which such person shall be so removed the fees following (that is to say), in case such person shall be interred within any vault, octacomb, or brick grave, the fee of twenty shillings, and in case such person shall be interred in the open ground, the fee of seven shillings and sixpence.

Sect. 22:

And be it further enacted, that every such incumbent shall pay to the churchwardens or chapelwardens for the time being of his church or chapel out of every sum of twenty shillings that he shall receive by virtue of this Act in respect of interments in any vault, octacomb, or brick grave in the said cemetery, the sum of twelve shillings, and out of every sum of seven shillings and sixpence in respect of interments in the open ground of the said cemetery, the sum of three shillings and sixpence, to be respectively paid and applied by them in the same manner and amongst the same persons (including the incumbents of such churches and chapels), and in the same proportions as the fees or interments which the said churchwardens and chapelwardens are entitled to receive in their respective parishes, districts, or divisions of parishes are and ought by law or custom to be paid and applied.

Sect. 23:

And it be further enacted, that all fees payable by the said company by virtue of this Act shall be paid to the incumbent for the time being of the church or chapel in respect of which the same are payable, notwithstanding he may not have been the incumbent thereof at the time the interment took place for which such fee is paid, or at the time when the half-yearly settlement of accounts was made, and the receipt of the incumbent for the time being shall be an effectual discharge to the said company for the fees payable by them by virtue of this Act.

Sect. 24:

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that upon the cession, resignation, removal, or death of the incumbent of any church or chapel, to whom fees are payable by the said company by virtue of this Act, such incumbent, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be entitled to receive so much of the sum payable at the half-yearly day of settlement of accounts which shall happen next after such cession, resignation, removal, or death, as shall have accrued for such fees from the last preceding day of settlement of accounts, or from the time when such incumbent became first entitled in fact or by relation of law to receive the fruits of his living (as the case may require) up to the day of such cession, resignation, removal, or death, and the incumbent who shall be appointed in his place shall and may have, receive, and retain the residue of the said sum, and the incumbent of any church or chapel, who shall receive from the said company any sum which in pursuance of the directions hereinbefore contained is to be divided as aforesaid shall account for the same with the preceding incumbent, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and pay over to him or them accordingly, and the said company shall not be liable to see to the application thereof, and in like manner the incumbent for the time being of any church or chapel in respect of which any arrears of fees are payable to the said company, shall, upon the receipt, duly account for and pay over the same unto the preceding incumbent, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or other, the person entitled thereto, and the company shall not be answerable or accountable to any person other than the actual incumbent for the time being for the payment of any fees or arrears of fees under or by virtue of this Act.

4. In pursuance of the provisions of the said Act, the said South Metropolitan Cemetery Company established and maintained a cemetery at Norwood, in the county of Surrey, and a part thereof was set apart for the interment of the dead, according to the rights and usages of the United Church of England and Ireland, and was duly consecrated for that purpose by the bishop of the diocese.

5. The parish of Clapham is a parish in the county of Surrey, adjoining the parish in which the said cemetery is situated, within the meaning of the 18th section of the said Act.

6. For some years previous to the establishment of the said cemetery, the churchyard of the parish church of Clapham was used as the place of interment of persons dying within the said parish, and the rector or incumbent of Clapham for the time being was entitled to all fees arising or accruing in respect of such interments, excepting as hereinafter mentioned.

7. None of the said districts of St. John, St. James, or St. Paul were in existence at the date of the passing of the said Act.

8. The chapel or church of St. James was originally set apart from the said parish by deed dated the 5th Nov. 1829 (which is set out in the Appendix hereto).

9. The said deed contained a power to the trustees of the said chapel or church therein appointed to sell vaults or pieces of ground lying or being in or under the said chapel or church for private places of interment, for a price not less than would, at the time of such sale, have been payable to the rector of Clapham for the time being upon similar sales of vaults or pieces of ground in the parochial cemetery. And it was thereby declared that the said trustees should stand possessed of the purchase moneys thereof, upon trust to pay to the rector of Clapham for the time being the sum he would be entitled to receive for the sale or grant of a similar vault or parcel of ground in the parochial cemetery for the time being of the parish of Clapham, to retain the surplus for the discharge of a certain debt upon the church, and to pay over the residue, if any, to the minister thereof for the time being, for his own absolute use and benefit.

10. The said deed further provided that on every funeral which should take place at or within the said chapel, the rector of the parish church of Clapham, and also the clerk and sexton thereof respectively for the time being, should be entitled to the same dues and fees as they would respectively have been entitled to in case such funeral had been performed at or within the said parish church or the parochial cemetery thereunto belonging, and the surplus, if any, of the said dues and fees which should be received upon every such funeral should belong to the minister, clerk, or sexton for the time being of the said chapel respectively.

BOWYER v. THE SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY.

[OT. OF APP.]

11. The said deed contained similar provisions in respect of the rights of the rector of Clapham for the time being to dues or fees for every monumental stone or alab, or other erection, which should from time to time be erected, set up, or fastened within the said chapel. And it was further provided that proper entries of all burials which should take place at the said chapel should be made by the minister thereof for the time being as well in the parochial register book as in the register thereinbefore directed to be kept in the vestry room of the said chapel.

12. The chapel of St. Paul was built in pursuance of a private Act of Parliament (53 Geo. 3, c. 56), and by sect. 18 thereof it was provided as follows, namely:

And be it further enacted that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to affect or prejudice the right, title, interest, claim, or demand of the rector of the said parish for the time being of, in, and to any Easter offering, oblations, surplice fees, fees for burials, or vaults, or monuments in the said chapel, or other ecclesiastical rights, dues, benefits, or advantages whatsoever arising within the said parish and belonging to the said rector for the time being, but the same shall continue in such and the same manner as they would or ought to have done in case that this Act had not been passed.

13. The district of St. John was constituted by Order in Council dated the 2nd Nov. 1842, the district of St. James by Order in Council dated 8th June 1854, and the district of St. Paul by Order in Council dated the 30th April 1861. The said Orders in Council are set out in the appendix to this case, and marked respectively A. B. and C.

14. By the said Orders in Council it was respectively provided that marriages, baptisms, and churchings should be solemnised and performed in the chapel or church of each of the said districts respectively, and that the fees arising therefrom should be received by the minister or incumbent for the time being of the said chapel or church. No mention of burial fees was made in the said orders, nor has any burial ground ever been attached to any of the said districts.

15. From the time of the creation of the said districts to the 25th Feb. 1872, all fees for burials payable under the 18th section of the said Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 129 in respect of persons removed for the purpose of interment from the several districts hereinbefore mentioned, were paid to the rector of Clapham for the time being, excepting so far as hereinbefore mentioned.

16. For the purpose of this case it is agreed that the fees payable under the 18th section since the 25th Feb. 1872, and up to the 31st Dec. 1876, in respect of persons removed for the purpose of interment from that part of the original parish of Clapham, not included in the several ecclesiastical districts hereinbefore mentioned, and the ecclesiastical district of All Saints (exclusive of the district of Christ Church which is not affected by this case) amount to 199l. 12s. 6d. The fees for persons so removed from the districts of St. John, St. James, and St. Paul within the same period to 66l., 92l. 7s. 6d., and 125l. 17s. 6d. respectively. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said rector of Clapham is entitled to all or any, and which of the said several sums of 66l., 92l. 7s. 6d., 125l. 17s. 6d., as against the incumbents of the said several ecclesiastical districts respectively.

ADDITIONAL PARAGRAPH TO SPECIAL CASE.

At the time of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 129, there were in existence certain ecclesiastical districts or divisions of the parishes mentioned or referred to in the 18th section of the said Act to which burial grounds were attached, and the incumbents of which were duly entitled to solemnise and perform burials in the said district.

The burial fees received for instance in respect of interments in the vaults and churchyard of the district of St. Matthew, Brixton, were paid to the churchwardens for the time being of the said district church, and some fixed part thereof was paid over to the rector for the time being of the parish of St. Mary, Lambeth, out of which the said district was formed, and the residue thereof was applied partly in payment of the surplice fees of the incumbent for the time being of the said district parish of St. Matthew, and in payment of the fees of the clerk and sexton of the said district church.

The case was argued before Cleasby, B., who gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Meadows White, Q.C. and Kenselm Digby for the plaintiff.—If sects. 18 and 22 are construed together, the words “remove for the purpose of interment” should be expanded into “remove for the purpose of interment from the parish burial place to the cemetery.” Sect. 18 is only meant to apply to a removal from parishes or districts where there was, when the Act was passed, already a burial place. The vicar of Clapham would have been entitled to the fees before these districts were constituted, and his rights in that respect have not been altered. The Act was passed to compensate clergymen whose incomes were diminished by reason of the cemetery. In this case the incumbent of the district church gets more and the vicar of the parish less than he would have done if the Act had not been passed. Vaughan v. Metropolitan Cemetery Company (30 L. J. 265, Ch.; 1 John. & Hem. 256) is wrong, and should be overruled. They also cited and referred to

Topsall v. Ferrers, Hob. 175;

Charles, Q.C. (Bullen with him) for the defendants.—The question turns wholly upon the construction of sect. 18. That section was intended to apply to future ecclesiastical districts. Nothing is taken away by the Act, and therefore nothing is due by way of compensation to the plaintiff. Before Clapham churchyard was closed all the parishioners might, if they liked, have been buried there. The fallacy underlying the contention of the other side is that such fee is payable in respect of the particular work done. It is not so; fees were an endowment in respect of the clergyman's whole general work. The language of sect. 22 is not sufficient to control that of sect. 18. Sect. 22 is applicable only to particular cases where churchwardens were by law entitled to receive fees. The decision in Vaughan v. The South Metropolitan Cemetery Company (30 L. J. 265, Ch.; 1 John. & Hem. 256) is right, and the reasons given by Page Wood, V.C., in his judgment, are arguments for the defendants in this case.

[Ct. of App.]

BOWYER v. THE SOUTH METROPOLITAN CEMETERY COMPANY.

[Ct. of App.]

Meadows White, Q.C. replied.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Cleasby, B. should be affirmed. I do not feel able to speak with confidence, dealing, as I am, with a matter very unfamiliar to courts of common law, and having to construe a statute which, as it is a private Act, one may, perhaps, be permitted freely to find fault with, and upon which it is extremely difficult to put a meaning. The question is, whether sect. 18 of the Act applies to future as well as to present ecclesiastical districts or parishes, and whether it includes districts which have not, as well as those which have, and districts which in the future will have not, as well as those which will have, graveyards of their own. It will perhaps assist in enabling us to construe the section, if we bear in mind the condition of legislation when this Act was passed. Compensation was being made to clergymen whose incomes were likely to be affected. Now in words sect. 18 includes future-to-be-created, as well as actually existing, divisions of the parish. I think there is nothing unreasonable in that. At first sight it may appear a little unreasonable that, upon a new district being made with a burial ground which would belong to the mother church by the original constitution of the district, the incumbent should have these fees under sect. 18. The answer is, that if the district existed before the Act was passed, the hardship would be the same, and it is quite certain that in that case, under sect. 18, the incumbent of the district would get his share of the fees. I can see nothing unreasonable in holding that sect. 18 applies in terms to both classes of cases, existing and future districts which have a graveyard. If so, is there anything unreasonable in holding that districts without a graveyard come within sect. 18? I think not. The vicar of the parish no doubt is entitled to be heard in all these matters, and provision might be made that no diminution of his income should take place during his lifetime; but why, in principle, after the death of the existing incumbent of the parish, should not the incumbent of the district without a graveyard have his share of the fees for the burial of persons dying in the district? Neither the incumbent of the parish nor of the district does any work in connection with the burials. I can see no reason why the incumbent of the parish, who has not the work to perform, should be paid these fees any more than the incumbent of the districts without a graveyard who cannot perform it. These fees are part of the church emolument, part, as it were, of the gains of the church in that district. Suppose for a moment a parish A. and within it a district B.; A., we will say, has a graveyard, B. has not. Two men of equal merit are appointed as incumbents of A. and B. The burial of the dead of B. is work which the incumbent of A. will not, and the incumbent of B. cannot do; why should not the incumbent of B. receive these fees? There is nothing therefore unreasonable, I think, in saying that sect. 8 applies to future-to-be-created districts, with or without a graveyard, as well as to districts existing at the passing of the Act. The next question is, does sect. 22 cut down the effect of sect. 18? If there is anything in sect. 22 to show that the Legislature do not mean what is the natural sense of the words in sect. 18, but something short of what they naturally signify, then we ought to limit our construction of sect.

18. But I cannot see that sect. 22 does that; in fact, I cannot see quite what it does do. I think, however, that whoever drew it had in his mind an impression that, in all cases where there were incumbents, there were also graveyards and churchwardens who were entitled to fees, because he seems to suppose that in every case when the incumbent receives the fees on interments he will have churchwardens entitled to receive a portion of them. I think the section was drawn under a mistake. It would be clearly wrong to cut down the plain meaning of language used in an Act of Parliament because you find inconsistent words in another part of the Act, which has been passed under an erroneous supposition. I think this section was so passed, and that it was not meant to cut down sect. 18. I think the decision in Vaughan v. The South Metropolitan Cemetery Company (ubi sup.) which has stood for seventeen years is right, and if I required stronger reasons for the conclusion I have come to, that case would afford them.

BRETT, L.J.—The question is whether two sums of 20s. and 7s. 6d. ought properly under sect. 18 of the Act to be paid by the cemetery company to the vicar of Clapham, or to the incumbents of three districts in the parish of Clapham. All the districts for the purposes of our decision are the same; they are all formed under the Church Building Acts, since the private Act which we are asked to construe was passed. I think that, as between the vicar of Clapham and the incumbents of the three districts, the fees in dispute are to be divided amongst the incumbents, and not go to the vicar of Clapham. I think so on the construction of sect. 18. If it is made out that those words work an injustice, that is no argument against the natural construction being put upon clear words. I think there is no injustice worked, and I also think there is nothing in sect. 22 to deprive the words in sect. 18 of their ordinary and natural meaning. Sect. 18 points distinctly to what might have been done under the Church Building Acts. Under those Acts the parish might have been divided into separate parishes. It might have been formed into ecclesiastical districts with certain rights and liabilities, or part of the parish might have been taken off and joined to and consolidated with another parish. As to what existed at the time of the passing of the private Act, I cannot bring myself to doubt that districts both with and without churchyards were intended to be included in sect. 18. Districts with and without churchyards might have existed after the passing of the Act. Sect. 18 deals with the period of time when, in the future, a body is to be removed, and it deals with all the cases for which the Church Building Acts provide. It would apply equally to a parish divided into separate parishes; then it goes on, "or other ecclesiastical district or division of the parish from which such person shall be so removed," dealing with the time of removal, the place from which the body is removed as either a parish, or district, or division. Therefore, upon the face of sect. 18, the words seem clear. But it is then said that they will work injustice, and if probable injustice is shown, they are not to be construed according to the proper canons of construction. I do not think they do work injustice. The argument used to show injustice is to say that these fees are paid by way of compensation, and it is therefore contended that it is unjust to pay them to anyone but to the person who has lost the opportunity of earning them. That argument rests upon the assumption that fees are paid merely for the burial in respect of which they become due. I agree with Lord Hatherley that it is not so. In fact and in reason I think customary fees in a parish arose in this way: the clergyman has to perform many duties throughout the year, and to the whole parish; with regard to the churchyard, he has to keep it in order, it is his freehold; his duties are in fact the set of duties which he owes the whole parish. By custom fees are attached to some of the duties, but the custom is conclusive to show that they are not in payment for the particular work done. There is work to which no fees are attached. If that is so, it might be unjust to say to the vicar, "You will still perform all the duty of the parish, but part of the burial fees shall go to the incumbent of the district." But that is not the fact here, because all the duty which the vicar of Clapham used to perform in respect of the districts has been taken away or gone into other hands, and it is the incumbent of the district who has now to perform it. But if there is any injustice, I do not see how that would enable us to construe sect. 18 apart from its plain meaning. As to sect. 22 I have an opinion as to its construction, but I do not think it necessary to say what that opinion is. All I can say is that, in my view, there is nothing to take away the plain and ordinary meaning of the words in sect. 18. According to that plain and ordinary meaning I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants.

CORROD, L.J.—The question is whether or not certain payments should be made by the cemetery company to the vicar of Clapham, or to the incumbents of three districts in the parish. I am of opinion that the sums are to be paid to the incumbents of the districts. The first question seems to be, is sect. 18 confined to districts existing at the time of the passing of the Act? There is nothing in the language of the section to say so. It might have been said. But the Legislature knew that separate districts were about to be constituted under the Church Building Acts, and the private Act which was passed in view of the large increase in population in that neighbourhood applies only to separate parishes and districts to be constituted under the Church Building Acts. The argument is that the section only applies to the incumbents of ecclesiastical districts where burials are possible, and it was attempted to be made out by arguing that "removal" in the section means taking away the body from some place where burials are possible, and not a physical removal merely. I do not think that a fair construction. One ought to see, in construing an Act of Parliament, whether there is anything which makes it necessary to place upon the words any but their plain and strict meaning. I think there is no reasonable doubt on the construction of the words here. A great part of the argument was founded upon this Act being by way of making compensation, and it was said that the vicar of the parish was to be compensated for the loss of work in respect of which the fees were payable. But the Act says nothing about making any compensation for fees for work which might have been done. The only recital in the Act seems to show that it was an Act to provide for the inability of the existing churches to bury the dead, and bodies like the cemetery company were coming to Parliament in order to get powers to do it for them. The Act says that incumbents shall be paid a certain sum, not saying anything about compensation, but only a sum. We are not able to give a different construction to sect. 18 than the plain words will bear. But it is said that sect. 22 comes in and alters that meaning. I agree that sect. 22 must be looked at in construing the Act, but the utmost that can be said is this—that the framer of the section supposed that within the district in all the parishes there were churchwardens who were entitled to fees for burials. You cannot say that sect. 22 is to be construed as an interpretation clause of previous sections. It is not necessary or right to put a construction upon it. It is enough to say that it may not be applicable to all districts. That it can be so applied, in my opinion, is not, and cannot be, a necessary conclusion.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MOORE. (a)

Penalties—3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16—To whom payable, the Crown or borough—Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 126.

The effect of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, is that penalties recovered under the latter section in a summary manner before justices of a borough having a separate court of quarter sessions go to the borough and not to the Crown.

Judgment of the Exchequer Division affirmed.

APPEAL from the Exchequer Division.

Information by the Attorney-General against the clerk to the justices of the borough of Warwick, to recover a sum of 11. 10s., being fines received by the defendant as such clerk, and alleged to be payable to Her Majesty. By the consent of the parties a case was stated under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 10, which disclosed the following facts:—

The borough of Warwick is one of the boroughs contained in schedule A. of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, as having a commission of the peace. It has also a separate court of quarter sessions.

On the 29th May 1876 one Amos Dalton was convicted before two of the justices of the peace of the borough of a breach of sect. 16 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, for that he did unlawfully and wilfully obstruct and impede one Robert Billington, then being in the execution of his duty on the Great Western Railway within the borough, and he was adjudged to forfeit and pay the sum of 5s., to be paid and applied according to law.

On the 6th Sept. 1876 one John Reeves was convicted and adjudged to forfeit and pay the sum of 11. 5s. for a similar offence.

Both these fines were received by the defendant, and were claimed by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury as belonging to the Consolidated Fund, and as being payable by the defendant to the receiver of fines, on the ground that, upon the right construction of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, the said fines were forfeit, and therefore payable to Her Majesty. The defendant, however, declined to pay over these fines to Her Majesty, contending that, upon the right construction of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126, they ought to be paid to the treasurer of the borough to the credit and on account of the borough fund, inasmuch as the Act under which the penalties were recovered is not an Act relating to trade so as to bring it within the provisions of the last-mentioned section.

(a) Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] GUARDIANS OF WESTBURY-ON-SEVERN UNION v. OVERSEERS OF BARROW-IN-FURNESS. [EX. DIV.]

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the fines ought to be paid to Her Majesty or not.

The Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Cleasby and Pollock, BB.) gave judgment for the defendant (reported 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610), and the Attorney-General appealed.

By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (the Municipal Corporations Act) s. 126:

When, by any Act, any penalties or forfeitures are or shall hereafter be made recoverable in a summary manner before any justice or justices of the peace, and by such Act respectively the same are or shall be limited and made payable to His Majesty. . . . In every such case the same, if recovered and adjudged before any justice of any borough in which a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace shall be holden as aforesaid, shall, notwithstanding anything in such Act respectively contained, be recovered for and adjudged to be paid to the treasurer of such borough for the time being, to the credit and on account of the borough fund of such borough. . . . Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to any penalties or forfeitures recovered under any Act relating to the customs, excise, and post office, or to trade, or navigation, or any branch of His Majesty's revenue.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97 (An Act for regulating Railways), s. 16:

If any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any railway company in the execution of his duty upon any railway, . . . every such person so offending shall and may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace for the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and, when convicted before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorised and required, upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognisance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises), shall, in the discretion of such justice, forfeit to Her Majesty any sum not exceeding 5*l*.

Sir Hardinge Giffard, Solicitor-General (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the Crown.—The proviso at the end of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126, excepting penalties recovered under any Act relating to trade from the operation of that section, may possibly apply to this case; but the substantial question is whether that section is not repealed, so far as relates to the application of penalties by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16; the words of the later Act, "shall forfeit to Her Majesty," amount to an express enactment that these penalties are to be paid to the Crown. See Wray v. Ellis, 1 E. & E. 276.

K. E. Digby (Mellor, Q.C. and G. G. Kennedy with him) for the defendant.—Where sect. 126 of the Municipal Corporation Act is intended not to apply it is excluded by an express provision, as for instance in the Mutiny Act (40 & 41 Vict. c. 7), s. 91. [Brett, L.J.—That argument will not apply unless the section is expressly excluded by some Act where the penalty is given to Her Majesty.]

BRETT, L.J.—I entertain no doubt whatever, and I cannot think that there is any difficulty in the case. The statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126, contemplates future legislation when it provides that, when by any Act any penalties or forfeitures are or shall hereafter be recoverable, &c., and by such Act "the same are or shall be limited and made payable to His Majesty," they shall, in boroughs having courts of quarter sessions be paid to the treasurer on account of the borough fund. That section in effect says that we must read all those Acts by which penalties are made recoverable in a summary manner before justices as if the provision that the penalty or forfeiture is to be payable to Her Majesty were that it should be payable to the borough fund in all cases where the penalty or forfeiture is recovered in one of the class of boroughs mentioned in the section. I am not sure that one might not say that, though the borough fund is the beneficiary, still the forfeiture is a forfeiture to the Crown. I think, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to retain the amount of these fines, and the judgment of the Exchequer Division ought to be affirmed.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of opinion that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, does not repeal the other Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 126), which contemplates penalties and forfeitures recoverable before justices, and says that in certain cases they shall be payable to the borough fund. We can apply the words of that section with certainty in the present case. It is true that by the later Act these penalties are forfeited to the Crown, but if we read that Act together with the statute of Will. 4 it is clear that they are payable to the borough fund.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot say that the Act for regulating railways repeals the Municipal Corporations Act, which points out the particular fund to which these fines are payable.

Judgment affirmed.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE WESTBURY-ON-SEVERN UNION (apps.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF BARROW-IN-FURNESS (resps.)(a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Poor law — Derivative settlement — Child — Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35 — Retrospective effect of — Construction.

By the first paragraph of sect. 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), it is enacted that "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another."

Held, by the Exchequer Division (Oleasby, B. and Hawkins, J.), that the whole of such first paragraph of that section, both in the enactment and the exception, is retrospective as well as prospective in its operation and effect.

A pauper, born in 1841, resided with his father till he was seventeen years old. The father was seized of a dwelling-house in the appellants' union, and thereby acquired a settlement of estate therein during the time that his son (the pauper) resided with him. The son never acquired a settlement of his own, but before the passing of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) had acquired a settlement in the said union by derivation from his said father.

Held, that the case came within the above-named exception in sect. 35 of the Act, and was therefore not within the operation of the earlier part of that section, and that the pauper consequently retained his derivative settlement from his father, in the appellants' union, subsequently to and notwithstanding the passing of the said Act.

THIS was a special case stated between the parties by consent and by order of Lopes, J., in pursuance of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

On the 27th Oct. 1877 the respondents obtained an order under the hands and seals of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Lancashire, within which county the said parish of Barrow-in-Furness is situated, adjudicating the settlement of James Dorrington, a lunatic pauper, to be in the parish of East Dean, in the county of Gloucester, and in the appellants' union.

1. The said pauper lunatic is the legitimate son of Thomas and Ann Dorrington, and was born at a place called Littledean Hill, in the county of Gloucester, on the 31st March 1841, which said place at the time of the said birth, and until the passing of the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 48, was an extra-parochial place, but was included in the parts of the Forest of Dean which by that statute became a township under the name of East Dean.

2. The said James Dorrington (the pauper) never acquired a settlement in his own right, but he resided with his father, the said Thomas Dorrington, until he was upwards of seventeen years of age.

3. The said Thomas Dorrington, father of the said pauper, before the pauper had attained the age of sixteen, to wit in the year 1855, was seized of a certain dwelling-house situated at Bilston Green, in the township of East Dean, in the said county of Gloucester, and in the said Westbury-on-Severn Union, and so continued seized thereof until the year 1862, and the said Thomas Dorrington resided and slept in the said township, in the said dwelling-house, for forty days, and during the time he was so seized thereof.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that the said James Dorrington, the pauper, is, and by the appellants that he is not, upon the facts herein before appearing, settled in the said township of East Dean, in the said Westbury-on-Severn Union.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether on the above-mentioned facts the legal settlement of the said lunatic pauper is in the said township of East Dean.

If the court be of opinion that the answer should be in the affirmative, the said order of the justices is to stand; if otherwise, to be quashed.

The appellants gave notice that they would take the following grounds of appeal:

First, that the said lunatic was not at the time of his being sent to the said asylum [at Lancaster], nor hath he been at any time since, nor is he now, settled in the parish of East Dean in the said Westbury-on-Severn Union. Secondly, that although the said pauper was born at Littledean Hill, in the Forest of Dean, as alleged, the said place where he was so born was, at that time and until the passing of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 48, an extra-parochial place. Thirdly, that the same pauper has not derived, and cannot be deemed to have derived, a settlement from his father, Thomas Dorrington, as alleged in the said order.

The case was argued at the bar as if there had been an express allegation that the residence of the pauper's father in the township of East Dean, in the appellants' union, was, during the time that his son, the pauper, lived with him, and that the son had acquired a derivative settlement there, and would accordingly be removable to that union but for the Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61); the only question, therefore, being upon the construction to be put upon that statute.

The following sections of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) are material:

Sect. 34:

Settlement for persons by residence.—Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years, as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise; provided, that an order of removal in respect of a settlement acquired under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed without such corroboration as the justices or court think sufficient.

Sect. 35:

Abolition of derivative settlements.—No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child shall acquire another settlement.

If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Sect. 36:

Proviso for pending orders of removal.—The provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any pauper removed under any such order of removal, or without such order under the provision in that behalf contained in the Union Chargeability Act 1865 before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief lawfully given, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act.

Anstie (with him was J. D. Greene) for the appellants.—The question here is, whether or not sect. 35 of the Act of 1876 is retrospective, and whether or not the derivative settlement of the pauper within the appellants' parish is destroyed by that section. The contention on the part of the appellants is that the section is retrospective, and the derivative settlement destroyed. But for this enactment the pauper would doubtless have had a derivative settlement from his father in the parish or township of East Dean, in the appellants' union. Before the passing of this Act of Parliament questions concerning derivative settlements from parents often led to very difficult, complicated, and expensive inquiries, and it is submitted that the express intention of the Legislature in the statute in question was to abolish all such settlements except in the case of young children under the age of sixteen years. The three sections (34, 35, and 36) must be read together in order to see the full scope and meaning of the Legislature. By sect. 34 residence for three years in a parish, under such circumstances as would, in accordance with the statute in that behalf, render the person irremovable, confers a settlement. By sect. 35, paragraph 1, derivative settlement from a parent, except in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, is abolished, and sect. 36 provides that the provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to "any pauper removed under any order of removal, or without such order under the Union Chargeability Act 1865, before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act." In those several specified cases it is enacted that the Act shall not be retrospective, and the reasonable inference and implication therefrom is, that in all other cases it is to be retrospective; and if so, then it is in the present case, which is not one of the excepted cases in sect. 36. Sects. 34 and 35 are the only sections in the statute which relate to settlement; and in Reg. v. The Guardians of Ipswich Union (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 269; 46 L. J. 207 M. C. s. c. nom. The Ipswich Guardians (apps.) v. The Great Yarmouth Guardians (resps.)), 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317, the Queen's Bench Division (Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J.), held that sect. 34 was not retrospective, and therefore sect. 36 cannot apply to it. There is then only sect. 35, the only other section relating to which sect. 36 can apply, which shows that sect. 35 must have some retrospective effect. The opening words of sect. 35 are retrospective, and by them all previously gained derivative settlements are destroyed. It will be contended by the respondents, probably, that the exception in that section is retrospective also and applicable to children above the age of sixteen at the date of the Act. But that would render it necessary to read in to the exception many additional words with a retrospective operation which are not now there. The exception is entirely prospective in language and limited to children under sixteen at the date of the Act, under which age children were already protected by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, sect. 3.

Lumley, for the respondents, contra.—There are two answers to the appellants' argument. In the first place, the opening words of sect. 35 are not, it is submitted, retrospective. The whole clause is prospective. Whenever there is any ambiguity in the construction of a statute, the courts are always unwilling and slow to destroy or interfere with rights and liabilities that already exist and have accrued. If the contention of the appellants is right and is upheld, the consequence will be a great shifting of liability with respect to paupers throughout the country. Sect. 35 is not more retrospective in its language than sect. 34, which the Queen's Bench Division in the Ipswich case (ubi sup.) held was not retrospective. [HAWKINS, J. — What provisions relating to settlement in this statute are we to hold to be retrospective? Or are we to give no effect to the implication contained in sect. 36, that some of such provisions must be of that character?] The court is not bound by the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in the Ipswich Union case any further than it is a decision bearing directly upon sect. 34. Sect. 35 is not touched by it, and must be considered irrespectively of and apart from that decision. But, secondly, assuming that the opening words of sect. 35 are retrospective, then it is strongly contended on behalf of the respondents that the exception in the section is retrospective also, and that a settlement gained by a child under the age of sixteen before the passing of the Act is left untouched. The object and intention of the Legislature in this Act was to get rid of the difficulties, trouble, and expense in proving derivative settlement at sessions, going back sometimes to the grandfather and great-grandfather of the pauper. The total effect of the Act is that (sect. 35) all derivation of settlement, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and a child under the age of sixteen from its parent, is abolished, and the age of emancipation is fixed at sixteen years. Words which prima facie would be prospective will be construed as retrospective if the reason of the thing demands such a construction:

Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Christchurch, 12 Q. B. 149; 18 L. J. 23, Mag. Cas.

If the construction contended for by the appellants is the true one, a child of seventeen may be separated from its father should the latter become chargeable, whereas formerly they would have been kept together by the derivative settlement.

Anstie replied.

Our. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—The following judgment was now delivered by CLEASBY, B.—The question in this case arises upon the 35th section of the 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61. The pauper, as the law stood before the passing of that Act, had acquired a settlement in a parish in the Westbury-on-Severn Union, derived from his father, with whom he lived until he was upwards of seventeen years old. He had never acquired any settlement of his own. It was contended on behalf of the appellants, that the effect of the 35th section was to take away his derivative settlement. And the argument was that the first part of the section destroyed the derivative settlement, and that the exception applied only to derivative settlements acquired after the passing of the Act. To this two answers were given: one, that the 35th section was prospective altogether, and only

THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PENRYN v. BEST.

[EX. DIV.]

applied to settlements gained after the passing of the Act; the other, that, if the first part was retrospective, the exception applied to settlements previously gained also. Upon the first question of the whole enactment of the 35th section being prospective, the case of Reg. v. Overseers of Ipswich (ubi sup.) was referred to, in which the Queen's Bench Division had decided that the 34th section, which related to the same subject, namely, the subject of settlements, was not retrospective, acting upon the well-known rule that enactments which affect the future rights of parties are to be construed as applicable to future and not past transactions, unless there is a clear intention expressed that they shall also be applicable to past transactions. We are not dealing with the 34th but the 35th section, and there is some difference in the language. Without questioning the decision upon the 34th section, we are compelled to say that, in construing the 35th section, we must give effect to the 36th section. The 36th section enacts that the provisions as to the settlement (including necessarily the 35th section) shall not take effect where there has been an order of removal, &c., which is as much as saying that they shall take effect and replace the old law in general, but not where the old law has been acted on. It would be giving no effect to the 36th section to hold otherwise, and we are not at liberty to reject a whole clause from an Act of Parliament which is obviously directed to a particular purpose. The 35th section then being retrospective in its operation, and applying to all derived settlements acquired before the passing of the Act, or to be acquired afterwards, the question is, what effect is to be given to the exception? Unless there is something in the language strongly pointing to a contrary conclusion, we ought certainly to read the whole clause as either prospective or retrospective. An exception is something taken out of what has gone before, and if what has gone before was retrospective only, it would almost follow that that which is excepted is the same. But in the present case the first part of the clause is no doubt prospective as well as retrospective, and it may therefore be argued that the exception applies only to it so far as it is prospective. And the language and subject-matter of the exception might no doubt be such as to make this a proper conclusion. But, without examining critically the language and grammar of the passage, we find nothing to justify us in saying that the enactment is to operate retrospectively, and the exception prospectively only. The effect of so holding would be that a woman whose husband died the day before the coming into operation of the Act would lose her derivative settlement, and a woman whose husband died the day after would retain it, which cannot have been intended. In reality the legislation is directed to remove difficulties of proof more than to introduce a law intrinsically better. This appears from the nature of the enactment, but more distinctly from the 3rd paragraph of the 35th section, and there is as much reason for applying such legislation to the past as to the future. If, in order to prove the place of settlement of the pauper, as derived from the father, it had been necessary to prove a derivative settlement of the father, then, by the direct enactment of the 3rd paragraph of the 35th section, the pauper would be deemed to be settled in the parish where he was born. But it appears from paragraph 8 of the case that the father had himself acquired a settlement in the parish of East Dean, in the appellat union. The son, therefore, had that settlement, and having never acquired a settlement of his own he retained it. We have, since this judgment was written, been referred to a case in the Queen's Bench Division, namely, the Parish of Great Yarmouth (app.) v. The Clerk of the Peace of the City of London (resp.), not yet, I believe, reported. (a) There is a note of the case in the Weekly Notes of Saturday, the 2nd Feb. The question in that case arose upon the same section—the 35th—of the Act of Parliament as in this case. But the facts in that case are different from those of the present case, and there is nothing in the judgment in that case, so far as can be collected from the note of it as above mentioned, in any way inconsistent with our judgment on the present occasion. The order of the justices in the present case will therefore stand.

THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF PENRYN v. BEST. (b)

Market—Right to compel sale in market or payment of toll—Immemorial custom—Grant by Crown—Evidence.

The mere grant of a market does not of itself confer the right to prevent persons from selling on market days in their private houses, though within the town or manor where the market is held. But such a right may be acquired by immemorial enjoyment or prescription.

In an action for the disturbance of a market, the following evidence was given in support of such a right:—King Henry III., by charter, granted that the Bishop of Exeter and his successors might have a market in the manor of Penryn every Monday, with all liberties and free customs thereto appertaining. The bishops from time to time leased to the borough of Penryn property in the borough "with all markets, &c., appertaining," and in 1875 the corporation acquired all the rights of the Bishops of Exeter. There was evidence of a meat market being held in the manor on Saturdays, so far as living memory went, but none was given to connect in any way the market so held with the Monday market granted by Henry III.; but it was proved that no market was in fact held on a Monday. In 1842 there were three or four butchers who had shops in the town, and it was proved to be their practice to close their shops on Saturdays, and sell in the market, in stalls provided by the town council, for which they paid stallage. This practice continued until 1862, when two butchers disputed the right of the corporation to compel them to sell in the market, and opened their shops on Saturdays. Writs were issued against them; they submitted and paid the costs, and ever since kept their shops open on Saturdays, but paid tolls in lieu of stallage. The defendant had a butcher's shop in Penryn from 1870; he paid the toll in 1872, but in 1875 declined to do so.

Held, first, that no such right was granted by the charter of Henry III.

Held, secondly, that the evidence (especially when taken in connection with the grant of a charter for a market with ordinary incidents) was not sufficient to warrant the conclusion of a right by prescription to hold a market on Saturday with such an incident attached.

THIS was an action for the disturbance of a market.

The statement of claim was as follows:—

The plaintiffs are owners in fee of a certain market, holden in the borough of Penryn, in the county of Cornwall, on Thursdays and Saturdays in each week, for the buying and selling amongst other things of flesh meat, together with tolls, stallage, and other perquisites and profits to that market appertaining; and all persons selling flesh meat on Thursdays and Saturdays within the said borough, ought of right to sell the same within the said market, and not in any private shop, without payment to the plaintiffs of the said tolls, stallages, and other perquisites and profits of the said market.

The defendant carries on business in the said borough, and sells amongst other things flesh meat. On Saturday the 4th Dec. 1875, and from that date on each Saturday until now, the defendant exposed for sale in his shop, within the limits of the said borough, flesh meat, and refused to pay the plaintiffs any of the said tolls, stallages, or other perquisites and profits of the said market, and caused them to lose the said tolls, stallages, and other perquisites and profits of the said market, and prevented their enjoyment thereof, and thereby disturbed the plaintiffs' said market.

The plaintiffs claim 10s. 6d. for market tolls and damages for the disturbance of the said market.

The defendant by his statement of defence denied all the material allegations in the statement of claim except the allegation as to the exposure by him for sale of flesh meat in his shop, which he admitted, and as to which he said that the plaintiffs made a claim on him in respect of the same which he refused to pay.

At the trial before Lord Coleridge and a special jury on the 30th Nov. 1876, at Westminster, the following facts were proved. In the year 1259 King Henry III. by charter granted that the Bishop of Exeter and his successors might have a market in the manor of Penryn every week on Monday and also in every year a fair of three days duration on days named, and that they should have the aforesaid market and fair "Cum omnibus libertatibus et liberis consuetudinibus ad hujusmodi mercatum et feriam pertinentibus."

Proof of this was given by a charter of confirmation upon an inspeimus in the reign of Richard II. The bishops of Exeter from time to time leased to the borough of Penryn property in the borough, the parcels of all these leases being to the following effect:

All that the lordship of Penryn borough, with all its rights, members, and appurtenances in the said county of Cornwall. And also all that the town, borough, and burgh of Penryn in the aforesaid county of Cornwall. And all messuages, lands, tenements, rents, meadows, leases, feedings, pastures, fields, fences, commons, orchards, gardens, fishings, and services of all tenants, as well of freeholders as tenants for years, copyholders, tenants at will, or other wages, and all others their appurtenances, within the said town and borough of Penryn aforesaid, or which at any time heretofore have been reputed, accepted, taken or known as part, parcel, or member of the same lordship, borough, and town of Penryn aforesaid, or heretofore annexed, leased, or granted to, and with the same by whatsoever name or names or title they are or have been heretofore known or called, together with all courts leets, views of frankpledge, fines issued, amercements, strays, goods of felons and fugitives, escheats, hereditaments, reliefs, perquisites of court, fairs, markets, innhalages, ankergages, coverages, incomes, liberties, and all others easements and commodities whatsoever, with all singular their appurtenances to the said lordship, town, and borough of Penryn aforesaid, or to any of them in anywise appertaining or belonging.

But though all these leases contained the general words "together with all markets, &c.," there was no particular reference in any lease to the market which formed the subject of the grant by the Crown to the Bishop of Exeter, or to the charter of Henry III.

One of these leases in 1745 contained an indorsement of delivery of seisin of the Guildhall and market houses.

In 1854, by an Order in Council, the possessions of the see of Exeter were vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

In 1856, by an Order in Council, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were empowered to sell.

In July 1875 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners sold the rights of the Bishop of Exeter.

Evidence was given of the holding by the plaintiffs of a meat market on Saturdays so far as living memory goes; but there was none to connect in any way the market so held with the Monday market granted in 1259, and it was further proved that no market was in fact held on Mondays. It was further proved that in the year 1848 there were three or four butchers in Penryn, and that it was the practice for the butchers from that time to the year 1862 to close their shops on market days and to go into the market house, and there sell their meat in stalls provided by the council of the borough, the stallage charged being 1s. 6d.

In 1862 a dispute arose between the corporation and two butchers, who, to try the right, opened their shops on Saturdays during the market, and refused to pay to the council for selling meat in their shops on market days; but, upon writs being issued against them for damages for the disturbance of the franchise of the market, they paid the money claimed and the costs; and have ever since together with all the other butchers paid the amount of toll when they have sold in their shops on Saturdays.

The defendant had a butcher's shop in Penryn from 1870; he paid the toll in 1872, but in 1875 he declined to do so.

Upon these facts a nominal verdict for the plaintiffs for 20s. was entered by consent.

Herschell, Q.C. and Charles, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, moved for judgment.—We put our case in two ways: First, this incident of compelling the defendant to sell in the market appertains to the market by virtue of the charter of Henry III. That charter grants a market with "all liberties and free customs thereto appertaining." That certainly might include such an incident as the one in question, and in order to see whether such an incident was intended to be granted we must look to see what has been done under the grant. From the evidence, then, the fair inference is that this franchise was granted; otherwise why should the butchers have consented for so long a time to the burden?

Mayor of Weymouth v. Nugent, 6 B. & S. 22; 34 L. J., 81 M. C.

Secondly, we say that there is sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion of a right by prescription to hold a market on Saturday with this incident. It is clear that such a right may be acquired by immemorial enjoyment:

Mosley v. Walker, 7 B. & C. 40;

Mayor of Macclesfield v. Pedley, 4 B. & Ad. 397.

There is ample evidence of such a right by prescription. If that is so, the plaintiffs ought not to be worse off because of the express grant of a Monday market with the ordinary incidents of a market.

Murphy, Q.C. and Wormald for the defendant.—First, the plaintiffs are bound by the terms of the grant on which they base their title, and no right to compel the butchers to sell in the Saturday market was granted by the charter of Henry III. The charter cannot be read with such an incident. A pre-existing custom would not apply to a new market:

Heddy v. Wheelhouse, Cro. Elis. 558, 591;

Holloway v. Smith, 2 Str. 1171;

Earl of Egremont v. Saul, 6 A. & E. 924.

The last case is an authority to show that this being a grant of a new market, although there might have been evidence from which a jury might have inferred an immemorial market, yet when you can show that this was a new market, the evidence of the custom cannot be allowed to extend the terms of the charter on which the plaintiffs found their title, a charter moreover which, according to the case in Strange, cannot give that right. Further, the mere grant of a market does not of itself confer the right to prevent persons from selling in their shops on market days, though within the limits of the town where the market may be held:

Mayor of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 M. & W. 18.

Secondly, a right to prevent a man using his own shop for his trade cannot be granted by the Crown. The Crown can lose no prerogative. If, then, such a power existed in the time of Henry III., it must exist now; and that it does not exist now is clear. See

Viner's Abridgment and Prerogative, par. b. 18;

Stephens' Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 475.

It is said that, in construing the charter, you must look to see what has been done under it. That doctrine is quite true; but it only applies to ambiguous instruments, and cannot therefore apply to this charter, which is quite unambiguous. Thirdly, it is clear that such a right as this can only be acquired by custom, not by a grant from the Crown:

Mosley v. Walker, 7 B. & C. 40;

Mayor of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 M. & W. 18.

The plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of custom, because there is an express grant; but even supposing they could do so, there is no evidence of immemorial custom. For what inference is to be drawn from the evidence? The only inference which will support the plaintiff's case is that, at the time of the grant of the Monday market by Henry III., a Saturday market must have existed. That is a most unreasonable inference to draw. The plaintiffs' claim, therefore, whether founded on the grant or on prescription, utterly fails.

Herschell, Q.C. in reply.—We are entitled to found our claim on either the charter or on prescription. It is not at all so clear that a grant of a market cannot confer such a right as this:

Mosley v. Chadwick, 7 B. & C. 47.

Our. adv. vult.

OLASBY, B. now read the judgment of the court (himself and Hawkins, J.).—This was an action for the disturbance of the market of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are no doubt entitled to have a meat market on Saturdays, and the defendant, on a Saturday when the market was held, sold meat in his own private shop in the town at some distance from the place where the market was held. The question is whether the franchise of the plaintiffs was of such a nature that they could maintain an action against the defendant. Similar questions have arisen before, and two conclusions may be considered as settled by authority. First, that the mere grant of a market does not of itself confer the right to prevent persons from selling on market days in their private houses, though within the town or manor where the market may be held. This was decided in the case of Mayor of Macclesfield v. Chapman (12 M. & W. 18.) It is pointed out in the judgment that an old case the Prior of Dunstall's case, had been erroneously supposed to decide the contrary. It may also be considered as decided by the Earl of Egremont v. Saul (6 Ad. & Ell. 924). We feel bound by these authorities, although dicta may no doubt be found to the contrary. See the case Mosley v. Chadwick referred to in the note (7 B. & Cr. 47). The second conclusion by which we are bound is, that such a right as is contended for may be acquired by immemorial enjoyment or prescription. For this there are two decisions: Mosley v. Walker (7 B. & C. 40), and Mayor of Macclesfield v. Pedley (4 B. & A. 397). It is not necessary to say anything about the effect of a modern grant or a grant since the time of legal memory of a market with this additional incident of preventing persons from selling, in their own houses, within the limits of the franchise. The question does not arise in the present case, but there are obvious objections of a serious nature to the grant of a franchise which prevented persons who were selling meat at the time in their private houses from continuing to do so. The facts brought before us in the present case are as follows: We understand that the verdict of the jury was not taken upon any particular question, but, upon the evidence being given, a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs generally, it being considered there was sufficient evidence to warrant that verdict. But the court was, upon the case being brought before them, to deal with the facts, and say what the proper conclusion was. Evidence was given of a charter in the reign of Henry III., A. D. 1259, by which the King granted that the Bishop of Exeter, and his successors, might have a market in the manor of Penryn every week on Monday, and also in every year a fair of three days' duration, on days named, and that they should have the aforesaid market and fair with all liberties and free customs appertaining to such a market and fair, except that they were not to be to the nuisance of neighbouring markets and fairs. Proof of this was given by a charter of confirmation upon an inspeximus in the reign of Rich. II. We think that, having regard to these two charters, there is no sufficient ground for regarding the charter of Henry III., which refers to no previous grant, as a confirmation of any previous grant of a market, notwithstanding the use of the not unusual words "grant and confirm" at the commencement. A number of leases were produced from the bishops to the borough of Penryn of property in the borough, and all these leases contained the general words "together with all markets," but there was no particular reference in any lease to the market which formed the subject of the grant by the Crown to the Bishop of Exeter or to the charter of Henry III. These leases were granted from time to time, and may be said to have brought the right of market down to the time when the borough became purchasers of the bishop's rights from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. One of the leases, that of 1745, contained an indorsement of delivery of seisin of the Guildhall and market houses. This is of importance as showing all rights of the plaintiffs to the market were derived from the bishops. There was also evidence of the holding by the plaintiffs of a meat market on Saturdays so far as living memory goes. But there was no evidence to connect in any way the market so held with the Monday market granted in 1259. There was further evidence that there were three or four butchers who had shops in the town, and that it had been usual for these butchers on the Saturdays, when the markets was held, to close their shops and go and sell in the market, and that this had been done till 1862; and it was further proved that in that year two butchers opened their own shops on Saturdays, and disputed the right of the corporation to prevent it; and that writs having been issued against them, they submitted and paid the costs, and that they have since had their shops open on the Saturdays, and paid the plaintiffs toll, which must mean, no doubt, the stallage which the plaintiffs would have been entitled to if the butchers had occupied stalls in the market house. Authorities were referred to for the purpose of showing that no right to tolls was acquired by the charter referred to, particularly Heddy v. Wheelhouse (Cro. Eliz. 591); but the real question in this case is not the right to tolls eo nomine, but the right to compel the defendant to sell in the market house, if at all, by which the plaintiffs would acquire a right to stallage as owners of the soil; and the real question is whether the evidence establishes any such right. The facts are peculiar, because we have a charter for a market on Monday, and the proof is that no market has ever been held on Monday; but there is proof of a meat market having been held on Saturday. If the proof had been of a charter for a meat market on Saturday in the terms of the present charter, the grant being of a market and fair, with all liberties and free customs to such a market and fair belonging, the words in the original no doubt being "cum omnibus libertatibus liberis consuetudinibus ad hujusmodi mercatum et feriam pertinentibus," as in the Earl of Egremont v. Saul, we should have felt satisfied that there is not sufficient to justify us in reading the grant as a grant of a market with the incident of preventing persons from selling meat in their own houses away from the market. As this incident is not a liberty belonging to a market, it would be enlarging the franchise beyond the words, and would be at variance with Earl of Egremont v. Saul (6 Ad. & Ell. 927). But the plaintiffs rested their case mainly upon another ground, viz., that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion of a right by prescription to hold a market on Saturday with this incident, and it was said that, if there was sufficient evidence of this enjoyment, the plaintiffs ought not to be worse off because there was in 1259 also an express grant which had been vested in them of a Monday market. And the cases of Mosley v. Walker (7 B. & Cr.), and Mayor of Macclesfield v. Pedley (4 B. & Ad.) are referred to as showing that such a right might be gained. But, upon referring to these cases and the evidence produced in the present case, we find a very great difference. We cannot examine in detail the evidence in those cases upon which the jury found in favour of the right, but it appears to us that if the same question had been left to the jury in this case, they ought, upon such different evidence, to come to a different conclusion. The evidence in the present case, except as to the existence of a market, only dates from the year 1848, and from that time to 1862 the only proof is that on the market day the butchers closed their shops and resorted to the market. This is entitled to very little consideration as showing that the butchers were under an obligation to close their shops; it is equally reconcilable with its being more to their advantage to sell in the market than at home, and it only dates from 1848. In 1862 they claimed the right to keep their shops open on Saturdays. Two actions were, however, brought and submitted to by two butchers, and since that time the butchers who have opened their shops on Saturdays have paid toll, until the present defendant disputed the right. This evidence is, in our opinion, far too weak to justify the conclusion of the right being gained by immemorial enjoyment, more especially when taken in connection with a charter being granted in 1259 for a market with ordinary incidents. The enjoyment of the right claimed is properly speaking only from 1862, as we consider the attendance of the butchers at the market on market days as proving little or nothing. The actions brought afterwards, and submitted to through proof of enjoyment, are no further evidence against the defendant; and the proof of payment of toll even by the defendant (as the witness says he believes) would not be conclusive. To justify the conclusion of immemorial enjoyment, the evidence ought to go further back, and be more like such as was given in the two cases last referred to, and the effect of the evidence is also weakened by the demand of the plaintiffs (which was acceded to) being for tolls which they were certainly not entitled to, their only right being to stallage as owners of the soil of the market; and the payments might be made under the belief that the plaintiffs were entitled to tolls, and not as an acknowledgment that the plaintiffs were entitled to make them close their shops. We have considered the case upon the merits, and not with reference to the particular claim set up in the statement, viz., to tolls and stallages for selling out of the market, which seems open to objection, but might have been amended. For the above reasons we think the plaintiffs have not established the right claimed, and that the rule must be made absolute, and there must be judgment for the defendant. Rule absolute.

GIRDLESTONE v. BRIGHTON AQUARIUM COMPANY. (a)

Profanation of the Lord's day—Action for penalties—21 Geo. 3, c. 49, ss. 1, 4—Judgment recovered—Covin and collusion—Estoppel—Judgment recovered under subsequent writ.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover a penalty under 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, s. 1, for keeping open the Aquarium on Sunday, the 15th Aug., the writ being dated the 17th Aug. The fact that the 15th Aug. was the Sunday in respect of which the action was brought did not appear on the writ, but this appeared in the statement of claim which was delivered on the 24th November, and the defendants knew it was in respect of that day. The defendants subsequently got the permission of one Rolfe to bring an action in his name against themselves to recover penalties accruing on the 15th Aug. and the several Sundays between that date and the 17th Oct., and a writ was accordingly issued to that effect in Rolfe's name on the 20th Oct. This was done by the defendants in order to protect themselves against actions which might be brought for these various penalties, as well as to facilitate an early remission of the penalties by the Secretary of State under power given him by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80. Rolfe, who at the time of giving this permission, did not know of the plaintiff's action, agreed that the defendants might make what use they pleased of this action, and that he would not issue execution or claim the penalties. Judgment in Rolfe's action was signed by default on the 28th Oct., and was pleaded by the defendants as a defence to plaintiff's action.

Held, that the judgment in Rolfe's action was fictitious and covinous, and was no bar to plaintiff's action.

Held, also, apart from all question of covin, that the effect of plaintiff's bringing the action was to make the penalty a debt due to him, and that no other action could afterwards be maintained in respect of it; and that since the plaintiff's action was brought in respect of the 15th Aug., and the defendants knew it, it was immaterial that this did not appear on the writ.

The writ in this action was dated the 17th Aug. 1875, and the action was brought to recover a penalty under 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, s. 1, for keeping open the Brighton Aquarium as a place of public entertainment and amusement on Sunday. The writ did not mention the particular Sunday in respect of which the penalty was claimed; but the statement of claim delivered on the 24th Nov. mentioned the 15th Aug. 1875 as being the Sunday in question.

Defence: That a penalty in respect of the same Sunday had already been recovered in an action brought against the defendants by one Rolfe, and a judgment for the same signed against them on the 28th Oct. 1875.

Reply: Joinder of issue on the defence, and that the said judgment had been recovered by the covin and collusion of the defendants and Rolfe.

At the trial before Cleasby, B. it appeared that Rolfe's action was brought on the 20th Oct., and judgment signed by default on the 28th of that month. It appeared moreover, that Rolfe had given permission to the defendants to use his name, that it was brought by the defendants themselves in his name, to recover penalties accruing on the 15th Aug. and the several Sundays between that day and the 17th Oct., in order to protect the defendants, by being used as an answer to actions which might be brought for the various penalties included in it, as well as to facilitate an early remission of the penalties by the Secretary of State under the power given him by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80.

At the time of giving the defendants permission to use his name, Rolfe did not know of the action already brought by the plaintiff; and at the same time he agreed that the defendants should make what use they pleased of the action brought in his name, and promised that he would not issue execution or claim the penalties. Upon these facts Cleasby, B. directed the jury that there was evidence of covin and collusion, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff.

A rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defendants on the ground that there was no evidence of covin and collusion, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, having been obtained,

Bosanquet and Wülberforce (Sir Hardinge Giffard, Solicitor-General, with them), for the plaintiff, showed cause.—There was ample evidence of covin and collusion to go to the jury. Rolfe's action, though brought in his name, was really an action brought by the defendants against themselves to deprive the plaintiff of the penalty for which he was then suing them. The judgment obtained in that action was fictitious, and therefore is of no avail against the plaintiff's claim. Covin is a secret assent determined in the minds of two or more persons to the prejudice of another. (See the definitions given in Coke upon Littleton, and in the Termes de la Ley.) All that is requisite to constitute covin is therefore present. But further, apart from all question of covin and collusion, Rolfe's judgment is no answer to this action, inasmuch as the writ and judgment are subsequent to the date of the plaintiff's writ. 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, made the penalty a debt from the defendants to the plaintiff as soon as the writ was issued, and before the 20th Oct. the right of action for the penalty of the 15th Aug. had vested in the plaintiff. On this point they cited tion is not open to the plaintiff on this record. The sole point raised by the pleadings is whether or not Rolfe's judgment was covinous. If the plaintiff wished to raise this point, he should have pleaded it. But however that may be, there is a clear answer to the argument on that head, which is this—that the plaintiff's writ does not show that the penalty for which his action is brought was in respect of the performance on the 15th Aug., whereas the writ in Rolfe's action, which was issued before the statement of claim herein, did. The principal object of Rolfe's action was to obtain an early remission of the penalties by the Secretary of State under the powers given him by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80. This was a perfectly valid reason for their taking the steps they did, and there is nothing covinous or collusive about it. Before the judgment can be set aside upon this ground, it must be shown that the defendants and Rolfe were both parties to the collusion. Here, on the contrary, Rolfe was not even aware of the purpose for which the judgment was obtained. On this point they cited the definition in Coke upon Littleton:

Cour. adv. vult.

March 4.—The written judgment of the court (Kelly, C.B., Cleasby and Pollock, BB.) was now read by

CLEASBY, B.—The facts of this case are not in dispute. It is admitted that the plaintiff brought his action on the 17th Aug. to recover a penalty under the statute 21 Geo. 3, c. 49. This made the penalty, if recoverable, a debt from the company to the plaintiff. It is further admitted that afterwards, on the 20th Oct., the defendants got permission from a man named Rolfe to bring an action for penalties in his name. It was not disputed that this action was a protective action; that is, to protect the defendants from the various penalties which were accruing, by being used as an answer to actions which might be brought for the various penalties included in it. It was brought in respect of penalties accruing on the 15th Aug. (the penalty sought to be recovered by the statement of claim in this action) and the several Sundays between that day and the 17th Oct. Judgment was recovered in that action by default on the 28th Oct. Proof was given that the proceedings in the name of Rolfe were taken with another view as well, viz., to obtain as soon as possible a remission of the penalties by the Secretary of State under the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 80. But this collusive proceeding for an innocent purpose did not make it a real recovery of the penalty by the defendants against themselves, or prevent it from being collusive for an injurious purpose, viz., to deprive others of the right to recover the penalties which have accrued. It appears to us, therefore, that such a fictitious judgment is no judgment at all to affect the rights of third parties. The question arose at the trial upon the reply that the judgment was obtained by covin and collusion. Now it can hardly be questioned that it was by collusion that the judgment was obtained against the defendants by the defendants in the name of Rolfe, for whatever purpose it was obtained. And as to its being covinous, the definition of covin was given in the argument, from Coke upon Littleton, and we have it very clearly given in the Termes de la Ley: "Covin is a secret assent determined in the minds of two or more persons to the prejudice of another." In the present case the secret assent was the assent of Rolfe to the defendants borrowing his name to bring the action against themselves, and the prejudice of another was the judgment being used, as in the present case, to defeat the rights of others. It matters not whether Rolfe was kept in ignorance of the purpose to which the action was to be applied or not, it was not the less covinous in the defendants. One instance is put in the same book under the title "covin" of the use of a judgment fraudulently obtained: "Or if an executor or administrator procured judgment to be entered against him by fraud, and plead this to a bond, the party aggrieved may plead covin and relieve himself." In like manner, it appears to us that the plaintiff may relieve himself by pleading covin as an answer to the judgment obtained by the defendants. We were referred to certain passages in the summing up of the learned judge, to the effect that if the judgment was obtained collusively, and not intended to operate as a judgment, that would be sufficient. If these passages be taken by themselves they might mislead the jury, but taken in connection with the circumstances of the case, and the rest of the summing up, they would not do so. The plea itself showed the injurious purposes to which the judgment was applied, and as soon as it was admitted that it was intended to be protective, that part of the case did not require to be particularly referred to. And, further, even if there was an imperfect direction in this particular, yet, as it is clear that no substantial wrong or miscarriage has been occasioned thereby, we ought not to grant a new trial. (See Order XXXIX., r. 3, of Judicature Act 1873.) Another objection to the defence was presented at the trial, and has been argued before us. It did not appear to arise upon the pleadings, and was therefore put aside at the trial; but if a new trial was granted, and the statement of defence amended, there would be an answer to the plea. The present action was brought on the 17th Aug., and the penalty sought to be recovered was in respect of the opening of the Aquarium on the 15th Aug. The effect of bringing the action was to make the penalty a debt due to the plaintiff, and no other action could afterwards be maintained in respect of it: (Jackson v. Gising, 2 Strange, 1169; Hutchinson v. Thomas, 2 Levinz. 141.) See also Combe v. Pitt (3 Bur. 1423), though in that case the plea was in abatement. It follows that, upon its appearing that the present action was commenced before Rolfe's action, the proceedings in Rolfe's, though prosecuted to judgment, could have no effect upon the right of the plaintiff. The only answer that could be given to this objection was that it did not appear upon the face of the writ that it was sued out in respect of the forfeiture of the 15th Aug., and that any other Sunday upon which there had been a performance might have been inserted in the statement of claim. But as there is no doubt that the action of the 17th was in respect of the previous Sunday the 15th, and as the defendants knew that the action was in respect of that Sunday, it appears to us to make no difference that the writ does not specify the date. (See judgment of Parke, B. in Reg. v. Bird (20 L. J. 94, M. C.) The case of Chalchman v.

. EVERITT (app.) v. DAVIES (resp.)

[Ex. Div.]

Wright (Noy's Rep. 118) is an authority upon the whole case. It shows that previous proceedings are a bar to subsequent proceedings for the same penalty; and that proceedings to be a bar must be bonâ fide. It was there decided that a previous information for the same penalty is a good bar if it be bonâ fide, but if it be not bonâ fide the plaintiff may plead the fraud. Otherwise the defendants could keep the Aquarium open and incur a penalty every Sunday, and get a friend on every Monday morning to bring an action, and make these fictitious actions a defence to real ones, and so defeat the Act of Parliament. The jury in the present case found that the judgment was covinous and collusive, and for the above reasons we think we ought not to grant a new trial, and therefore the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

EVERITT (app.) v. DAVIES (resp.) (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act 1847 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 2—"Cruelly ill-treat, abuse, or torture"—Omission to slaughter an animal incurably diseased and suffering pain—Keeping such animal in a way that inevitably inflicts pain—What is an offence and "cruelty" under the Act.

The owner of a horse who, knowing it to be incurably diseased and in pain, merely omits to have it slaughtered, commits no offence within sect. 2 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act 1847 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), and cannot be convicted of "cruelly ill-treating, abusing, or torturing" such animal by reason of such omission only. But, if he keeps the animal in such a manner as that it is inevitably put to intense pain in moving about a field, in its efforts to graze in order to support its life, he thereby commits an act of cruelty and an offence under the Act, and is guilty of "torturing or causing the animal to be tortured," as much as if he had actively tortured it with his own hand.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace for the county of Cardigan under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, raising a question for the opinion of the court, whether an act of omission or neglect of duty, which causes pain or torture to an animal, is an offence within the meaning of the Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92) s. 2.

At a petty session holden in and for the division of Upper Genewr-Glyn, in the county of Cardigan, on the 10th Oct. 1877, a complaint preferred by the appellant (Everitt) against the respondent (Davies), under sect. 2 of the Cruelty to Animals Prevention Act, charging that the respondent, on the 30th July 1877, at Talybont, in the said county, did cruelly ill-treat, abuse, and torture a certain animal, to wit, a mare, his property, by then and there keeping the said mare, having a diseased leg, contrary to the statute, was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being present; and upon such hearing we dismissed the said complaint, and the appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this honourable court, &c. Now, therefore, we the said the said justices, &c., do hereby state and sign the following

CASE.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact, and admitted by the respondent, that the mare in question had met with an accident several months before by which one of her hind legs had been dislocated and fractured, and that the respondent had called in the assistance of a veterinary surgeon, who advised him that, in his opinion, there was no cure for the mare, and that she ought to be destroyed; that the animal's leg became worse, and that the respondent nevertheless did not have it slaughtered because, for some time after the accident, there was a probability of the recovery of the mare, although he, the respondent, admitted that for some space of time before the summons was issued the mare had been incurable. It was proved and found as a fact that the mare was kept by the respondent in a field where she was obliged to move about for the purpose of obtaining her food. It was also proved and found as a fact that the mare in question to the respondent's knowledge suffered acute pain in consequence of the injuries she had received; that her hind hoof had altogether gone, and that the leg in connection with that hoof was a mass of blood and matter swelling to a diameter of nine inches, and full of disease, the mare having no use of that leg at all; that such suffering might have been prevented by the respondent slaughtering the said mare, and that the animal was not slaughtered because the respondent desired to have a foal out of her. But it was contended on the part of the respondent, that although he knew the animal was incurable, he was not guilty of the charge preferred against him, as there was no evidence that he had performed any overt act upon the said mare; the pain alluded to arising entirely from the respondent having allowed the said mare to live, instead of having her slaughtered and destroyed, while in such a diseased and incurable state.

It was also contended on the part of the respondent that permitting the said mare to live, although in such a state and condition as hereinbefore described, was not an offence within the meaning of the said Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 2.

We, the said justices, being of opinion that the alleged charge of cruelty was not within the meaning of the said statute, which contemplates some act on the part of the respondent, whereas the alleged offence was merely allowing the mare to live in that state and condition when she might have been slaughtered, gave our determination, and decided against the appellant, and dismissed the charge.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this honourable court therefore is, whether by the omission on the part of the respondent to slaughter the mare, she being at the time in great pain and incurable, was

(a) Reported by HENRY LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ex. Div.]

EVERITT (app.) v. DAVIES (resp.)

sufficient to bring the alleged offence within the meaning of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2, as aforesaid.

If the court should be of opinion that the said dismissal was legal, and properly made, then the said dismissal is to stand; and the court is humbly solicited, according to the power vested in the court by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to remit the case to the said justices, with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court may seem fit.

The following is the section of the Cruelty to Animals Prevention Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92) under which these proceedings were taken.

Section 2:

That if any person shall from and after the passing of this Act cruelly beat, ill-treat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause, or procure to be cruelly beaten, ill-treated, overdriven, abused, or tortured, any animal, every such offender shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding 5l.

The case originally came on and was partly heard on the 22nd Jan., before Cleasby, B. and Hawkins, J., when the only facts then found in the case were, that the mare was incurably diseased and suffered much pain by reason of the hind hoof having altogether gone, and that the leg in connection with that hoof was a mass of blood and matter, and much swollen and full of disease, and that the mare had no use whatever of that leg, which might have been prevented by the respondent slaughtering the mare, but that it was contended on the part of the respondent that he was not guilty of the charge preferred against him, there being no evidence of any "overt" act on his part.

The court, thinking that the facts had not been stated with sufficient fulness to enable them to come to a decision upon the question submitted to them, remitted the case to the justices, in order to have every fact stated that might have any bearing upon the decision of the case, and especially facts with regard to the knowledge of the respondent, and now, the case having been restated as above set forth, it came on again for hearing, when

Waddy, Q.C. (with whom was Morton Smith) again appeared for the appellant, and submitted that the decision of the magistrates was wrong and ought to be set aside. The question involves the proper construction of the words "cruelly ill-treat, abuse, or torture," or "cause to be cruelly ill-treated, &c.," in the 2nd section of the Act. The word "wilfully" is not in the Act, and to torture cruelly, even without the intention to give pain, is within the Act:

Murphy v. Manning, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 592; 46 L. J. 211, M. C.; L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 307.

The question is whether or not mere passive conduct is within the Act, or whether there must be some overt act of active cruelty:

Bridge v. Parsons, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 784; 3 B. & S. 382; s.c., nom. Bridge v. Parsons, 32 L. J. 95, M.C.

It is submitted that the respondent did "cruelly ill-treat, abuse, and torture" this mare, or "cause and procure" her to be so ill-treated, &c., within the express terms of the section, by keeping her in such a way (as detailed in the case) that the very condition of its existence was to cause continuous intense pain. Every movement of the poor animal must have caused it exquisite agony, and all this was well known to the respondent from the first. [CLEASBY, B.—The charge does not complain of the manner of keeping, as by saying that it was a cruel mode of keeping.] The offence is laid down at first as that he did cruelly ill-treat, &c., and then states how he did it, namely, "by then and there keeping the said mare having a diseased leg," &c. It was not necessary to use the word "cruelly" again, and to allege that he "cruelly kept," and "cruelly knew her to be incurable," &c. "Keeping" is the only appropriate word to be used here, and the keeping the animal alive in such a condition, and in the way and manner in which the respondent as found by the case did keep her, was an act of commission and not a mere omission. [CLEASBY, B.—The magistrates have not found cruelty as a fact in keeping the mare in a field, though the whole question for the court was, was it cruelty not to kill her? KELLY, C.B.—I agree with the justices that it was no offence under the Act not to kill the animal, but I differ from them, if by his act the respondent caused and procured the mare to be put to torture.] The conduct which we allege the respondent to have pursued and which was proved, was equivalent to "cruelly ill-treating, abusing, and torturing," and the justices should so have decided.

No one appeared for the respondent.

KELLY, C.B.—I lay down the law in the broadest and clearest terms in which it is possible and competent for me to do, that the mere omission to put an animal to death, even in a case where humanity might dictate its being done, is not an offence or an act of cruelty within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, and that there is no power to convict the respondent by reason of any such omission of any offence under the statute. That is the only question which, in consequence of the way in which the case has been stated for our consideration, has been submitted to us, and we must determine it in favour of the respondent, and hold that he has been guilty of no offence against the provisions of the Act of Parliament in question by his omission to slaughter the mare under the circumstances that have been stated. But then the case states the charge that was made in the complaint laid against the respondent to be that he did "cruelly ill-treat, abuse, and torture a certain mare, by then and there keeping the said mare, having a diseased leg, contrary to the said statute." Now unquestionably that charge expressly involves the question of keeping the mare, and the way and manner in which she was kept, and not merely the omission to slaughter her or put her to death; and we must therefore inquire and look into all the circumstances under which the respondent dealt with, or, in other words, "kept" the mare. Here was an animal that for some months had been suffering from the consequences of an accident, by which one of her hind legs was dislocated or fractured. A veterinary surgeon had advised the respondent that the case was incurable, and that the mare ought to be destroyed. The respondent, however, nevertheless kept her alive; in the first instance, no doubt, as is stated in the case, "because there was a possibility if not a probability of her recovery;" but subsequently, and after full knowledge that the case was an utterly hopeless one, and that she was suffering great pain, he still kept her alive, because

[CR. CAS. RES.]

"he desired to have a foal out of her." And now let us see how he kept her. Had he, in the hope that she might recover, placed her in a stable, with her diseased leg in a sling or cradle, so as to prevent it from touching the ground, and had proper food been brought to her there, so that she might eat and sustain life without the necessity of locomotion, it might be that that would have been a proceeding which might have amounted, as my brother Hawkins observed on the previous hearing of this case, to what may be called "mistaken kindness." But the respondent did nothing of that sort. On the contrary, knowing that the lower part of the leg, the hoof of which had entirely rotted off, was one mass of festering and diseased matter, he turned the unfortunate animal cut loose into a field, where it was absolutely inevitable that she must either suffer the agony of being slowly starved to death for want of food, or endure the continuous and exquisite torture of putting her diseased limb to the ground as she hobbled about in her efforts to feed from off the grass of the field. Between these two terrible alternatives there was no choice for the poor creature; she must either undergo this constant intense pain and torture in the mere act of grazing to support life, or die of starvation. This was no more or less than wanton cruelty, and in my opinion the man who keeps an animal in such a way as that, knowing full well all the time the terrible state and condition of its leg, is as much guilty of "torturing, or causing the animal to be tortured," as if he were with his own hand to take up the diseased leg, and strike it violently down upon the ground. The question then is, Did the respondent cause and procure the mare to put her foot to the ground in such a manner as to cause her intense suffering? Did he, in short, cause the mare to be tortured within the meaning of the Act of Parliament? To that question, I answer, Yes, as much as if he had actively tortured her with his own hand. That is the question which the magistrates ought to have considered. They have, however, gone aside after something which there was no duty upon them to deal with. The respondent did not, according to the evidence, feed or care for this poor animal in any way, although before the information was laid against him he knew that she was incurable. Every element of the offence of "cruelty" under the Act is, in my judgment, here complete. The case should be sent back to the justices with the intimation from this court that, although the question which they have put to us is not the proper question in this case, yet, nevertheless, their decision as to the omission of the respondent to slaughter the mare, being no offence within the Act of Parliament, is right; but that the respondent did commit an offence and an act of cruelty within the statute, in keeping the mare alive in the manner in which it was proved and admitted that he did keep her.

REG. v. JARMAN. (a)

False pretences—Indictment—Proof—Note of a non-existing bank.

The prisoner was convicted of attempting to obtain a sewing machine by false pretences. The indictment alleged that the prisoner did falsely pretend that a paper partly in print and partly in writing, produced by the prisoner to the prosecutor, and purporting to be a bank note for the payment to the bearer of 5l., was then a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of the sum of 5l., and was then of the value of 5l., &c.; by means of which false pretence the prisoner did unlawfully attempt to obtain a sewing machine. The evidence was that the prisoner bargained for the purchase of the sewing machine for 35s., and said that a friend had told her to get one, and had sent her the money to pay for it, and at the same time gave a worthless bank note for 5l. payable to the bearer, of the Devonshire Bank, which had stopped payment many years ago. The prisoner knew at the time that the bank had stopped payment, and that the note was of no value.

Held, that the indictment, though inartificially framed, sufficiently alleged that the prisoner falsely represented the note to be a good and genuine note of an existing bank, and of the value of 5l., and that the evidence supported the conviction.

CASE stated for the opinion of this Court by the Recorder of the city of Exeter.

At the quarter sessions for the city and county of the city of Exeter, holden at Exeter, on the 4th April 1878, Jane Jarman was convicted before me of having attempted to obtain goods by false pretences.

The indictment charged that the said Jane Jarman unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to James Turner, that a certain paper, partly in print and partly in writing, produced by the said Jane Jarman to the said James Turner, and purporting to be a bank note for the payment to the bearer of the sum of 5l., was then a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of the sum of 5l., and was then of the value of 5l. By means of which said false pretence the said Jane Jarman did then unlawfully attempt to obtain from the said James Turner one chain-stitch sewing machine of the goods and chattels of Messieurs Taylor and others, with intent thereby to defraud. Whereas in truth and in fact the said paper partly in print and partly in writing was not then a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of the sum of 5l., nor was the same then of the value of 5l., as she, the said Jane Jarman, then well knew at the time when she did so falsely pretend as aforesaid, against, &c.

The evidence was that the prisoner went to the shop of Messieurs Taylor and Co., and bargained with their manager, James Turner, for the purchase of one of their chain-stitch sewing machines for the sum of 35s. That she said a friend had told her to get one of them, and had sent her the money to pay for it, and at the same time gave him a bank note for the purpose of paying for it, which was partly in print and partly in writing, and of which the following is a copy :

No. A. 914, Devonshire Bank, £ Five.

I promise to pay the bearer on demand £5 value received.

Exeter, 5th day of November 1817. 914.

For Williams, Cann, Searle, and Co.
Five pounds. John Searle.

That the said James Turner told her that the note was worthless, and that he should detain it.

That the bank had stopped payment many years ago, and that the notes of the bank were of no value.

There was ample evidence to go to the jury that the prisoner knew, when she tendered the note to James Turner, that the bank had stopped payment, and that the note was of no value, and that she tendered the note with intent to defraud. There was no further evidence of any false pretence by words.

I was of opinion that the said note was not an order for the payment of money, and that there was no evidence to support the allegation in the indictment that the prisoner falsely pretended that the said paper was a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of 5*l.*, and I entertained some doubt whether there was evidence for the jury to support the indictment, and whether, having regard to the want of proof of the alleged false pretence that the said paper was an order for the payment of money, the indictment was sufficient to sustain a conviction. But I left the case to the jury, directing them to find the prisoner guilty if the evidence satisfied them that she knew when she tendered the note to James Turner that the bank had stopped payment, and that the note was of no value.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and I postponed judgment, and discharged the prisoner on recognizance of bail to appear at the next quarter sessions for the said city and county and receive judgment, and I have stated this case for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved as to whether there was evidence for the jury to support the indictment, and whether the indictment was sufficient to sustain the conviction, and whether the conviction ought to be affirmed or quashed.

C. G. PRIDEAUX,

Recorder of Exeter.

No counsel appeared on either side.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The case states that the prisoner was convicted of having attempted to obtain goods by false pretences. And the indictment alleges that the prisoner unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, did falsely pretend to the prosecutor that a certain paper partly in print and partly in writing, produced by the prisoner to the prosecutor, and purporting to be a bank note for the payment to the bearer of 5*l.*, was then a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of the sum of 5*l.*, and was then of the value of 5*l.* By means of which said false pretences the prisoner did then unlawfully attempt to obtain from the prosecutor a sewing machine with intent to defraud. Without saying that the words of the indictment describe the legal effect of this document (and I do not pause to inquire whether they give a strictly accurate description of it—it may be they do not), yet the ingredients of the offence appear to me to be set out in the indictment. It does, I think, sufficiently state that the prisoner attempted by false pretences to obtain the property of the prosecutor with intent to defraud, and that she falsely pretended that a piece of paper which she produced to the prosecutor was a genuine note of a bank then existing and having power to issue notes. It was proved that there was no such existing bank, and that the prisoner knew this, and that the note was of no value. The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

COX v. RABBITS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Land tax — Exemption — Site of a hospital — 4 Will. & M. c. 1, s. 25—38 Geo. 3, c. 5, ss. 25, 29.

The Act 4 Will. & M. c. 1, enacts (sect. 25) that no hospital or almshouse shall be chargeable with land tax in respect of its site. This exemption was confirmed by the Act 38 Geo. 3, s. 25; which latter Act by sect. 29 enacted that no other lands belonging to any hospital should be chargeable, except such as were chargeable under the 4 Will. & M. c. 1.

The respondent was the lessee of land which had been the site of a hospital existing before the passing of the Act of William and Mary, but the hospital had been removed to another site after the passing of the Act of Geo. 3.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the land came within the exemptions of the above Acts, and that the respondent was not liable to pay land tax.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Baggallay, Bramwell, and Brett, L.JJ.), reported in 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 455, reversing a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Cockburn, (J.J. and Lush, J.), reported in 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 834, in favour of the defendant, upon a special case.

The action was brought by Rabbits against Cox, who was the collector of land tax for the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, for a trespass.

The Fishmongers' Company were the owners of land in the parish which had formerly been occupied by some almshouses belonging to the company. In 1849 the almshouses were removed to another site, and in 1860 the vacant land was let on lease to Rabbits. While the land was the site of the almshouses it was free from land tax, under 4 Will. & M. c. 1. s. 25, and 38 Geo. 3, c. 5. s. 29; and Rabbits refused to pay the tax on coming into possession under the circumstances above mentioned. The Land Tax Commissioners accordingly made a levy, in respect of which this action was brought.

The special case is fully set out in the report of the case when before the Queen's Bench Division, and the sections of the Acts appear in the judgments of their Lordships.

E. Clarke and Lyon appeared for the appellant.

COX v. RABBITS.

[H. OF L.]

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.) and Lumley Smith for the respondent.

The following authorities were referred to:

Lord Colchester v. Keowney, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 368; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888; affirmed on appeal by the Exchequer Chamber, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 253; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 463; and the dictum of Lord Loughborough, cited in the note to Grant v. Aslie, 2 Dougl. 722.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the question to be decided on this appeal is an extremely short one, and the argument, as it appears before you, is condensed into a very narrow compass. The Court of Appeal were unanimously of opinion that the property in question, which was formerly the site of a hospital, but is no longer so, having obtained its exemption from the land tax, took that exemption still, and I can see no reason whatever to differ from their decision. I think the view which has been presented on behalf of the respondent is the correct one, namely, that the intended operation of the Act of Parliament, though it is not perhaps in some respects clear in every word, was to impose a charge at the time that the Act was passed, and there to leave the charge so imposed where the charge was imposed; and as the Act passed there it remained, and where the Act was not in effect to impose a charge no charge could take place, and nothing has been done since to effect a charge. Looking at it in that point of view the 29th section of the Act of Geo. 3, c. 5, is perfectly intelligible, and although there may, as between the 29th and the 25th sections, be a certain amount of duplication of enactment, still the object of the 29th section is obvious: "All such lands, revenues, or rents belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious use, as were assessed before the fourth year of the reign of their late Majesties King William and Queen Mary, shall be, and are hereby adjudged to be, liable to be charged towards the payments of this present Act." Now it is admitted that the land in question does not come within this part of the 29th section, because it was not assessed in the 4th year of the reign of William and Mary; but the section then continues: "and that no other lands, tenements, hereditaments, revenues, or rents whatsoever then belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious use as aforesaid, shall be charged, taxed, or assessed under the present Act towards the sum raised, nothing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." Now here we have other lands which were then belonging to a hospital, and therefore we have an Act of Parliament declaring with regard to that other land that it shall not be charged, taxed, or assessed by virtue of this present Act, and that wholly irrespective of whether it continued to be, or did not continue to be, land used for the preservation of these institutions. This taxing must be construed strictly. You must find words to impose the tax, and if the words are not found which impose the tax, it is not to be imposed. Now it appears to me that, so far from there being words imposing a tax here, you have words which it is clear declare that the tax is not to be imposed: and I find nothing to shift to some subsequent period the taxing of this property, or in effect to make this Act subservient to the purpose of imposing a tax on land which in the first instance is declared to be exempt from tax. I therefore propose to your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. This is a point which, although important, I think is very short and clear. We feel it our duty as a court of construction to give effect to an Act of Parliament, if that Act is clear, simple, and unequivocal in its terms, and we are not at liberty to wander beyond its terms, or to contravene its intention. Now here we have an Act which is as plain and unequivocal in its terms as any that ever came before your Lordships. The 29th section is not open to two constructions within itself, and I think I must not pass over the admission of the counsel for the appellant that, if the 29th section had stood alone, he could not have argued the case. That section makes the matter clear. In the first place it affirmatively declares the liability of certain premises to taxation, and then in negative words it emphatically relieves other sets of premises from any liability whatever. Now it is conceded that the premises in question here are such as are so relieved from liability, and therefore it does not seem to me possible, having that section before our eyes, that we should differ from the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal. All that we have heard in the way of argument is this: There has not been any attempt to construe the 29th section according to the view of the appellant, but there has been an attempt to connect the 29th section with the 25th section, and to say that the 25th section deals with the subject-matter of the 29th section, and that therefore we are to forget the 29th section altogether and to go back to the 25th section. Now I rather agree with the observation of the learned counsel that if the 25th section is to be considered partial, and the 29th section universal, and we must choose between the two, that we should take the latter and more extensive section. I do not think that it is necessary for me to say more than this, that there is no conflict between those sections, and it follows that we, as a court of construction, should not fail to give our attention to the larger section. As to the policy in the matter, which has been referred to, of taxing or not taxing these charitable institutions, it is quite reasonable to suppose that these exemptions may have been made for the purpose of relieving these charitable institutions not merely for the time but permanently; and it is quite plain, if the construction put upon this Act by the decision of the Court of Appeal is not the correct construction, that the benefits which were intended to be accorded to these charities would be taken from them. On the whole I approve of the decision of the Court of Appeal, and I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. The Act of William and Mary, which originally imposed this tax, gives in the 25th section an enumeration of the exemptions, and it is provided that nothing contained in this Act is to charge any hospital or college, and it enumerates a considerable number of hospitals and colleges by name for or in respect of the site of the said hospital (or college), so that in general words the word hospital comes in; then it goes on to say that afterwards none of these colleges which it enumerates, or any hospital, shall be taxable. Then it goes on to provide that it is not to extend to charge any other hospital for or in respect of the rents and revenues payable to the said hospital or almshouse, which are being received and disbursed for the use of the poor of the said hospital and almshouses only. Then the Act of 38 Geo. 3 was passed making it perpetual, and the 25th section says, "Provided that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to charge any hospital for or in respect of the site of the said hospital." Then we come to these words, "Or to charge any lands or houses which on or before the 25th of March 1693" belonged to any hospital or almshouse. Then comes the 29th section, which provides that "all such lands, revenues, or rents belonging to any hospital or almshouse, or settled to any charitable or pious use, as were assessed in the fourth year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary shall be, and are hereby adjudged to be liable to be, charged towards the payment of this present aid; and that no other lands, &c. then belonging to any hospital shall be charged, taxed, or assessed by virtue of this Act." The present hospital which you are now dealing with was not one of those enumerated hospitals. But it did exist before 1693, and came within the general words, no doubt, and it is said that at that time it was not liable to be assessed, because it was the site of a hospital as therein mentioned. Now the 25th section of the Act applies thus far, that is to say, to any hospital existing at the time of the Act of 38 Geo. 3; whether existing in William III.'s time or not, no such hospital is chargeable with respect to its site. The previous enactments had been to the effect that a large sum of money should be imposed upon each county, and that each county should be divided into parishes and districts, and that a charge should be made on the lands, or on the persons who occupied the same, and the 25th section exempts a hospital with respect to its site. Now if the hospital is not charged, nobody else would be chargeable, because in the nature of things a college or hospital must have a site, and the land tax would not be imposed upon it; but when the land ceased to be such site, unless there is some other exemption, it would be liable as land to be taxed under the previous enactment; but in this enactment any college or hospital is not liable. Now I confess it seems to me that the 29th section must have been passed with a view of meeting that, because it says that it is enacted that all lands, &c., belonging to a hospital or almshouse as were assessed in the fourth year of William and Mary shall be thereby liable to be charged, that is to say, all lands belonging to any college or hospital which were not part of the site; then it enacts in negative terms that no other lands belonging to any hospital, &c., shall be charged under the Act. Now the site, which is the site of a hospital which existed in the reign of William III. cannot according to the words of this Act be liable, and "no other lands then belonging to it shall be charged or assessed," that is to say, no other than those which are already taxed. This hospital was not liable in the reign of William III., and there is nothing whatever to reimpose the charge on the land. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision in this case of the Court of Appeal was right.

REG. v. FRENCH.

[Q.B. DIV.]

REG. v. FRENCH. (a)

Turnpike trust fund, deficiency of—Order on parish for contribution towards repair—Non-completion of scheme of special Act—4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, s. 1.

By 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, s. 1, justices at special sessions, on proof of the deficiency of the funds of any turnpike trust, may order payment to said trust of a portion of the highway rate.

By special Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. xciv., certain trustees were empowered to establish a ferry across the river Arun at Littlehampton in Sussex, and to make roads in connection therewith, both the ferry and the roads to be maintainable by tolls. By sect. 72 of such special Act it was enacted that, "in case the works thereby authorised should not be completed," within ten years, "so as to answer the objects thereby intended," the powers given by the Act should cease, save as to so much of the work as should have been completed within the time.

The trustees failed to construct one of the roads, but otherwise did all which the special Act empowered them to do. The tolls being insufficient for the repair of the roads generally, the trustees applied to the justices for an order under 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, s. 1.

Held upon a case stated by quarter sessions, that such an order might be legally made.

CASE stated for the opinion of this court by the Sussex Quarter Sessions.

1. The appellants are trustees appointed under and by virtue of a public Act of Parliament (5 Geo. 4, c. xciv.), being an Act passed for establishing a ferry over the river Arun, at Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, and making roads to communicate therewith. The respondent is the surveyor of highways for the parish of Rustington.

2. Under and by virtue of the Act the trustees are empowered both to establish a ferry and to make certain roads.

3. The preamble of the said statute (5 Geo. 4, c. xciv.) recites:

Whereas there is at present no communication between Worthing, Heene, West Tarring, Goring, Ferring, Kingstone, Angmering, East Preston, Rustington, and Littlehampton, situate on the east side of the river Arun, in the county of Sussex, and Clymping, Ford, Yapton, Middleton, Felpham, and Bognor, in the said county, situate on the west side of the said river, but by a circuitous road of several miles, except that there is a ferry for foot passengers only over the said river Arun, at Littlehampton aforesaid, and whereas from the greatly increased and still increasing population of several of the above places, there is much intercourse between the inhabitants of the east and west sides of the said river Arun, and it would greatly contribute to the advantage, convenience, and accommodation of such inhabitants to have a ferry established for carriages, horses, cattle, foot passengers, and portable articles over the said river Arun at Littlehampton aforesaid, and to have a good road from such ferry on the west side of the said river to and into the road leading from Bognor to Arundel at the west end of Grevatt-lane, in the parish of Yapton aforesaid, and also to have a good road from such ferry on the east side of the said river to and into the village of Rustington aforesaid, with a branch road from the street of Littlehampton aforesaid, by the beach houses to the east end of the lane leading from the church of Rustington aforesaid to the sea shore, and the establishing such ferry, and the making and improving such roads, would likewise be a great advantage, convenience, and accommodation to the inhabitants of many other places on the east and west sides of the said river Arun, and to all persons travelling along the sea coast of the said county of Sussex.

4. By sect. 16 power is given to the trustees for establishing a ferry.

5. By sect. 18 it is enacted inter alia that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said trustees to make or cause to be made a proper and commodious road for such ferry to be established as aforesaid on the west side of the said river Arun to and into the road leading from Bognor to Arundel at the west end of Grevatt-lane, in the said parish of Yapton in the said county, and also one other proper and commodious road from such ferry to be established as aforesaid on the east side of the said river to and into the village of Rustington in the said county, and also a proper and commodious branch road from the street of Littlehampton aforesaid by the Beach Houses to the south end of the lane leading from the church of Rustington aforesaid to the seashore, &c., &c., and the same roads shall be made, and all times afterwards maintained and repaired at the proper costs and charges of the said trustees by and out of the tolls by this Act granted except as hereinafter mentioned.

6. By sect. 72 it is further enacted that in case the works hereby authorised to be executed shall not be completed within the space of ten years, so as to answer the objects hereby intended, all the powers and authorities hereby given shall cease and determine, save only as to so much of the work as shall have been completed within that time.

7. A map and plan setting out the parish roads, coloured brown, the roads of the trustees coloured yellow, also the line of road not made (in dotted lines) marked "A," is annexed, and also forms part of the case.

8. Upon the 13th Nov. 1876, an application was made by the present appellants, under the provisions of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, to the court of petty sessions for the upper divisions of Arundel Rape upon a summons taken out by the present appellants, requiring the respondent as surveyor of highways for the parish of Rustington to contribute to the repair of a certain road hereinafter mentioned.

After hearing evidence an order, since appealed from, was made in the following words:—

County of Sussex to wit.—At a special sessions for the highways, held at the Town Hall in and for the Upper Division of Arundel Rape in the said county, and acting within the said division, on the 13th Nov. 1876.

Be it remembered that on the 16th Oct. 1876, and at this present Special Sessions, Robert French of Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, gentleman, the clerk to the trustees of a certain undertaking or concern called "The Littlehampton Ferry and Roads Undertaking," established by an Act of Parliament made and passed in the fifth year of his late Majesty King George the Fourth intituled "An Act for establishing a ferry over the river Arun, at Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, and making roads to communicate therewith" hath made and exhibited an information before Arthur Prime, Esq., and Sir Peniston Milbank, Bart., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Sussex, acting on the said special sessions pursuant to the authority in that behalf given in and by the Act of the fourth and fifth years of Her Majesty, c. 59 (which Act has been continued by subsequent enactments, and is now in full force and operation), who saith that a certain road from Littlehampton to Rustington was made under the Act intituled, "An Act for establishing a ferry over the river Arun at Littlehampton, in the county of Sussex, and making roads to communicate therewith."

That the funds of the said ferry undertaking or concern are insufficient for the repairs of the roads comprised therein, part whereof runs through, lies, and is situate within the parish of Rustington, in the upper division of Arundel and county aforesaid, and that the said road now lying within the said parish is now out of repair, and further that notice in writing of the intention of the said Robert French, to exhibit this information was pursuant to the said Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, given by him as such clerk as aforesaid, to Robert Botting, the surveyor of highways of the said parish of Rustington, twenty-one days at least before the present special sessions, and which notice set forth the allegations aforesaid, and that at this special sessions application would be made to the justices for their examination into the state of the revenues, and debts of the said ferry, undertaking, or concern, as also to inquire into the state and condition of the repairs of the roads of the same, and the groynes or sea defences belonging thereto, and also to ascertain the length of the road within the said parish of Rustington the surveyor is liable to repair, and that then application would be made to the said justices to adjudge and order that such portion as they may think necessary of the rates or assessments levied or to be levied by virtue of the Act in that behalf, for the repair of the highways within the said parish may be made by him as such surveyor of the highways at such time or times as they the said justices may direct to the trustees of the said ferry, undertaking or concern their treasurer or other officers appointed by them in that behalf for and towards the repairs of such part of the said road as lies within the said parish of Rustington, and the said Robert French, as such clerk as aforesaid, now prayeth the consideration of us the said justices in the matter of the said information, and that two justices may adjudge and order as in the said recited notice is stated in that behalf.

And now, after having pursuant to the said information and the said recited Act of the 4th and 5th years of Her Majesty, examined the state of revenues and debts of the said ferry, undertaking, or concern, and inquired into the state and condition of the repairs of the road before referred to, we find that from the eastern border or boundary of the parish of Littlehampton in the said county to Rustington Mill in the said parish of Rustington for a length of 1029 yards fronting to and abutting on the sea, the said road is out of repair, and having duly inquired into the allegations contained in the said information before recited, the said Robert French as such clerk, and also the said Robert Botting as such surveyor of the highways as aforesaid, being present during such examination and inquiry in pursuance of the notice aforesaid, it appears to us the said justices assembled at the said special sessions for the highways on the oaths of Robert Bushby and others, that the said several allegations contained in the said information are true, and that it is necessary and expedient for the purposes of the said road so situate in the said parish of Rustington as aforesaid, that the said road (and groynes or sea defences) should be repaired, the said surveyor of the highways not having shown to us any good cause or reason to the contrary. We do hereby adjudge and order that a portion, that is to say, the sum of 150*l.* of the rates or assessments levied or to be levied by virtue of the Act 5th & 6th Will. 4, c. 50, for the parish of Rustington shall be paid by the said Robert Botting as such surveyor of the highways of the said parish of Rustington by two equal payments, to wit, the sum of 75s. part thereof on the 31st day of January next, and the residue thereof on the 31st day of December, 1877, to the said Robert French as such clerk to the trustees of the said ferry undertaking or concern as aforesaid, the said sum of 150l. to be wholly laid out in the actual repairs of the said roads, groynes, or sea defences which lies in the said parish of Rustington. And we do also adjudge the said Robert Botting to pay to the said Robert French on or before the 31st day of January next the sum of 11l. 15s. 4d. for his costs in this behalf.

ARTHUR PRIME (L.S.)
JOHN LONG (L.S.)

9. On the 7th Nov. notice of appeal to the court of quarter sessions was given, and grounds of appeal, of which the following is a copy, were delivered.

To Arthur Prime and John Long, Esquires, justices of the peace acting in and for the western division of the county of Sussex.

Take notice that I, Robert Botting, surveyor, of highways for the parish of Rustington, in the county of Sussex, do intend at the next quarter sessions of the peace to be holden for the western division of the county of Sussex, at Petworth, on the 4th day of January next, to appeal against an order of you the said justices made on the 13th day of November instant, requiring a contribution to be paid out of the highway rates of the said parish of Rustington to the trustees of the Littlehampton ferry, by which order I think myself aggrieved, and that the following are the grounds of my appeal upon all or any of which grounds I shall rely at the hearing of the said appeal.

1. That the road towards the repair of which a contribution was ordered by the said order to be made is not a turnpike road within the meaning of the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59.

2. That the road in respect of which the said order was made is a road from the Beach Houses, at Littlehampton to Rustington Mill, and is the road or part of the road in the Act of the 5th George 4., cap. xciv., described as a branch road, and the said trustees not having made the main road contemplated by the said Act from the ferry over the river Arun to Rustington, there was no power to order a contribution towards the repair of such branch road, or at all events if you the said justices had a discretion in the matter, a contribution ought not to have been ordered.

3. That the said branch road is little used, and, if the said trustees had made the main road above-mentioned, would be useless or nearly so.

4. That the said order was applied for and made upon an allegation that certain groynes and sea defences, which are adjacent or near to the said branch road were out of repair, and was applied for and made in order to enable the trustees not only to repair such branch road, but also to repair groynes and sea defences, it being no part of the duty of the said trustees to repair such groynes or sea defences.

5. That the deficiency of funds in the hands of the trustees was wholly or partly caused by their having expended funds beyond their powers in making and maintaining groynes and sea defences, and by other unauthorised or unexpedient expenditure by the trustees.

6. That so far as the contribution ordered was made to enable the trustees to repair the said branch road, the same was made on the footing of the repairs to a greater width and otherwise to a greater expense than necessary or expedient for the purposes of the said branch road.

7. That the said order was made upon an estimate of costs in excess of the works necessary.

8. That the said order is bad and defective on the face thereof.

9. That you the said justices had no jurisdiction to make the said order.

10. That if the said order is good and within your jurisdiction, to make the same is for a larger amount than ought to have been ordered, and the amount ordered ought to be reduced.

Dated this seventeenth day of November 1876.

(Signed) ROBERT BOTTING.

10. The said appeal came on to be heard before the court of quarter sessions for the western division of Sussex upon the 4th Jan. 1877.

11. At the hearing of the said appeal, and before the case was opened on behalf of the then respondents, the then appellant objected that the said order was bad upon the face thereof, upon the following grounds, viz., that the said order does not find the said road to be a turnpike road, and also upon the ground that the said order provides for the repair of the groynes or sea defences, as well as of the road itself, the Act under which the order was made only authorising a contribution for the repairs of roads, and further that the order leaves it optional with the said trustees to which of the said purposes the said money shall be applied. The court of quarter sessions overruled the said objections.

12. The following facts were then proved or admitted.

13. It is admitted that the road which is described as the other proper and commodious road from such ferry to be established as aforementioned on the east side of the said river, to and into the village of Rustington, in the said county, has never been made by the trustees or at all.

14. Proof was given by the appellant, but objected to by the respondents as immaterial to the issue, that the said road, if made, would have been of considerable advantage to the inhabitants of the parish of Rustington, whereas the other roads provided for in the said Act, and especially the road in the 5th paragraph mentioned, in respect of which contribution is sought from the said parish, has been and is of little or no value to them, and is principally used by residents in, and visitors to, the neighbouring watering place of Littlehampton.

15. With the exception of the aforesaid proper and commodious road from such ferry on the east side of the said river to and into the village of Rustington, and with the exception of a portion of the road (in the next paragraph mentioned) lying at the extreme west thereof (which portion was made by and at the expense of the parish of Rustington), the trustees have made the several roads mentioned in the Act of Parliament, and have taken thereon the full amount of tolls specified in their said Act, and have up to the present time received and expended the tolls (in addition to other purposes authorised by the said Act) in the maintenance of the said roads, and of the groynes and sea defences hereinafter mentioned.

16. The road described in sect. 18 of the said Act (being the road to the repair of which the present respondent was by the above-mentioned order ordered to contribute) leads from the street of Littlehampton aforesaid by the Beach Houses to the south end of the lane leading from the church of Rustington aforesaid to the seashore passes along the east front, and is 1029 yards in length.

17. From time to time groynes and sea defences have been erected and maintained at the expense of the trustees between the road and the sea for the purpose of protecting the said roadway and certain private properties adjoining thereto from the sea, which has lately been rapidly encroaching, and has as a result been gradually washing away the said roadway. During the twelve months previous to the said order, there had been three such encroachments of a serious nature, washing away large portions of the road. At the date when the said

REG. v. FRENCH.

order was made considerable portions of the said road had been washed away, the width of the roadway being in some places reduced from 30ft. to 9ft. only; the groynes and sea defences had been also greatly damaged. Between the date of the said order and the date of the appeal, there was a severe storm at Littlehampton, which caused serious further damage to the said roadway, groynes, and defences.

18. The then respondents' road surveyor, being called as a witness on behalf of the then respondents, stated (as the facts were) that the works contemplated by the trustees if carried out would put the said roadway in temporary repair only, and that the period such repairs would last before being again carried away by the sea would depend upon the weather, and that if the repairs contemplated had been executed previous to the occurrence of the storm in the last paragraph mentioned they would have been in all probability swept away in the course of it. He estimated the cost of making a roadway capable of permanently resisting the encroachment of the sea at 5000l.; but this would involve the creation of a fresh roadway at different levels and the construction of expensive sea defences. The rateable value of the parish of Buxington is 3183l. 19s., and the highway rate at the time of the order amounted to 6d. in the pound.

19. The funds in the hands of the trustees (which have never exceeded the income guaranteed, viz., 450l. per annum) were at the date of the order quite inadequate to do the heavy and necessary outlay for the maintenance of the road, and to put both it and the groynes and sea defences belonging to it into a proper state of repair.

20. The court of quarter sessions gave judgment in favour of the then appellant, subject to a case to be stated for the opinion of this court upon the ground that the completion by the then respondents of the whole system of roads specified in the Act was as a matter of law a condition precedent to the right to call upon the parish to contribute to the repair of any part thereof. The court decided, however, in favour of the respondents upon all the objections raised in the grounds of appeal, with the exception of that contained in paragraph 2, as mentioned above. They were of opinion that the expenditure upon the groynes and sea defences was a justifiable expenditure.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: 1. Whether the said order is valid upon its face. 2. Whether the decision of the court of quarter sessions in favour of the appellant was right in point of law. 3. Whether in point of law, under the circumstances in the case mentioned, the appellant can be called upon to contribute to the said repairs. 4. Whether the court of quarter sessions was right in their views upon the facts.

The court are to be at liberty to draw any inferences of fact or deductions of law, and in all respects to exercise the power of the sessions to confirm, amend, alter, vary, modify, or reverse their decision in such manner and to such extent as to such court shall seem expedient and proper.

Costs to follow event.

J. J. CARNEGIE, Chairman.

It is further ordered by this court that the costs of the said appeal shall abide the event of the decision of the said Court of Queen's Bench and be paid to the clerk of the peace for the said county to be by such clerk of the peace paid over to the party entitled to the same.

Our. adv. vult.

Feb. 18.—The written judgment of the Court (Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J.) was delivered as follows by

LUSH, J.—We entertained for a time considerable doubt whether this road could be considered a turnpike road within the meaning of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, inasmuch as by sect. 90 of 4 Geo. 4 c. 95, it is taken out of the General Turnpike Acts, because made under an Act of Parliament passed for an unlimited period. But on further consideration we are of opinion that 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, is not so limited in its application, and that the sessions were right in so holding. The road is a turnpike trust, inasmuch as tolls are payable upon a part of it, which tolls are applicable to the maintenance of the entire undertaking, and constitute the fund which it was originally considered would be sufficient for that purpose; and the reason for the exceptional provision made by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, is as applicable to this road as to one governed by the General Turnpike Acts. Moreover, these portions of the line of road, which formed part of an ancient highway, would have been entitled to statute labour if that auxiliary had not been abolished by the General Turnpike Act (see sect. 86). We, therefore, adopt the larger construction of the phrase "turnpike road," which was adopted by the Court of Exchequer in The Company of Proprietors of the Northam Bridge and Roads v. The London and Southampton Building Company (6 M. & W. 428), and hold this to be a road in respect of which it is competent to the justices to appropriate a portion of the highway rate, supposing the road to be otherwise within the purview of that Act. Were it not for the comparatively recent case of Reg. v. The York and North Midland Railway Company (1 E. & B. 858) in error, we should probably have felt ourselves bound by the cases of Rea v. Cumberworth, 3 B. & Ad. 108, and 4 A. & E. 731, and Rea v. Edge Lane, 4 Ad. & El. 723. The first case, Rea v. Cumberworth, was put upon two grounds: first, that the Act was to be construed as a contract between the promoters and the public, based upon an entire consideration, which created a duty to complete the whole undertaking; and that the statute was to be read as enacting by implication that until the whole line was completed no part was to be deemed to have been done under the authority of the Act, so as to become a public highway; and, secondly, that an acquiescence or adoption by the parish was necessary, in order to cast upon the parish the burden at common law of keeping a newly dedicated road in repair. So far as the decision proceeded upon the necessity of an adoption by the parish, it was overruled by Reg. v. Peake, 5 B. & Ad. 469. The judges differed in that case upon the question whether the commissioner in whom the land was vested had the power to dedicate to the public, but they all agreed that if a road has been dedicated, and used by the public, the acquiescence or refusal of the parish is immaterial. The subsequent cases of Reg. v. Edge Lane and Reg. v. Cumberworth, 4 A. & E. 731, are therefore put solely upon the authority of Reg. v. Cumberworth, 3 B. & Ad. 108, as cases of contracts founded on an entire consideration. This doctrine was afterwards put to the test by an application for a mandamus to a railway company who had made part of their line to compel them to complete the remainder. This court, with the exception of Erle, J., who delivered a judgment the other way, upheld the doctrine propounded in Reg. v. Cumberworth, and affirmed in the two subsequent cases, but the Exchequer Chamber, in a well-considered and elaborate judgment, reversed it; and their decision was mentioned with approval in the House of Lords, in the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway Company v. Philip (2 Macq. 514). These cases reaffirm the old canon of construction, which appears to have been lost sight of in the former cases, namely, that it is not for the court to speculate, apart from the words they have used, what the intention of the Legislature was, but to construe the language of the Act in its plain and ordinary meaning, except where the context requires a different sense to be put upon it. In the judgment of Erle, J. in this court, as well as in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, it is pointed out that Lord Eldon's dictum in Blakeman v. The Glamorganshire Canal Company (1 Myl. & K. 162), has been either misquoted or misunderstood, his language being, "Those who come to Parliament for statutes of this description do in effect undertake that they shall do and submit to whatever the Legislature empowers and compels them to do" (and not that they undertake to do)—"whatever the Legislature empowers them to do," which is the sense in which the court seems to have understood them in the former cases. The Act for making the roads in question nowhere requires the trustee to complete them or either of them. The words of the 18th section are permissive only—"it shall and may be lawful," &c.; and this is the language used as applicable to both sections of the main road as well as to the branch in question. The same words are used in the 16th clause, which authorises the trustees to establish the ferry. "The Act gives," to use the language of Jervis, C.J. in the York and North Midland Company v. The Queen, "conditional powers which, if acted upon, carry with them duties; but which if not acted upon, are not, either in their nature or by express words, imperative upon the persons to whom they are granted." The duty of fencing from the adjoining land, and of applying the tolls to keeping the road in repair, are instances of the duty which follows from the making of the road as a legal consequence of the execution so far of the powers of the Act. This Act contains also the clause which was much commented on in the Exchequer Chamber, namely, that "in case the works hereby authorised to be executed shall not be completed within the space of ten years, so as to answer the objects hereby intended, all the powers and authorities hereby given shall cease and determine, save only as to so much of the work as shall have been completed within the time." Upon a similar clause in the Railway Act which was before the Exchequer Chamber judges, but which commenced with the words "the railway shall be completed within five years, and if not completed &c., the powers of the Act shall expire except as to so much as shall have been completed," the court in their judgment say: "If this section was intended to be obligatory, it would not contain that exception which contemplates that the line may be made in part. It is inconsistent to suppose that the Legislature would say in the same section, 'You may complete in part only if you can in five years, and then as to that part the powers of the Act shall continue, but you must complete the entire line in that time.' Upon the whole, therefore, we find no duty cast upon the company to make the railway in any part of this Act of Parliament. On the contrary, the Legislature seems to contemplate the possibility of the railway being made in part or being totally abandoned. In the latter case the powers expire in five years, in the former the statute remains in force as to so much of the railway as shall have been completed within that time, and expires as to the residue. This provision is inconsistent with the intention to compel the company to make the entire line as the consideration for the powers granted by the Act." This reasoning applies with equal force to the Act we are construing as to the Act which was before the Exchequer Chamber, and is entirely at variance with the doctrine laid down as the ground of the decision in the cases upon which the sessions founded their judgment. We cannot help remarking that any other construction would disentitle the trustees to take any tolls either upon the ferry or the west road. We are therefore of opinion that the clear intent of the Act was that so much of the roads and branch as was completed within the ten years should become and remain in perpetuity a public road, that having been thus dedicated to and used by the public it became a highway, and that as the funds of the trust were found to be inadequate to keep it in repair the justices had a discretion to appropriate a portion of the highway rate to its maintenance. The order of sessions must therefore be quashed.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. SOMERSET.

Judgment accordingly.

REG. v. SOMERSET. (a)

County bridges—Direction of surveyor—Private expenses—Repairable by trustees—43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 3—33 & 34 Vict. c. 73, s. 12.

By 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 5, the inhabitants of a county were compelled to repair no bridge thereafter erected or built by a private person or body corporate, unless under the direction or to the satisfaction of the county surveyor or some person appointed by the justices.

(a) Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a local Act of 1827 a road passing over a bridge was made repairable by trustees; but at no time was the bridge or its approaches actually repaired by them. The road became an ordinary highway.

By another local Act of the same year a canal company was empowered to make, maintain, and support bridges across their navigation, provided no existing liability to repair a bridge not erected or altered by the company should be affected. The company raised the surface of this bridge, without altering the structure, in order to give the approach to another bridge over their navigation the incline required by their Act. They did this without reference to the county surveyor or justices.

By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 73, s. 12, where a turnpike road shall have become an ordinary highway, all bridges which were previously repaired by the trustees of such turnpike road shall become county bridges, and shall be kept in repair accordingly.

Held, that by this alteration this bridge had not become repairable by the canal company, and that this general provision of the last Act was not limited to those bridges erected by private expense, which alone were repairable by a county under 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 5; nor to bridges which had been actually repaired by trustees.

THIS was an indictment against the inhabitants of Somerset for the non-repair of a bridge over the river Brue, between the highway districts of Wells and Bridgwater, the boards of which districts were the joint prosecutors.

The indictment had been removed by certiorari into the Queen's Bench Division, and was tried at the last summer assizes at Wells before Lord Coleridge, who directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants.

A rule nisi had been obtained on behalf of the prosecution, calling upon the defendants to show cause why a new trial should not be had on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury, in that he directed them that the liability to repair was by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 41, s. 100, imposed on the Midland Railway Company, and on the ground that the learned judge improperly received evidence, under the plea of Not guilty, of an alleged alteration of the bridge over the South Drain, and improperly directed the jury that there was evidence of such alteration.

The following are the words of the 5th section of 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, commonly called Lord Ellenborough's Act, which was passed in consequence of the decision of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Inhabitants of the West Riding of Yorkshire (2 East 342):

And for the more clearly ascertaining the description of bridges hereafter to be erected, which inhabitants of counties shall and may be bound or liable to repair and maintain; be it further enacted that no bridge hereafter to be erected or built in any county, by or at the expense of any individual or private person or persons, body politic or corporate, shall be deemed or taken to be a county bridge, or a bridge which the inhabitants of any county shall be compellable or liable to maintain or repair, unless such bridge shall be erected in a substantial and commodious manner, under the direction or to the satisfaction of the county surveyor or person appointed by the justices of the peace at their general quarter sessions assembled, or by the justices of the peace of the county of Lancaster at their annual general sessions, and which surveyor or person so appointed is hereby required to superintend and inspect the erection of such bridge, when thereunto requested by the party or parties desirous of erecting the same; and in case the said party or parties shall be dissatisfied the matter shall be determined by the said justices respectively at their next general quarter sessions or at their annual general sessions in the county of Lancaster.

By 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. v, passed the 21st March 1827, trustees were appointed for keeping in repair a road from Chappel's Corner through Shapwick "unto and across the South Drain dividing Shapwick and Westhay" to a place mentioned beyond, therefore including as part of that road the surface of this bridge.

By 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. xli, passed the 28th May 1827, the Glastonbury Navigation and Canal Company was incorporated for the purpose of improving and supporting the navigation of the river Brue, and for making and constructing a canal.

By sect. 4 the company was empowered to take lands for the canal, and amongst other things to make bridges "as the said company should think necessary and proper for the purposes of the said undertaking upon the said lands and hereditaments, and upon any lands adjoining to the same, and also from time to time to alter, repair, and amend or discontinue the same, or any of them."

By sect. 100 it was enacted:

That the said company shall, at their own costs and charges, from time to time make, maintain, and support a good and sufficient bridge or bridges, arch or arches, passage or passages across the said navigation and canals in all places where the same shall cross any carriage road or horse road or footway, either public or private, for the use of the public or of the persons entitled to use such roads or ways respectively; and shall, also at their like costs and charges, from time to time make, maintain, and support such and so many other convenient bridges, arches, or passages over or across the said navigation, or canals or any brooks, streams, drains, or watercourses running into the same, or into the said river Brue in such places and in such manner as the justices of the peace of the county or liberty where such bridges, arches, or passages shall be situate shall, at their general or quarter sessions, from time to time judge necessary and appoint for the use of the owners and occupiers of the lands, grounds, and hereditaments adjoining to the said navigation and canals or any of them. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to exempt any person or party from the repairs of any bridges, arches, ways, or passages already built or made or to be hereafter built or made, to the repairs of which such person or party is or are or may be liable by law, and which shall not have been erected or altered by the said company; provided also that the several bridges to be erected over the said drains called Out and the South Brue Drain shall not be of less breadth of waterway than sixteen feet at the least.

By sect. 101 it was enacted:

That the ascent to every bridge made, or to be made, over the said navigation or canals, for the purpose of any public road, shall not be more than 1ft. in 13ft., and that the fence on each side of such bridge shall not be less than four feet above the surface of such bridge.

The company constructed their canal so as to pass under this highway about 45ft. from, and nearly parallel to, the river Brue. They built a good and sufficient bridge over the canal, in accordance with sect. 100; and they were bound by sect. 101 to raise the surface of the existing bridge over the river Brue about 2ft., so as to make the ascent to their own bridge in accordance with the incline thereby required. This was not done under the direction or to the satisfaction of the county surveyor, nor of any person appointed by the justices required. They made no alteration in the arch or structure of the bridge.

Afterwards the Midland Railway acquired the canal, and turned it into a railroad; the bridge over the canal was removed, and the highway was carried over the line of railway by a level crossing; no alteration, however, was made in the bridge over the river Brue.

Q.B. DIV.]

REG. v. SOMERSET.

[Q.B. DIV.]

It was admitted that the road over the bridge, which was made a turnpike road by 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 5, had become an ordinary highway; but the bridge and its approaches had never at any time been actually repaired by the trustees appointed by the earlier of the two local Acts of 1827.

By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 73 (the Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act 1870), sect. 12:

Where a turnpike road shall have become an ordinary highway, all bridges which were previously repaired by the trustees of such turnpike road shall become county bridges, and shall be kept in repair accordingly.

Kingdon, Q.C. and Hooper, for the defendants, showed cause against the rule.—The important questions in this case, which relate to bridges on highways in nearly every county, are whether the general provision of sect. 12 of this Act of 1870 is anything more than declaratory of the existing law, and further whether it overrules the particular provisions of local Acts concerning particular bridges without expressly mentioning them. Thorp v. Adams (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 125) is an authority that a general Act is not to be construed to repeal a previous particular Act unless there is some express reference to the previous legislation on the subject, or unless the two Acts are necessarily inconsistent. The canal company by their alteration of this bridge incorporated it into their works, and rendered it subservient to their purposes. Lord Coleridge therefore rightly held that the liability to repair the bridge was from that time upon the canal company and their successors, and the general provision of the Act of 1870 did not affect it. The inhabitants of the county are therefore entitled to the protection of Lord Ellenborough's Act, and are not liable to repair a bridge which is not shown to have been constructed to the satisfaction of the county surveyor. As to the second ground of the rule, the case of Bees v. The Inhabitants of St. George's, Hanover-square (3 Camp. 222), is conclusive against the prosecution.

Charles, Q.C. and Warry supported the rule.—This is a bridge which exactly fulfils the description of those bridges to which sect. 12 of the Act of 1870 applies. There is an ordinary highway over it, which was once a turnpike road; and the bridge was by the earlier local Act of 1827 made repairable by the trustees of such turnpike road. The alteration in the bridge by the canal company was not sufficient to relieve the trustees of their duty so to repair it. [The rule was not attempted to be supported on the second ground.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that the judgment of Lord Coleridge cannot stand. The first question is whether the case comes within sect. 12 of the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 73, which provides that "when a turnpike road shall have become an ordinary highway, all bridges which were previously repaired by the trustees of such turnpike road shall become county bridges, and shall be kept in repair accordingly." Now it seems to be agreed upon all hands that the words "which were previously repaired" must be extended to mean all bridges "which were previously repairable" by the turnpike trustees. So that, although the trustees have not, in fact, repaired the bridge in question, the county is yet liable to repair, if the case in other respects comes within the 12th section. Now, this was a turnpike road including a bridge, and the road has now become a highway, and the bridge has, therefore, become a county bridge. But it is then said that the bridge was not repairable by the turnpike trustees before the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 73, because, the canal company having altered the bridge, the proviso at the end of sect. 100 of their Act applies to throw the burden of repairing upon them. I think this contention cannot be sustained. It is true that the canal company did interfere with this bridge, and at first sight there would appear a good foundation for the argument that when the canal company has materially altered the bridge, the liability to maintain it in repair would be upon them and not upon other persons. But I think this is not the true construction of sect. 100, and that if it were, there was not here such a material alteration as to be within the section. Sect. 100, in my opinion, refers only to such bridges as they were obliged to alter in order to use them for the purposes of their canal traffic, and not to a case like this, where the alteration was for the purpose of providing a better approach to their other bridge. But if that is not so, I think there was not, in fact, here a material alteration of the bridge. The alteration must be a structural one. Here the structure was left untouched, and the turnpike bridge was made available for the purpose of approach to the other bridge. I do not think that is a substantial alteration within the meaning of the 100th section.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Sect. 12 of the 33 & 34 Vict. 73 was intended to make provision for the repair of bridges on turnpike roads which have become ordinary highways; and the most reasonable mode of doing so was to make them become county bridges. The object of the Act would not have been answered if it required that in all cases the bridges should have been built with the approval of the county surveyor.

LUSH, J.—One question for us is whether this was a bridge repairable by the trustees of this turnpike road, such as might become a county bridge within the meaning of sect. 12 of the Act of 1870. The other question is whether if it be so, the local Act of 1827 has not under the circumstances imposed the duty of repairing the bridge upon the canal company and their successors. The latter point depends upon whether the alterations of the surface of the bridge by the canal company was sufficient to compel the company and its successors to keep the bridge in repair by force of the 100th section of the local Act. The company made a new cut through the road, and duly constructed their own bridge over it; in order to carry out the requirements of sect. 101 as to the incline of the approach to their own bridge, they had to raise the roadway of the bridge now in dispute. The 100th section requires the company to make, maintain, and support sufficient bridges across the navigation and canals in all places where the same shall cross any road. The proviso relates to the repairs of bridges "which shall not have been erected or altered by the said company," and preserves the existing liability to repair such bridges. The alteration mentioned in the proviso must refer to the bridges mentioned in the enacting part, and cannot mean a mere raising of the surface of this bridge. I think, therefore, this bridge not having been erected nor altered in the sense intended, was still repairable after the raising of the roadway by the trustees as before. It does not matter that it was not actually repaired by them. I think too that, even if we could consider the bridge to have been erected by a body corporate within the words of sect. 5 of 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, the fact of there having been no sanction of the county surveyor would not be enough to prevent the general provision of the 12th section of the Act of 1870 from applying. The decision being wrong, there must be a new trial.

GUARDIANS OF KEYNSHAM UNION (apps.) v. THE GUARDIANS OF BEDMINSTER UNION (resps.) (a)

Settlement of children under sixteen—Second marriage of mother—39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35.

By 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35, "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person . . . except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be."

Held, that the words "widowed mother" do not include the case of a mother marrying a second time.

THIS was an appeal against an order of justices for the removal of three paupers, Mary Ann Fuse, Edwin George Fuse, and Sarah Jane Fuse, from the respondents' union to the appellants' union as the place of their last legal settlement.

The appeal was tried at the Somersetshire Quarter Sessions, holden at Wells, on the 17th Oct. 1877, when the said order was confirmed with costs subject to the opinion of the Divisional Court for hearing appeals from inferior courts on the following

CASE.

1. Samuel Fuse, the father of the paupers, was born in the parish of Bitton, in the appellants' union, in the year 1832.

2. Ann Woodrington, the mother of the paupers, was born in the parish of Liston, in the appellants' union, on or about the 20th Aug. 1839.

3. The said Samuel Fuse and Ann Woodrington intermarried in 1859.

4. The three paupers were the children of the above-named Samuel Fuse and Ann his wife, and were born at Caerphilly, in the Pontypridd Union, and are all under the age of sixteen years, and unemancipated.

5. The said Samuel Fuse died in the year 1873, leaving his widow Ann Fuse (formerly Ann Woodrington) and the three paupers him surviving.

6. In 1875 Ann Fuse, the widow of the said Samuel Fuse, married Alfred Warden.

7. The said Alfred Warden was born at the parish of Thornbury, in the Thornbury Union, on or about the 5th of August 1839.

(a) Reported by J. M. LELY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8. The said Alfred Warden deserted his wife and her children, the said paupers, in 1876, leaving them chargeable to the respondents' union.

9. The respondents' union obtained an order on the 1st June 1877 for the removal of Ann Warden, the mother of the paupers, to Thornbury Union, which said order has not been appealed against.

If the court should be of opinion, upon the facts above stated, that the last legal place of settlement of the three paupers was in the appellants' union, the said order of removal and the order of sessions are to be confirmed.

If the court should, upon the facts stated, be of a contrary opinion, then the said order of removal and the order of sessions are to be quashed.

The case turned upon the construction of the words "widowed mother," in the following section (35) of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61):

No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother as the case may be up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of his mother until such child acquires another settlement.

If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Hooper (with him A. Stonehouse Vigor), for the respondents, cited R. v. Inhabitants of Woodyeat (2 Ld. Raymond, 1473), and argued that the words "widowed mother" must be strictly construed, so as not to apply to a mother marrying again.

Petheram, for the appellants, contra, contended that the intention of the Act was that the children should not be separated from their parent, that the court ought to give effect to such intention unless there were strong words pointing the other way, and that in this case there were no such strong words. [MELLOR, J.—How can the statute apply? When the mother marries again she ceases to be a widowed mother. LUSH, J.—In the case of a second marriage, I do not see the necessity of keeping the children together. However, that may be, I think that the second marriage alters the status of the mother, and takes her out of the section.]

By the Court.—This rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

WATKINS v. SMITH. (a)

Jurisdiction of justices—Claim of right—Bona fides—Not supported by evidence—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30.

The appellants were charged before justices under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, with trespassing in pursuit of conies, and were proved to have shot rabbits on land which one of the appellants claimed to be his property. They called witnesses who stated that the appellant purchased the land adjoining that occupied by the informant, and that close to this particular spot the persons from whom he purchased had been accustomed to stack timber. It was however shown on the informant's part that, by a plan attached to the conveyance of the land to the persons from whom the appellant purchased, this particular spot was a long way outside the boundary of the land conveyed.

The justices decided that the appellant's claim was unfounded and unsustainable, and that although it might have been made bona fide, it was not reasonable, and was not supported by evidence; and they therefore convicted the appellants.

Held, upon a case stated, that this was not a claim of right sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the justices.

This was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the county of Somerset, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose as herein-after stated.

At a petty session holden at Dunster in the said county on the 4th Jan. 1878 an information (hereinafter referred to as the first-mentioned information) was preferred by the said James Smith (hereinafter called the respondent) against the said William Theodore Pitt Watkins, William Theodore Watkins, and John Smith (hereinafter called the appellants), under sect. 30 of the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging for that they, the appellants, on the 17th Oct. 1877 at the parish of Dunster, in the said county, in the day time of the said day, to wit, about the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, unlawfully and wilfully did commit a trespass on certain land situate in the parish of Dunster, called "The Warren," and then and there being in the occupation of the said James Smith, by then and there wilfully entering and being in the daytime as aforesaid on the said land, in search and pursuit of conies without the license and consent of the said James Smith, or of any person having the right of killing the conies upon such land, contrary to the form of the said statute.

At the same petty session a similar information (hereinafter referred to as the secondly-mentioned information) was preferred by the said respondent against the said appellants, William Theodore Pitt Watkins and William Theodore Watkins, for a similar offence committed on the 9th Nov. 1877 on the same land.

And the said informations were heard and determined by the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the said three appellants named in the first-mentioned information were convicted before them of the said offence named in the said first-mentioned information; and the justices adjudged the said appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins to pay a penalty of 10s., and each of them the said William Theodore Watkins and John Smith to pay a penalty of 1s.; and the two appellants named in the said secondly-mentioned information were convicted before them of the said offence named in the said secondly-mentioned information, and the said appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins was adjudged to pay a penalty of 1l., the said appellant William Theodore Watkin to pay a penalty of 1s.

And whereas the said appellants, being dissatisfied with these determinations upon the hearing of the said informations as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the said justices in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determinations as aforesaid for the opinion of this court; and on their behalf a recognisance had been entered into as required by the said last-mentioned statute.

The said justices, in compliance with the said application, stated the following case:—

Upon such hearing it was proved by the evidence on the part of the informant in that behalf, and was admitted by the appellants, that the said three appellants named in the said first-mentioned information were present together on the land in question on the 17th Oct. 1877, in the daytime, in search or pursuit of conies; and that the said appellant, William Theodore Pitt Watkins did then and there shoot at and kill a rabbit or cony. And that the said two appellants named in the said secondly-mentioned information were present together on the land in question on the 9th Nov. 1877, in the daytime, in search or pursuit of conies, and that the said appellant, William Theodore Pitt Watkins did then and there shoot at and kill a rabbit or cony. And it was stated and deposed on oaths by "The said informant that he rents the land called the Warren," of Mr. Luttrell, and had done so for over twenty-three years; that he occupies it as a rabbit warren, and pays rent for it, and is entitled to the rabbits thereon. And that the land on which the trespasses mentioned in the informations were committed is part of the tract of land called "The Warren" so rented by him in the said parish of Dunster. And that on the days mentioned in the informations he saw the appellants respectively trespassing there, and saw the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins shoot the two rabbits there. On cross-examination the informant stated that he came up to the said William Theodore Pitt Watkins when he was shooting the rabbits, the said William Theodore Pitt Watkins requested him to leave his (the appellant's) land, and ultimately put his hand on him, and put him off the land; that he did not tell Morgans and Guard, the proprietors of the chemical works, that the land in question was his land, that they had never asked him, that they did put stuff there, and that he had it removed, that he asked them to remove it, and they did so within a day.

It was contended by William Theodore Pitt Watkins on behalf of himself and the other appellants that the land on which the alleged trespasses were committed formed part of land and premises known as The Warren Chemical Works, which were demised by Mr. Luttrell to Messrs. Morgans and Guard, for a term of eighty years, from the 25th March 1872 by lease at the rent of 20l. per annum, and which land and premises so demised had been assigned by Morgans and Guard to a limited liability company, and had been purchased of that company by him the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins, and that the alleged trespasses were done by his authority and direction, and in exercise of his legal right and title to a yard and premises known as The Warren Chemical Works;

Q.B. Div.]

WATKINS v. SMITH.

[Q.B. Div.]

that questions of title of the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins were involved in the case, and that therefore the said justices possessed no jurisdiction to determine the same.

To support that contention he called Mr. James Milne, who deposed that he was engaged by the company in treating with Morgans and Guard for purchasing the chemical works, and asked Mr. Morgans to show him the boundaries, and that Mr. Morgans did so, and stated that they included the land on which the trespasses were alleged to have been committed; that there was a quantity of timber—some stacked and some lying on the ground at that time—that he inspected the chemical works from Sept. 1873 to July 1875, and that about the end of 1874 he took the management of the business and managed it for about eight months altogether. The company took over from Morgans and Guard their stock of timber; the bulk of the timber belonging to the company was lying outside the space marked pink in the plan referred to and annexed to the case, and a portion of it was near the ground where the trespasses were alleged to have been committed. The space of ground between the wall of a cottage and garden and an elder bush, and which comprised the spots where the trespasses were alleged to have been committed, was constantly covered by the company's timber, and that the respondent never spoke to him on the subject.

Two other witnesses, namely, Walter Allen and James Baker, one a waggoner, and the other a labourer, who had worked for Morgans and Guard and for the company, were called by the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins, and deposed as to the depositing of timber outside of the alleged boundary chemical works as shown by the plan, and on the land claimed by the appellant as part of the chemical works. The witness Allen said they used to put the timber anywhere between the chemical works and the seashore.

No documentary evidence was produced by the appellants, nor was any evidence adduced of the transfer of the chemical works from Morgans and Guard to the limited liability company, or from the company to the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins.

In anticipation of and in answer to the claim of right set up by the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins, the informant (now the respondent), called Mr. Thomas Hawkes, a surveyor, who produced and proved a plan made by him on measurement and scale, showing the chemical works marked pink on the plan, and the part of "The Warren" where the trespasses were alleged to have been committed; and he also produced a counterpart of the lease granted to Morgans and Guard, such counterpart having been executed by them, and on which counterpart is indorsed a plan (described in the counterpart of the lease as being a plan of the demised premises, corresponding with the plan produced by the witness). The demised premises are stated on the lease to contain by admeasurement one acre and one rood, and the witness said that the quantity so stated corresponds by scale and admeasurement with the part marked pink on the plan. The spots where the alleged trespasses were committed are marked with a red dot on the plan, and were pointed out by the witness Hawkes and by the respondent and were stated by Mr. Hawkes to be sixty-eight yards from the boundary of the premises as shown on the plan called the chemical works. He also deposed that the land where the trespasses were alleged to have been committed had been included in the lease, the quantity of land would have been double what it is stated in the lease to be. Mr. Hawkes also stated that the quantity marked pink on the plan is one acre one quarter and six perches, and that it included a portion of the sea beach perhaps. Mr. Watkins denied the accuracy of the plan.

It appeared to the justices from the evidence that the land called "The Warren" is a rabbit warren, and that the ground adjoining and outside of the boundary of the chemical works, as shown in the plan, is in a rough and uncultivated state, and not liable to be damaged by timber being placed upon it.

The justices being of opinion that it was clearly shown by the evidence of Mr. Hawkes and by the counterpart of the lease produced that the land on which the trespasses were alleged to have been committed was not comprised in the lease to Morgans and Guard; that by the alleged user of such land by Morgans and Guard, and by the limited liability company, they did not acquire any right thereto; and that the claim of right to such land set up by the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins was unfounded and unsustainable; and that although it might have been made bonâ fide, it was not reasonable and was not supported by any evidence, and did not take the case out of their jurisdiction; and the said justices gave their determination against the appellants in the manner hereinbefore stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court therefore is. Was the claim of right set up by the appellant William Theodore Pitt Watkins sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the magistrates?

If the court should be of opinion that the said convictions were legal and properly made, then the said convictions were to stand. But if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said informations were to be dismissed.

Cole, Q.C. argued for the appellants.—I admit that magistrates are not bound to recognise an impossible or even unreasonable claim of right, and they may ignore a mere subterfuge; but it is not in their power to give themselves jurisdiction by their own finding; the facts must show the want of reason in the claim. Here it appears that the defendant had a reasonable and substantial ground for believing his right to shoot at this spot, and the magistrates find that he did so believe. In Reg. v. Cridland (7 E. & B. 853) the general rule was said to be that in case of summary convictions of this kind justices have jurisdiction to determine whether the claim to title to real property is set up bonâ fide; but if it is bonâ fide set up, they have no jurisdiction to proceed further in the matter; and that the proviso in the 30th section "that any person charged with any such trespass shall be at liberty to prove, by way of defence, any matter which would have been a defence to an action at law for such trespass," does not give justices jurisdiction to determine a claim of title to land against the wish of the defendants. This rule was acted upon in Legg v. Pardo (9 C. B. N. S. 289) and in Reg. v. Stimpson (32 L. J. 208, M. C.).

Q.B. Div.] GUARDIANS OF TENTERDEN UNION v. GUARDIANS OF ST. MARY, ISLINGTON. [C.P. Div.]

Charles, Q.C. appeared for the respondent, but was not heard.

MELLOR, J.—I certainly for some time was under the impression that the justices had gone into a consideration of the circumstances which they thought could not sustain the defendant's title, but, looking at all the circumstances, what occurred comes to this: Defendant says: "Under the lease made to the chemical works, under which I claim as a purchaser, the particular spot in question is within the boundary of the parcels demised by the lease: and the plan which appears to negative that view is certainly incorrect as regards the position of a cottage and pigsty which I occupy." But by no possibility can the plan produced be made to include the spot where the trespass was committed. The justices have only said: "You have produced no evidence at all to show your title. You may bonâ fide believe that the particular spot comes within your boundary, but there is nothing on the face of the evidence to show that it was so." I think the justices have decided nothing but that the title set up by the defendant cannot include the spot in question: and that this is rather like the cases which go to show that where a bonâ fide belief exists in a right which the law does not recognise or sanction, then the justices need not recognise the right.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the justices were right in holding that although the present defendant might have bonâ fide believed in the existence of the right he claimed, yet that his belief was not a reasonable one or supported by evidence, and that his claim cannot be supported at law. The statute provides that a person charged may prove any defence which would in law be an answer to an action for the trespass. I quite agree with Mr. Cole, that if there was any evidence which could have supported the claim of the appellant, the jurisdiction of the justices would have been ousted. I think it is clear that there is no such evidence here. Prima facie, perhaps, the stacking of timber would show that the land was included in the demise; but the lease itself is produced, and the quantity of the parcels as described therein is conclusive that they were never intended to include that land. The description is of a specified quantity of land, and the particular spot in question is shown on the plan drawn in the margin of the lease to be about sixty yards away from any part of the premises demised. If so, it is utterly impossible that the piece of land on which the trespass was committed could be included in the lease; and the defendant does not claim by any other title. Although the plan appears not to be strictly correct, yet it cannot be altered so as to include the spot of land in question without altering altogether the shape of the piece of land demised, and making it include twice as much land as is comprised in the lease. I am of opinion, therefore, that the defendant has not produced such evidence as could show that he was entitled to the spot of land upon which the trespass was committed, and that the justices had jurisdiction to determine the case.

MELLOR, J.—I see that the case of Watkins v. Major (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 662; 33 L. T. Rep. 352) was a decision consistent with ours.

GUARDIANS OF TENTERDEN POOR LAW UNION (apps.)
v. GUARDIANS OF ST. MARY, ISLINGTON (resps.)^(a)

Poor law—Settlement—Derivative and birth settlement—Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. 61) s. 35—Retrospective effect of statute.

E. S., the bastard daughter of A. S., was born in 1856, in the parish of T., in Sussex, A. S. being then and afterwards settled in the parish of R., in the appellants' union. E. S. had not acquired a settlement in her own right.

Held, that E. S. was settled in the parish where she was born, and was not chargeable to the appellants' union.

Sect. 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61 (the Poor Law Amendment Act 1870), so far as it provides that an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until it acquires another settlement, is not retrospective so as to affect a pauper who has acquired a birth settlement by attaining the age of sixteen before its passing.

APPEAL from the order of justices, adjudging Ellen Sherwood, a pauper, to be settled within and chargeable on the union of the appellants.

Ellen Sherwood went into service in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, on the 17th May 1874, and after staying seven months, received serious injuries by accidental burning. She was sent to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where she remained sixteen months, and was then removed to the work-house of the Islington Union as incurable.

On the 21st July 1877 the justices for Middlesex made an order for her removal to the Tenterden Union, which was the order appealed against.

Ellen Sherwood was the illegitimate daughter of Ann Sherwood, who was settled at the time of the birth of Ellen Sherwood, and afterwards, within the appellants' union. Ellen Sherwood was born in 1856, in the parish of Ticehurst, in Sussex, not in the appellants' union. Under the poor law previous to the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1870 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), a bastard child took and followed a settlement of its mother until it attained the age of sixteen (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71), and at the age of sixteen took the settlement of its birth. Sect. 35 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1870 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) enacts that no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child should take the settlement of its father or widowed mother, as the case might be, up to that age, and should retain the settlement so taken until it should acquire another; and that an illegitimate child should retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquired another settlement.

Neither Ellen Sherwood nor Ann Sherwood the mother had ever acquired a settlement in her own right.

C.P. Div.] THE BENFIELDSIDE LOCAL BOARD v. THE CONSETT IRON COMPANY (LIMITED). [Ex. Div.]

Mead, for the appellants, contended that the pauper Ellen Sherwood, on attaining the age of sixteen, took her birth settlement in lieu of that which she had previously taken by derivation from her mother under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, citing Ipswich Union v. Guardians of Great Yarmouth, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. Div. 269.

Tickell, for the respondents, argued that that portion of sect. 35 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1870 which provided that an illegitimate child should retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquired another settlement, was retrospective; and that consequently Ellen Sherwood, though she attained the age of sixteen before the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, must be regarded as retaining her derivative settlement in the appellants' union. He cited

Yarmouth v. City of London, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 217; and Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn v. Overseers of Barrow-in-Furness, L. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. 88.

DENMAN, J.—Our judgment must be for the appellants. Sect. 71 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, s. 76, enacts that every bastard shall have and follow the settlement of the mother until such child shall attain the age of sixteen, or shall acquire a settlement in his own right. Under this section it was held that after the age of sixteen the place of the birth of the child became the place of his settlement, and the child might be removed there. That was the state of the law when the new Act came into operation, and sect. 35 of that Act is relied on by the respondents. Sect. 35 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 enacts, that no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage or otherwise, except in the case of a wife or of a child under the age of sixteen; and that an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement. Now that is a general enactment, and is not intended to repeal former statutes. The former statute is not repealed in any other way and remains in force, except so far as it may be actually repealed by the Act of 1876. It is a canon of construction that no statute is to be construed so as to repeal another statute, unless such construction is absolutely necessary, because the two cannot stand together. I can see nothing in this statute which necessarily prevents the older one from remaining in force, so far as relates to illegitimate children who had passed the age of sixteen when the latter statute came into operation. The words relied upon are "an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement," and it is argued that these words are sufficient to make this child, who was sixteen years old before this Act came into force, and whose settlement then was the settlement of her birth, take the settlement of her mother until she acquires another settlement of her own. I do not think that is the right interpretation, or that the cases cited go to that extent. I think the ratio decidendi in those cases applied only to derivative settlements that were actually in existence when the Act was passed, derived from another person by birth, parentage, or otherwise. In this particular case the child had long lost her settlement when the Act was passed. I think therefore that sect. 35 of the Act of 1876 has not a retrospective effect upon her, and that the appellants are entitled to succeed.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is no serious difficulty in this case, when the language of the sections referred to is looked at and understood. At the time the Act was passed the pauper had lost her derivative settlement. It is argued that the language of the Act is intended to be retrospective, and in some sense, and to a certain extent, it may be so; but it is quite obvious that we cannot give it retrospective operation absolutely and without limit; nor was such a retrospective operation declared by the cases which have been cited of the Westbury and Yarmouth Unions (ubi sup.). In both those cases the pauper had a derivative settlement at the time the Poor Law Amendment Act was passed. Now, we are asked to make it retrospective in this sense—that it applies to all persons who, at any time, have had a derivative settlement. I think that we should be acting contrary to the principle of the case in the Queen's Bench Division (Reg. v. Ipswich Union (ubi sup.)) and to every true canon of construction, if we held that this Act applied to a person whose derivative settlement had long since ceased to exist when it was passed, and to say that it did apply because she had in days long past a derivative settlement from her mother, would be to put an unnecessary and strained construction upon the statute.

A lord of a manor or his lessees or assigns, to whom, in the widest terms, were reserved in a Local Inclosure Act all rights belonging to the manor, and all mines, &c. under the commons of the manor to be inclosed under the Act, with power to do all necessary acts for draining, winning, and working the said mines, &c., "as fully and freely as he or they could have had, held, used, or enjoyed the same in case the Act had not been made, and that without paying any damages or making any satisfaction for so doing," cannot, notwithstanding such reservation, work the mines underneath the public highways set out in and over the said commons under the Act, and thereby directed to be for ever maintained and kept in repair by the inhabitants and occupiers of the district in which the same are situated, in such a way as to injure the said highways by withdrawing the natural support of the surface and causing them to sink below their ordinary level, without rendering themselves liable, at the suit of the persons upon whom by law the duty of keeping such highways in repair is cast, to an action for the recovery of the cost of repairing the injury so done; and such reservation of rights and powers to the lord and his lessees and assigns must be taken to be subject to the paramount right of the public to have the highways in question preserved and maintained in a fit and proper condition for the free use of them by all the Queen's subjects.

So held by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Cleasby, B.), distinguishing the case of the Duke of Buccleugh v. Wakefield (in the House of Lords) (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102; L. Rep. E. & I. App. 377; 39 L. J. 441, Ch.)

THIS is an action brought by the Benfieldside Local Board to recover damages for injuries done to certain highways within their district by the defendants, and by consent there has been stated for the opinion of the court the following

CASE.

1. In the year 1773 an inclosure Act, known as "The Lancaster Common Division Act," was passed for the purpose of dividing and inclosing certain moors, commons, or tracts of waste land within the parish and manor of Lancaster, in the county palatine of Durham, containing by estimation 20,000 acres or thereabouts.

2. The preamble recited that the Bishop of Durham, in right of his church and see of Durham, was lord of the manor of Lancaster aforesaid, and as such seised of and entitled to the soil of and royalties within and under the said moors or commons or tracts of waste lands, and certain commissioners were appointed for the purpose of making the division. The commissioners made their award on the 13th June 1781. So much of their award as is essential to this case is hereinafter set out.

3. The Act enacted that the commissioners should Assign, set out, and appoint such public highways and roads in, through, and over the residue or more improveable parts of the said moors or commons, intended to be divided and inclosed, as they should think proper and convenient (which highways and roads should not be less than sixty feet of assize in breadth between the ditches) and should also assign, set out, and appoint proper parts of such residue or more improveable parts of the said moors or commons for common quarries, common watering-places for cattle, and common wells, and should also assign and set out such common public and private, horse, and other roads, ways, passages, and bridges, and such gates, stiles, hedges, sewers, drains, and water-courses in, over, upon, and through the said lands and grounds so to be inclosed as they should see proper, useful, and convenient.

4. And it further enacted:

That the said commissioners and their successors, or any two of them, should and might order all public highways, roads, bridges, and drains by the Act appointed to be set out, to be well and sufficiently made, &c., in manner therein named, and that the charges and expenss thereof should be borne, raised, and paid as and in manner therein mentioned, and should order, direct, and appoint the manner in which the said highways, roads, &c., to be so made, &c., should be for ever maintained and kept in repair; and that after the making of the award, and of such highways and roads and other ways, it should not be lawful for any person or persons to make or use any roads or ways, either public, common, or private, in, over, or through the said allotments, or any of them, or any part thereof (other than and except the said lord bishop and his successors, and his and their lessees and assigns as thereafter mentioned), either on foot or on horseback, or with horses, cattle, carts, or carriages, or otherwise, other than such as should be so set out and appointed by the said commissioners as aforesaid, and that all former roads and ways which should not be set out and appointed as roads and ways through the said intended inclosures should be deemed part of the lands to be inclosed, and should be divided and allotted, held and enjoyed, as part of such lands accordingly.

5. And it was further enacted:

That nothing in the Act contained should be construed or adjudged to defeat, lessen, or prejudice the right, title, or interest of the said Lord Bishop of Durham, as lord of the said manor of Lancaster, or his successors, or his or their lessees or assigns, or any of them, of in and to the seignior and royalties incident and belonging to the said manor; but the lord of the said manor for the time being, and his lessees and lessees and assigns, should and might, from time to time and at all times for ever thereafter, hold and enjoy all courts, perquisites, and profits of courts, rents, services, waifs, estrays, and all royalties, jurisdictions, matters, and things whatsoever to the said manor, or to the lord thereof for the time being, incident, belonging, or appertaining, other than and except such common right as could or might be claimed by him or them as owner or owners of the soil and inheritance of the said moors or commons, in as full, ample, and beneficial a manner to all intents and purposes as he or they could or might have held or enjoyed the same if this Act had not been made; and also that the said Lord Bishop of Durham and his successors, and his and their lessees and lessees and assigns, should and might from time to time, and at all times thereafter, have hold work, and enjoy all mines, minerals, and quarries, of what nature or kind soever lying and being within or under the said moors or commons intended to be divided or allotted as aforesaid, together with all convenient and necessary ways and wayleaves in, through, over, and along the said moors or commons, or any part thereof, not only before, but also at all times after the same shall be divided in pursuance and by virtue of this Act, and full and free liberty at all times thereafter of making, laying, repairing, and using any new road or roads, waggon way, or waggon ways, or any other way or ways whatsoever, in, through, over and along the same or any part thereof, and for that purpose to take away and remove any hedges, fences, trees, partitions, or other obstructions which shall be made for dividing the said moors, or commons, or otherwise, or which shall be standing or growing thereon, and to do every other act which shall be necessary to be done for the purpose aforesaid, and of searching for, draining, winning, and working the said mines and quarries, and also all other mines and quarries belonging to the see and bishopric of Durham, wheresoever the same are or be, by any ways or means now in use or hereafter to be invented, and also of leading and carrying away all and every the coals, lead, minerals, stones, the manure bred at the said mines, and other things to be gotten thereout, or out of any other land or grounds whatsoever, and also of leading and carrying all iron, wood, materials, and things unto the said mines and quarries, needful, necessary, or proper for the draining, winning, working, and use of the same respectively, and of making pits, shafts, pit rooms, heap rooms, drifts, levels, watercourses, and drains, and of using as theretofore all those buildings, workshops for smiths and wrights, hay yards, and raff yards, already erected for the purpose of working the coal mines under the said moors or commons, and of erecting and using fire engines and other engines, and other buildings, workshops, hay yards and raff yards, pit rooms and heap rooms, and all and every other necessary and convenient works, buildings, erections, liberties, powers, and authorities either now in use or hereafter to be invented, together also with full and free liberty, power, and authority, from time to time and at all times, at his and their will and pleasure, to remove and take away from off the said moors or commons, convert to their own use or uses, all and every the rails, sleepers, iron, timber, and other materials of the said waggon ways and other ways, pits, shafts, fire engines, and other engines, shops, and other works, buildings, and erections whatsoever, already laid, placed, built, or erected, or hereafter to be laid, placed, built, or erected as aforesaid as fully and freely as he or they might or could have had, held, used, and enjoyed the same in case this Act had not been made, and that without paying any damages or making any satisfaction for so doing.

Provided always,

That in the leading or carrying away any of the coals, stone, rubbish, or other things, to be gotten out of any coal pit or pits wrought or used for land sale only, and which shall and may be led or carried away by any carts, or waines, or other carriages than coal waggons, and in the leading or carrying away any materials, utensils, or things to or from such pit or pits the nearest and most direct roads, ways, or courses, in or through the allotments to be set out as aforesaid, shall be used to and from such pit or pits into and from the next adjoining public or common highways, and no such roads, ways, or courses shall exceed sixty feet in breadth, and as little damage and spoil of ground as may be shall be done or made in or to such allotments by the winning or working of such land-sale pit or pits, or passing or repassing of such carts, waines, or carriages.

6. In order to provide compensation for surface damage to the allotments by the working of the mines, minerals, and quarries, the commissioners were empowered to allot to the justices of Durham any quantity of the moor not exceeding 500 acres, and not less than 300 acres, in one entire plot or parcel, to be held and enjoyed by them upon the several trusts, and for the intents and purposes thereafter mentioned; and in reference thereto the Act contained provisions,

That when and so often as any person or persons shall suffer or sustain any loss or damage in his allotment by the searching for, winning, or working of the said mines and quarries therein, or the leading or carrying away the coals, &c., to be gotten thereout, or out of any other mines or quarries belonging to the said Lord Bishop of Durham and his successors, or by the using any of the powers or liberties thereby reserved to and for the said Lord Bishop and his successors, and his lessee and lessees and assigns as aforesaid, such person so damaged, upon making such complaint, shall receive such satisfaction for such damage as thereafter is directed in that behalf.

7. Then follow directions for letting the allotment, and powers to appoint a steward. And then, after charging the rents with the expenses of management, it is provided,

That the residue or clear balance thereof shall from time to time be paid, applied, and disposed of in manner following: Upon the complaint of any person so to be damaged as aforesaid, the justices of the peace at the sessions as therein mentioned shall examine and inquire into such complaint in a summary way in manner therein directed, and finally settle, ascertain, and determine the damages sustained by the person complaining as aforesaid, and thereupon shall order their steward, clerk, agent, and receiver forthwith upon demand to pay the same, together with reasonable charges on account of making and prosecuting such complaint, unto the person so complaining, or to such other person as the said justices shall direct; and the residue or surplus (if there be any) of the said rents, &c., shall from time to time be applied and laid out in the repairing, amending, and supporting the public and common highways, causeways, and other ways set out and made upon or through the said moors or commons by virtue of this Act, in such manner as the said justices shall from time to time order, direct, and appoint; and whereas it may happen in some years that the clear rents and profits of the said last-mentioned allotment or parcel of ground may not be sufficient to satisfy and pay all the damages and charges which may be so sustained, and so settled, ascertained, and determined by the said justices as aforesaid; Be it therefore enacted that in every such case so happening the deficiency, after such application of the said rents and profits as aforesaid, shall be paid and borne by the owners or occupiers of all the several allotments of the said moors or commons (save and except the said allotments so to be vested in the said justices, but including that or those of the persons so damaged and making complaint), according to the respective yearly rents or values of the same, as they shall respectively be rated or charged for or towards the relief of the poor of the several parishes, townships, or places wherein they shall respectively lie, in such shares and manner as the said justices shall direct or appoint.

A power to levy such damages by distress under an order of justices, in case of refusal or neglect to pay the same, was then given, and a proviso followed enabling every occupier or tenant who had paid such damages to deduct the same from his rent.

8. In 1779, before the commissioners made their award, a further Act was passed, by which the provisions of the Lanchester Act with reference to the allotment set out to the justices were considerably varied, and the commissioners were authorised to allot to the purchaser the said plot free of all rents, tithes, and only subject to the payment of a perpetual yearly rent-charge of 30*l.* to the Justices of Durham, or such advanced rent as the same might be sold for; and whereby it was further enacted that the said yearly rent should be paid, applied, and disposed of, under the direction of the justices, in the same manner and form, upon the like complaints, inquiries and proofs, and for the same uses, ends, and purposes, as the rents and profits of the said plot in case the same had been let by the justices according to the first-mentioned Act.

9. The commissioners by their award, in pursuance of these provisions, allotted the said allotment of 300 acres, subject to the perpetual rent-charge of 30*l.*, which sum has ever since been paid to the treasurer of the county by the owners for the time being of the allotment; but it is quite insufficient to meet all the claims for compensation upon it.

10. The commissioners by their general award, made in accordance with the foregoing provisions, set out among other roads a public highway sixty feet in breadth in, through, and over the more improveable parts of the said moors and commons called the Shotley-bridge and Durham-road, and also another public highway sixty feet in breadth in, through, and over part of the said moors and commons called the Shotley-bridge and Newcastle-road, and thereby directed that the same should be (as to the portions within the township of Benfieldside) for ever thereafter maintained and kept in repair by all and every the inhabitants and occupiers for the time being of lands, tenements, woods, tithes, and hereditaments within the township of Benfieldside, in like manner as the said inhabitants and occupiers were by law liable to repair other highways within the said township.

11. And the commissioners by their general award further ordered and directed,

That all and every the before-mentioned public highways by them set out and appointed, as well those of the breadth of sixty feet, as also the public roads or ways which are less than sixty feet in breadth, should at all times thereafter be and continue of the several and respective breadths thereinbefore mentioned and prescribed, and that it should and might be lawful to and for all persons whomsoever, at all times thereafter, to go, pass, and re-pass on foot and on horseback, and with horses, coaches, carts, and carriages, and also to lead and drive all and all manner of cattle and other things, in, through, over, and along the said respective public highways and roads at their free will and pleasure.

12. Under a large portion of the 20,000 acres so allotted, including the part of the land so allotted near to the said highways, and under the said highways themselves, there were and are valuable seams of coal, which, as before stated, were at the time of the passing of the Act of 1773 the property of the Bishops of Durham, and were specially reserved to them under the clauses of the Act before set out. These coal seams now belong to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are now lords of the manor, with the same powers of working and leasing the coal seams and minerals as the Bishops of Durham previously enjoyed. The coal seams have been leased by them to and are worked by the Consett Iron Company, the present defendants.

13. In consequence of the mining operations of the defendants, which have been carried on near to and underneath the two highways so set out as above mentioned, portions of these roads near to Blackline and Shotley-bridge railway station, and being within the township of Benfieldside, sunk below their original level and became, until repaired, dangerous to travel over.

14. The Benfieldside local board, in whom the roads within the township of Benfieldside are now vested, and whose duty it is to repair them, have been put to an expense of about 30% up to the present time in filling in the cracks and falls caused by the shrinking of the surface of those roads in consequence of such mining operations, and in keeping such roads level and in good repair.

15. The defendants admit the damage done to the roads, but they refuse to reimburse the local board the expenses they have so incurred, on the ground that, under the mining powers and reservations contained in the Lanchester Inclosure Act of 1773, they are entitled to work the whole of the coal without being under any obligation to leave any support for the surface, and without making any compensation for injury thereto.

16. At the time of the passing of the Lanchester Inclosure Act of 1773 the customary mode of working coal in the county of Durham was by leaving ribs or pillars of coal to support the surface, and such continued to be the practice till shortly after the passing of the Act, since which time it has become customary to take the whole of the coal where the owner of the coal is not liable for surface damage in working such coal, it being usual to begin by leaving pillars of coal to support the roof, which pillars in working back again are removed. Some of the seams of coal under and near to the roads in question are on the outcrop, and so near the surface that the coal could not be worked, even by leaving pillars of coal, without probably causing some, although slight, damage to the roads.

17. It is admitted that the coal has been and is worked by the defendants in the usual manner, according to the present mode of working coal, when the object is to extract the whole of the coal without regard to the damage done to the surface, but that the effect of such working has been and is to damage the said highways, and to cause them to be out of repair, and of such mode of working is pursued under the said roads, that many parts thereof will become, where they are near the outcrop, quite impassable.

18. The owners and lessees of the coal rely on what they contend is the unmistakeable meaning of the Act, which grants to them right, at all times after the passing of the Act, to hold, work, and enjoy all mines, minerals, and quarries lying under the said moors and commons, and full and free liberty at all times thereafter of making any new road or roads or waggon way, over and along the same, with power to remove the fences made for dividing the moors, and to do every act necessary for searching for and winning and working the mines by any ways or means then in use, or thereafter to be invented, and that without paying any damages or making any satisfaction for so doing. They also rely on the fact that the award made in pursuance of the Act points out fully the mode in which all roads set out under the Act shall be maintained.

And, moreover, that the Act itself provides a special fund, out of which any damages to be caused by working the mines shall be paid, and in the event of that source proving insufficient, it enacts that the deficiency shall be made good by the proprietors of all the allotments.

They also contend that, if the improved method of mining, under which the whole of the coal came to be removed, was not put in practice until after the date of the Act, yet such altered mode of working is nothing more than is permitted by the Act, in giving power to work the mines without limitation of any kind, and in describing the powers and authorities conferred as being those either now in use or hereafter to be invented.

19. The Benfieldside Local Board, on the other hand, contend that by every rule of construction, and on grounds of public policy, the roads referred to, being set out under the authority of the Act as public highways, every other clause in the Act must be construed as subject to the paramount right of the public to have the highways supported by all or so much of the coal as is necessary for their support, and kept free from pitfalls; also that from the mode of working coal at the time the Act was passed, it was not contemplated any serious injury would follow from the working of the coal such as now results from the entire removal of the coal, and that the compensation clauses have consequently relation to surface injuries by acts done on the surface; but that, in any view of the case, the compensation clauses do not affect the present question, as those clauses were only intended to cover damage done to the allottees in their allotments under the powers reserved to the owners of the minerals and their lessees.

20. On these facts the question for the opinion of the court is, on the proper construction of the Lanchester Inclosure Act, are the owners of the minerals, and their lessees, entitled to work the coal as claimed in paragraph 15, and so as to withdraw the natural support of the roads set out under the Act, and that without making any compensation for injury thereby caused to such roads?

If the court should be of opinion that they are not so entitled, the judgment in this action shall be entered for the plaintiffs for 30% damages and costs, otherwise judgment shall be entered for the defendants with costs.

Hugh Cowie (with whom was J. D. Fitzgerald), for the plaintiffs, contended that the roads in question having been set out under the Inclosure Act of 1773 as public highways, the defendants were not empowered or entitled by that Act, notwithstanding the wide terms of the clause reserving all mining rights and powers to the lord and his lessees and assigns, to work these mines in such a way as to injure the highways lying above them. The argument on the part of the defendants, if good to the extent that the present lessees may do with impunity the injury to the highway now complained of, must go still further, and say that the lord of the manor might, the moment after the highways were first set out, have blocked them up, or even have utterly destroyed them, and that the defendants, as lessees of the present lords, may do so now. These roads were set out under the Act as public highways, and were not included in the words of the reservation (paragraph 5 of the case), "moors or commons intended to be divided and allotted as aforesaid," under which the mine owners were entitled to work mines without paying any damages. The compensation clauses in the Act referred only to damage done to the allottees, and the Act contained no provision for compensating the public for any injury to them or their rights, unless there were a surplus after the claims of the allottees had been satisfied. The Act gave no power to the lord or his lessees to work the mines so as to injure the highways set out under it, and the right of the public to the free user of such highway was paramount to the reserved rights and powers of the mine owners. The present was not, as in many previous cases it had been, a question of the right to interfere with the exercise of a private right, but it was a case in which the right of the public and the private right of the lord and his lessees were in conflict, and the question was, how, under such circumstances, and the rights of both the public and the private owner having been created under the same Act, the Act itself was to be construed, and what effect was to be given to it. It must be remembered, too, that at the date of the Act (1773) it was not the practice to work mines in such a way as to let down the surface at all, so that much less could the lord at that time have worked them so as to let down these highways. He cited and commented on the following cases:

Blackett v. Bradley and others, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 832; 1 B. & S. 940; 31 L. J. 65, Q. B.;

Roberts v. Haines, 6 E. & B. 648; 25 L. J. 353, Q. B.; affirmed in error, 7 E. & B. 625;

Hest v. Gill (before the Lord Justices), 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 699; 41 L. J. 761, Ch.;

The Duke of Buccleuch v. Wakefield (in the House of Lords), L. Rep. 4 E. & L. App. 377; 39 L. J. 441, Ch.; a. c. nom. Wakefield v. The Duke of Buccleuch, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102

Herschell, Q.O. (with whom was Crompton), for the defendants, contra.—The question before the court involves the right to work as well mines lying under land adjacent to these highways as those immediately subjacent; and if the contention on the part of the plaintiffs is upheld, it follows that the defendants will be prevented from working not only the subjacent but the adjacent mines, if their working shall in either case cause the surface to sink. Under the old mode of working, even when intermediate pillars were left, some amount of injury, though it may be it would have been of a trifling character, would have resulted to the highway. Originally the entire right of soil, both above and below, subject only to rights of pasturage, was in the lord, and the Inclosure Act took from him a portion of the surface and vested it, partly in the allottees, partly in himself as compensation for loss of rights of common, and partly in trustees, but all mining rights were left wholly and solely in him. The Act made no distinction between mines lying underneath the highways directed to be set out and those lying under the rest of the commons and allotments, but gave full power to the lord and his lessees and assigns of mining underneath every part of the common, and that, expressly, "without paying any damages or making any satisfaction for so doing." Moreover, not only does the Act give the power to the lord, &c., but it goes on to prescribe the mode of compensating for any damage resulting from such working, a portion of the lord's common being set apart, without any compensation to him for the same, to meet such damage after the claims of the allottees shall have been satisfied. The lord's rights, therefore, which have been in express terms reserved to him by the Act, will be seriously and injuriously affected and abridged if he or his lessees are to be precluded from working the mines lying either under or adjacent to these highways. No doubt the claim of the defendants is one that can be supported only by express statutory enactment, and that it is confidently contended is clearly the case here. It might possibly be that the lord would not be justified in working the mines so as to entirely destroy the highway; but he is clearly, it is submitted, entitled to work them so as only to cause such amount of injury to the roads as can easily be repaired, as in the present instance, and the court will not construe the Act so as to hold that the mines are to remain unworked because some small amount of damage may accrue to the highways by the working. He commented on the cases cited on the other side, and relied on The Duke of Buccleuch v. Wakefield (ubi sup.); and cited in addition

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs in this action are entitled to the judgment of the court. The question arises under an Inclosure Act passed so far back as the year 1773 for inclosing Lanchester Commons in the county of Durham, under the provisions of which Act certain public roads have been constructed and established for the use of the public at large, and have existed for a great many years. Now, upon looking to the case, we find in paragraph 3 the power and duty conferred and imposed on the commissioners to "assign, set out, and appoint such public highways and roads, in, through, and over the residue or more improveable parts of the said moors and commons intended to be divided and inclosed as they shall think proper and convenient;" and then in paragraph 4 there is a provision under which, in effect, all former roads and ways whatsoever, which were existing when the Act was passed, are extinguished, and an implied, or I might almost say an express, prohibition of the making or using any other roads whatever over the lands within the jurisdiction, and under the power of the commissioners, subject indeed to the power reserved to the lord of the manor, the then Bishop of Durham, and his successors, to make such other roads and ways for the use of the tenants of the manor, and for the purpose of working the mines. But as regards the public, the commoners, and all others interested in the matter, it was the duty of the commissioners to set out these public roads, and the same having been accordingly made, it is stated that certain mines situated underneath these roads, which were reserved to the lord of the manor, and which are now the property of the representatives of the then Bishop of

EX. DIV.] THE BENFIELDSIDE LOCAL BOARD v. THE CONSETT IRON COMPANY (LIMITED). [EX. DIV.]

Durham, have been worked in such manner as to cause considerable damage and injury to the public highways in question, and, as stated in paragraph 13 of the case, to cause portions of them to "sink below the original level, and to become dangerous to travel over." The question therefore arises, whether the act of the lords of the manor, the present owners of the mines, or of their lessees, the defendants, in so working the mines as to cause that injury to the highways, is lawful or not? We find from paragraph 15, that the defendants claim to be entitled to work the whole of the coal without being under any obligation to leave any support for the surface, and without making any compensation for injury thereto;" and in paragraph 20 the question is put for the court, whether "the owners of the minerals and their lessees are entitled to work the coal in the manner claimed in paragraph 15, and so as to withdraw the natural support of the roads set out under the Act, and that without making any compensation for injury thereby caused to such roads?" Now, the bare statement of that question is such as to create surprise; and the proposition involved in the claim put forth by the defendants is so extraordinary that it becomes necessary that we should endeavour to ascertain on what ground such a claim is founded. At the date of the passing of the Act in question the then Bishop of Durham, as the lord of the manor, was the owner of certain mines, and there are provisions in the Act of Parliament, as set out in paragraph 5 of the case, which reserve to the lord of the manor, and his successors and assigns, certain rights and powers; and as it is material to consider the precise terms of the provisions in question, I will refer to them rather more in detail than I should otherwise do. By the Act, then, the right is reserved to the lord to hold, work, and enjoy all mines, minerals, and quarries, together with all necessary ways, wayleaves, and means of access in and over the commons, and all means of making, laying, repairing, and using any new roads or waggon ways in, through, and over the same, and to do every act necessary to be done for the purposes aforesaid, and of searching for, draining, winning, and working the said mines and quarries, and also of leading and carrying away all the coals and minerals to be gotten thereout, and of using as theretofore all buildings, &c., necessary for the purpose of working the said mines, and of erecting and using fire and other engines, pit rooms and heap rooms, and all other necessary and convenient works, buildings, liberties, powers, and authorities either now in use or hereafter to be invented, &c., "as fully and freely as he or they might or could have had, held, used, and enjoyed the same in case this Act had not been made, and that without paying any damages or making any satisfaction for so doing." Now taking the whole of that clause together, what is the plain meaning of the words used? Do they give to the owner of the mines a right to work them in such a way as to take away the natural support of the surface of the roads above them, and to work the whole of the coal without being under any obligation to leave any support for the surface, and without making any compensation for injury thereto? If they do they must equally entitle the mine owner (and the right would arise under the same clause) to erect and use fire and other engines and workshops upon the surface, and in the very centre of these highways, and thus deprive the public of the use of them altogether. The plain answer to such a claim and to the contention of the defendants is simply, that whatever power was reserved to the owner of the mines must be subject to the other express provisions of the Act of Parliament, and if one of such provisions is to provide highways over the inclosures for the use of the public, there must of necessity be a qualification of the exercise of the power of mining; and it cannot be that the mine owner is entitled so to work as to take away the natural support of the roads that lie above the mines and cause them to sink, not only to the danger of the public, but absolutely to the total destruction of the highways themselves. The provisions of the Act of Parliament for setting out the highways are such as at once to repeal and to put an end to any power whatsoever which might otherwise be directly or indirectly conferred upon the lord of the manor, inconsistent with the creating, maintaining, and keeping in proper repair for the use of the public those highways which the commissioners are not only empowered, but expressly commanded, to make. It appears to me, therefore, that any act whatsoever done by the owner of the mines in the working of the mines, the effect of which is to interfere with the existence of or to prejudicially affect the highways or the user of them by the public, is, whatever may be the language of the reservation in favour of the mine owner, an unlawful act, and that such reservation must be held to be subject to the paramount right of the public to have these highways and roads preserved and maintained in a fit and proper condition for the free use of all the Queen's subjects. With regard to the authorities which have been cited on behalf of the defendants we may, I think, concede the full effect of them to the defendants, but unfortunately they are not, when carefully looked at, applicable to the facts and circumstances of the present case. In the case which was more particularly and very properly pressed upon our attention by the learned counsel for the defendants—I mean that of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Wakefield, in the House of Lords (ubi sup.)—there were no doubt powers reserved to the mine owner in respect of the lands to be inclosed, and which might afterwards be and were sold under the Act; but the decision in that case had nothing whatever to do with any highway, nor was there anything there to interfere with the express provisions of the Act of Parliament. The question in that case was solely with regard to the power of the mine owner to enter for mining purposes upon lands which had been purchased under the Act, and had been afterwards sold to various purchasers, and in substance to dispossess such purchasers of their lands upon paying the full value of the land so entered upon; and this the House of Lords held that the Duke of Buccleuch had a right to do. For all damage, injury, or loss sustained by the purchasers, through the exercise of the powers in question in that case, they were entitled, under the Act, to receive full compensation, and there was therefore nothing there that was repugnant to common sense, or one's ordinary sense of justice. It was in fact only notifying to the purchasers that they purchased their lands with the reservation of this power to the lord of the manor, and subject therefore to the possibility of his exercising it, and in substance taking possession of the purchased lands, compensating and paying the purchasers for the same. Such is the effect of that case; but to apply that to the present case, and to allow mines to be worked in such a way as would necessarily put an end to the existence of a public highway, or to suppose that power was conferred on the mine owner to commit an indictable nuisance, by causing a public highway to sink below its original level, without his being bound to make compensation, or offering any remedy or redress to the ratepayers, and above all to the public, would clearly be to put a construction upon this award contrary to the principles of justice and good sense. The injury done, be it more or less, is such as to compel the plaintiffs, upon whom is cast by law the duty of keeping these roads in a fit state for the public use, to repair them, and they are consequently entitled to call upon the defendants to repay them the costs of such repairs. Under these circumstances and for the reasons I have given, the judgment of the court must be in favour of the plaintiffs.

BARNES (app.) v. CHIPP (resp.)

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. In the case which has been referred to by my Lord, there was a reservation and power with regard to the whole of the minerals regardless of the surface, and there was a power to take and use land in such a way as might be necessary for the purpose. But the question before us is different from any that has been considered, and its decision rests, I think, on entirely different considerations. We have in the present case an enactment set out in paragraph 3, that the commissioners shall "assign, set out, and appoint certain public highways and roads." Then it appears by paragraph 10 that the commissioners did by their award, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament, set out the roads in question. As soon as that was done it had the unquestionable effect of an enactment, and the public had the right of user of the roads as public roads, and to pass over them from place to place without obstruction or interference. That right of free passage from place to place is one of the most important and essential rights of the public, and one than which none has been, or is, more carefully preserved and guarded. Anything therefore which interferes with that right, or with the free use of the highway, is unquestionably a public nuisance. How, when an Act of Parliament directs a public road to be made, can that Act be read as legalising such acts as create a public nuisance? It appears from paragraph 13 of the case that the roads "have sunk below their original level, and become, until repaired, dangerous to travel over." That is equivalent to a public nuisance. The question, therefore, distinctly arises, whether the same Act which created and appointed the roads also conferred the right to create a public nuisance upon them; and precisely the same question would arise with respect to another important matter, provided for by the same section of the Act which has been referred to, whereby the commissioners are also empowered to set out common wells and watering places, the water in which is thereby appropriated to the use of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. It would be a monstrous thing if it were possible that the defendants, or those exercising the rights reserved, could take away from the public the supply of water which the Act of Parliament intended them to have. But I think it is better to confine myself to the question before us, and that is the question of the roads. I would almost say that it is impossible to adopt any construction of words that should result in the conclusion that the same Act of Parliament that created a public highway legalised a public nuisance upon it, because every reservation of right, however worded, must, I should say, be read as subject to the public right, and as if such limitations were expressed. This appears to me to be sufficient for the conclusion at which we have arrived. I may say, with reference to the words in paragraph 5, "All mines, minerals, and quarries, of what nature or kind soever, lying and being within or under the said moors or commons intended to be divided and allotted as aforesaid," that I am by no means satisfied that the mines under the roads are not excluded by them; but upon the main point of the case I am clearly of opinion that there is nothing in the Act relied on by the defendants which entitles them to exercise their rights of mining in such a way as to interrupt or interfere with the full and free user of these highways by the public, and that consequently our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

BARNES (app.) v. CHIPP (resp.) (a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), sects. 6, 12, 14, 15, 20 and 21—Summary conviction for offence under sect. 6—Condition precedent to, under sect. 14—Analysis by public analyst—What notification by purchaser to seller is requisite.

The purchaser of any article of food must, as a condition precedent to proceedings and summary conviction under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), notify to the seller of the article, in the express words of sect. 14 of the Act, his intention to have the same analysed "by the public analyst"; and his merely telling the seller that "he had purchased the article for the purpose of analysis" is not a sufficient compliance with the requirement of that section to sustain a summary conviction under sect. 20 for an offence under sect. 6.

APPEAL against a conviction by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions in and for the city of Gloucester, on the 4th Jan. 1878, an information was preferred by Edward Chipp (the now respondent) against Thomas Barnes (the now appellant), under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), charging for that on the 25th Sept. 1877, at Barton St. Mary, in the city of Gloucester, the appellant did sell, to the prejudice of one Richard Bowen, the purchaser, certain food—to wit, one half-pint of gin—which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the said Richard Bowen; and, upon the hearing thereof, the appellant was convicted before the justices of the said offence, and adjudged by them to pay a penalty of 10s. and costs. And the appellant, being dissatisfied with such determination, the said justices, in compliance with his application in that behalf, under sect. 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, stated and signed the following

CASE.

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that on the day stated in the information the said Richard Bowen, who is a police constable stationed and residing at Gloucester, but not appointed by the local authority, went by the direction of the respondent, who is inspector of weights and measures for the city of Gloucester, to the house of the appellant, the Bell Inn, in Barton-street, in the said city, and asked the barmaid to supply him with half a pint of gin, which was supplied to him in a measure, and for which he paid her tenpence; that he then told her that he was a police constable, that he had purchased the gin for the purpose of analysis (but did not add "by the public analyst"), and that if she liked he would divide it (but did not add "into three parts") and give her a portion; but that she said she did not require it; that he then put it into a bottle, which was labelled 16, corked it, and sealed it with the county seal in the presence of the barmaid, and showed it to her, and asked her to make any mark she liked for the purpose of identification, which she declined to do; and that he then took the bottle to the police station, and handed it to the respondent in the same state. That the respondent, on the 9th day of Oct. 1877, took the bottle in the same state and handed it to Mr. John Horsley, the analyst appointed for the city of Gloucester, who does not reside within two miles of the residence of the said Richard Bowen, the purchaser, but resides at Cheltenham, nine miles from Gloucester. That on the said 9th day of Oct. 1877 the said John Horsley analysed a portion (about one-fourth) of the contents of the said bottle, and that it contained seventy-four parts of water and twenty-six parts of spirit, and was fifty under proof, and was diluted. That the said John Horsley drew the cork and with the same cork corked up the remainder of the contents of the said bottle (but did not then seal it), and locked it up in a cupboard in his laboratory, to which no one but himself had access; and that he gave his certificate of the result of the analysis to the respondent on the 21st day of Dec. 1877. That the said John Horsley sealed the said bottle on the 7th day of Jan. 1878, and not before, and delivered it back to the respondent on that day; and that he never divided the contents of the bottle into two parts other than by taking out a portion and analysing it.

No evidence was given as to the proper ingredients to be used in the manufacture of gin, nor as to the proper or usual strength at which gin ought to be sold; but it was found as a fact that the gin sold to Richard Bowen was not of the quality demanded by him.

It was contended before the justices on the part of the appellant that the proceeding must fail on each or upon all of the following several grounds:

First, that under the 13th section of the Act the person procuring a sample of food for the purpose of being analysed must be a medical officer of health, an inspector of nuisances, an inspector of weights and measures, an inspector of markets, or a police constable appointed by the local authority, and that Richard Bowen, the purchaser, was none of those. Secondly, that the 14th section of the Act had not been complied with, as Richard Bowen did not notify to the seller his intention to have the gin analysed by "the public analyst," and did not offer to divide it into three parts. Thirdly, that the 15th section of the Act had not been complied with, as the analyst did not divide the gin into two parts, and did not seal or fasten up one of those parts and cause it to be delivered to the purchaser, either upon the sale of the sample or after he supplied his certificate to the purchaser. Fourthly, that the purchaser did not himself take the gin to the analyst, nor send it by post in the manner provided by the 16th section of the Act.

The justices, however, being of opinion, first, that under the 12th section of the Act any person may purchase an article of food and submit it for analysis, and also that an officer, inspector, or constable is, under the 13th section of the Act, entitled to procure a sample either himself or by deputy; secondly, that the 14th section of the Act had been sufficiently complied with by the purchaser stating that he had purchased the gin for the purpose of analysis, and offering to divide it, although he did not mention the public analyst, or offer to divide the gin into three parts; thirdly, that it was immaterial whether the 14th and 15th sections of the Act were strictly complied with or not, compliance with these sections not being a condition precedent to a prosecution under the 20th section, which only requires that the analyst, having analysed the article, should have given his certificate of the result, from which it appears that an offence has been committed; and fourthly, that it was not requisite that the article purchased should either be handed to the analyst by the purchaser himself, or forwarded to him by post under the 16th section of the Act, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, are: First, whether, in proceedings for a penalty under the 6th section of the Act, the person purchasing the article must be an officer, inspector, or constable, mentioned in the 13th section, or whether he may be one acting under the direction of such officer, inspector, or constable, or any other person. Secondly, whether, on the facts herein stated, the 14th section was sufficiently complied with. Thirdly, whether, on the facts herein stated, the 15th section was sufficiently complied with. Fourthly, whether it is requisite, looking at the 12th section, that, before a person can be convicted, both the 14th and 15th sections, or one of them, must have been strictly complied with. Fifthly, whether it is requisite that the article purchased should either be taken by the purchaser personally to the public analyst or forwarded by post to such analyst under the 16th section of the Act.

The following are the sections of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63) referred to and discussed in the argument as material:

Ex. Div.]

BARNES (app.) v. CHIFF (resp.)

[Ex. Div.]

Sect. 6 imposes a penalty not exceeding 20l. on any person who "shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser."

Sect. 12 enacts that any purchaser of an article of food, &c., in any place being a district, &c., where there is any analyst appointed under the Act, or any Act thereby repealed, shall be entitled, on payment to such analyst of a sum not exceeding ten shillings and sixpence, or, if there be no such analyst then acting for such place, to the analyst of another place of such sum as may be agreed upon between such person and the analyst, to have such article analysed by such analyst, and to receive from him a certificate of the result of his analysis.

Sect. 13:

Any medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or inspector of weights and measures, or any inspector of a market, or any police constable under the direction and at the cost of the local authority appointing such officer, inspector, or constable, or charged with the execution of this Act, may procure any sample of food or drugs, and, if he suspects the same to have been sold to him contrary to any provision of this Act, shall submit the same to be analysed by the analyst of the district or place for which he acts, or, if there be no such analyst then acting for such place, to the analyst of another place: and such analyst shall, upon receiving payment as is provided in the last section, with all convenient speed analyse the same, and give a certificate to such officer, wherein he shall specify the result of the analysis.

Sect. 14:

The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed, or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent. He shall afterwards retain one of the said parts for future comparison, and submit the third part, if he deems it right to have the article analysed, to the analyst.

Sect. 15:

If the seller or his agent do not accept the offer of the purchaser to divide the article purchased in his presence, the analyst receiving the article for analysis shall divide the same into two parts, and shall seal or fasten up one of those parts, and shall cause it to be delivered, either upon receipt of the article or when he supplies his certificate, to the purchaser, who shall retain the same for production in case proceedings shall afterwards be taken in the matter.

Sect. 16 provides that, if the analyst do not reside within two miles of the residence of the person requiring the analysis, the article may be forwarded to the analyst through the post-office as a registered letter, &c.

Sect. 18 prescribes the form of the certificate.

Sect. 20:

When the analyst, having analysed any article, shall have given his certificate, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for recovering the penalty, &c., before justices, &c., in a summary manner.

Sect. 21:

At the hearing of the information the certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant requires the analyst to be called as a witness, and the parts of the articles retained by the purchaser shall be produced; and the defendant may, if he think fit, tender himself and his wife as witnesses on his own behalf.

Bosanquet, for the appellant, did not intend to rely on the first and last objections with respect to the person who, under the 13th section, was entitled to procure a sample, and as to the mode of transmitting the article to the analyst under the 16th section, and would therefore not trouble the court with any arguments upon those points. The remaining objections resolved themselves into two, namely, that sects. 14 and 15 of the Act were not complied with in the present case, and so, therefore, such compliance, being a condition precedent to taking proceedings for an offence against sect. 6, this conviction cannot stand. The offence charged against the appellant here is created by sect. 6 [reads it]. Sect. 13 provides that certain public officers, named, may procure samples and submit them to analysis, and I am not going to contend that nobody else may do so as well. By sects. 14 and 15 the mode in which the sample when purchased is to be dealt with by the purchaser and the analyst respectively is prescribed. Then comes sect. 20, providing for proceedings being taken against offenders, which says, "when the analyst, having analysed any article, shall have given his certificate, &c., proceedings may be taken against the seller." Clearly, therefore, the analysis and certificate are by that section made conditions precedent to the taking proceedings; and sect. 14, which enacts that the purchaser, buying an article which he intends to be analysed, shall, after completion of the purchase, "forthwith notify to the seller his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts," &c., makes these formalities conditions precedent to procuring an analysis. Neither of them however were observed by the purchaser in the present instance. It may be, if the facts be as stated, that an offence under sect. 6 was committed, but the necessary conditions precedent to proceedings were not performed. [He was here stopped by the Court, who called on]

Jelf, for the respondent, contra, in support of the conviction.—This, though in one sense a penal statute, is in its general scope and intention a remedial one, and should therefore receive a construction favourable to the object and intention which the Legislature had in view in passing it, namely, the protection of the public from having noxious, adulterated, and diluted goods sold to them in lieu of genuine articles. If therefore the spirit of the Act has been fairly and reasonably complied with on the part of the appellant in the present case, the court will be slow to upset the conviction upon a merely technical objection. The offence created by sect. 6 is selling "to the prejudice of the purchaser." The next section of importance is sect. 12 [reads it]. That steers clear of the objection raised on the other side. Any person in the community may go into a shop, and if he gets an article which he thinks is adulterated, may go to the analyst and obtain his certificate. The 20th section, on which the appellant relies so strongly, must be read together with sect. 12. Any person therefore, so prejudiced in his purchase, may go before the justices and make a complaint, and institute proceedings against the seller under sect. 20 without reference to sect. 14. Then comes the question of proof, and by sect. 21 the production of the certificate is made sufficient evidence unless the defendant requires the analyst to be examined.

Ex. Div.]

ROOK (app.) v. HOPLY (resp.)

[Ex. Div.]

In like manner as any ordinary purchaser may have an article analysed, so the police officer may procure a sample, and if he be "prejudiced" or damaged by receiving an adulterated article, he may go, as was done here, to the public analyst. The seller is in no wise damaged or prejudiced so long as he is warned that the article is to be analysed, nor can the information that it is to be done in one way or another at all affect or alter his mind in selling the article complained of. If sects. 14 and 15 are held to be, as is contended by the appellant but as the respondent contends erroneously, conditions precedent, then it is submitted that in spirit they have been complied with. The formalities thereby prescribed are all for purposes of proof, and are not conditions precedent to the right of any purchaser to take proceedings.

KELLY, C.B.—I do not think that there is a particle of doubt that our judgment in this case should be in favour of the appellant. There are a great variety of provisions in this Act of Parliament for the purpose of securing, as far as possible, the genuine and unadulterated character of articles of food that are sold to their customers by the various tradesmen and shopkeepers throughout the country; but, at the same time, there are introduced into the Act also certain prescribed formalities and conditions in favour of the tradesmen, the full and due performance and observance of which the latter are entitled to claim as a safeguard and protection to themselves against hasty, inconsiderate, and unfounded charges. Doubtless some of the sections of the Act, taken by themselves, would seem to show that an offence against the Act has been committed in the present instance; but, looking at the Act as a whole, and taking section after section, when we come to the 14th section we find it enacted, in the clearest and most distinct and direct terms, that "the person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller, or his agent selling the article, his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst." We are asked by the learned counsel for the respondent, in effect, to cut the words "by the public analyst" out of the section altogether; but that we cannot do, the terms of the section being imperative. It is, in my opinion, most important for the interests and safety of the tradesman that the directions in this section should be strictly complied with, and that he should be told that it is "the public analyst" to whom the purchaser intends to submit the purchased article. It is he, "the public analyst," who is appointed by the Act to analyse suspected articles, and it is he whose certificate is made a condition precedent to a prosecution, and the production of which is to be taken as prima facie proof of the offence at the hearing of the information "before the justices." It may possibly be that the tradesman may have already had the article analysed by some analytical chemist of his own choice; and, unless he is informed that the article is going to be submitted for analysis to "the public analyst," he may be well satisfied with the analysis he has had made for himself, and may rest upon it; whereas, if he were aware that the "public analyst" was going to be consulted, he might have a doubt as to the accuracy of his own analysis, and be anxious to have another and more duly authorised one made. In my judgment, both in common sense and justice, and on the express words of the Act of Parliament, the appellant is entitled to succeed on this objection to the conviction; and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the other objections relied on by him.

ROOK (app.) v. HOPLY (resp.)(a)

APPEAL FROM INFERIOR COURT.

Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 25—Adulteration—Nature, substance, and quality of article—Written warranty.

An invoice, containing a description of the article sold, furnished by A. to B., does not constitute a "written warranty," within the terms of the 25th section of the Food and Drugs Act 1875, so as to discharge B., who sells to C., from a prosecution under sect. 6 of the said Act.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the stipendiary magistrate of Manchester, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 20th Sept. 1876, an information was preferred by Rook (the appellant) against Hopley (the respondent), for "that he, the said John Hopley, on the 2nd July 1876, did sell, to the prejudice of Andrew Thomas Rook, the purchaser thereof, a certain article of food, to wit, lard, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by him contrary to the form," &c.

The magistrate dismissed the summons on grounds which will appear from the following paragraphs of the stated case:

Par. 5. The 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6, enacts that:

No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds: provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases; that is to say:

(1) Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof.

(4) Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation.

Par. 6. By sect. 25 it is enacted that:

If the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove to the satisfaction of the justices or court that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, he shall be discharged from the prosecution, but shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor, unless he shall have given due notice to him that he will rely on the above defence.

Par. 7 sets out the circumstances of purchase by appellant from respondent.

Par. 8. Sets out copy certificate of the public analyst, who stated that he was of opinion that the article submitted to him was a sample of adulterated lard, and that it contained 15 per cent. of water.

Par. 8A. The magistrate found as a fact that the lard was adulterated.

Par. 10. The respondent proved that he had purchased on the 20th June 1876, of William Walker, four tins of lard, and at the time of the purchase received a document of which the following is a copy :

Bought by Mr. J. Hopley of Wm. Walker,
4 tins lard, No. 1, 28lb. each, 1wt. (K) at 55s.
2l. 15s. 0d.

Par. 11. The respondent proved the identity of the substance sold to the appellant with that purchased of Walker, and in the same condition.

Par. 12. The respondent bought the article as lard.

Par. 12A. There was no explanation given of "No. 1" in the invoice. No suggestion was made by the appellant or by the respondent that the word and figure "No. 1," or anything else in the said document imported any addition or qualification to the word "lard."

Par. 13. It was contended on the part of the respondent that the said document was a sufficient written warranty within the 25th section of the Act, and that he ought accordingly to be discharged from the prosecution.

Par. 14. It was contended on the part of the appellant that the said document did not constitute a sufficient warranty.

Par. 15, 16. The magistrate, upon the facts proved, held in favour of the respondent.

J. Brown, Q.C. (Sutton with him) for the appellant. — Four conditions are necessary to exonerate the intermediate vendor, and though three of such conditions may have been complied with in this case, the essential condition of a written warranty, to satisfy the terms of the statute, is here wanting. Any seller who was possessed of such an invoice would thus escape scot free. The Legislature intended that a seller under such circumstances should be held liable, unless he was provided with an express written warranty; and this does not meet the requirements of the Act:

Benjamin on Sale, p. 442;
Josling v. Kingsford, 13 C. B., N. S. 447; 32 L. J.
C. P. 94;
2 Smith's Lead. Cas. p. 3.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Ambrose, Q.C., for the respondent, argued that the document was not an invoice, but a bought-note, and contained a written warranty. It was a contract to supply the article demanded; and at all events a guarantee to that effect was implied. It is not necessary to use the word "warrant," whether such a contract is verbal or in writing. [KELLY, C.B.—That is conceded. POLLOCK, B.—The intermediate purchaser is exempt, if he can prove that he bought with a "written warranty." Is this bought-note, if such it can be called, a "written warranty?"] A sale by description is a sale by warranty. We bought it as "lard." The analyst did not find in accordance with the words of the statute; he calls the article "lard," and the magistrate finds as a fact that it is "adulterated lard," but to sell this latter is no offence within the statute. But even if you convict me on this head, I come within the 25th section. The document is not an invoice, which refers to a past sale, and records a debt, but is a contract: (Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560.) The 25th section was enacted for the protection of honest traders. It cannot have been intended that a separate written warranty should be demanded of the wholesale dealer to exempt the seller. Between the retail dealer and the wholesale dealer, as evidenced by this bought-note, there is undoubtedly a contract of warranty. He cited

Brown, Q.C. was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—The appellant is entitled to our judgment. I arrive at this conclusion with much reluctance, inasmuch as on the facts proved it is a very hard case, but with that I have nothing to do. The question is simple, and really one that appeals to our common sense; the respondent purchased the article in question as lard, and sold it as such; it was found as a fact that it was lard adulterated with 15 per cent. of water. The question then follows, whether in the face of this fact, the case comes within the provisions of the statute, the article not being that which he sold it for. Is "adulterated lard" "lard," i.e. of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, in the eye of the law? As to whether the document referred to, be it an invoice or a bought-note, imports a warranty, I do not give any decision; it is not a warranty within the meaning of the Act under consideration. The article demanded and paid for was lard; lard, in one sense, mixed lard, was furnished. Regarding the certificate of the analyst, the finding of the magistrate, and the terms of the preamble of the Act, I am of opinion that this case comes within it. It was the intention of the Legislature to prevent the sale of adulterated articles of food, and this article is expressly found to be adulterated. The respondent acted bona fide and with an honest intention, but I think, under the circumstances, the appellant is entitled to our judgment.

POLLOCK, B.—I agree with my Lord that the appellant is entitled to our judgment. I base my decision on the construction of the Act of Parliament on which the jurisdiction of the magistrate depended. The provisions of the Act introduced for the first time new and most stringent provisions for the protection of honest traders. Let us consider the requirements of sect. 6, under which it is alleged the respondent becomes liable to a penalty. There are certain specified exceptions, within which the defendant must bring himself, so as to exempt him from the penalty incurred under this section, but with this question we have nothing to do here. The article sold must be to the prejudice of the purchaser; that it was so here, though not set out in the case, clearly appears from the certificate of the analyst. Was the article of the nature, substance, and quality demand by the purchaser? Now the article demanded was not lard mixed with water, and that this article was so mixed is proved by the analyst's certificate, which states that the article was adulterated with 15 per cent. of water. The article, therefore, was not of the quality demanded, and was sold to the prejudice of the purchaser. Mr. Ambrose has argued that the respondent bought the lard, not only as being the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded, but also with a written warranty to that effect. To assert that this document was a written warranty within the meaning of sect. 25, is an insult to a man's understanding. The Legislature intended that there should accompany the sale an express written warranty; and a mere description of the article is insufficient.

REG. v. YOUNG. (a)

Rape—Married woman asleep—Belief that the prisoner was her husband.

While a married woman was asleep in bed with her husband, the prisoner got into the bed and proceeded to have connection with her, she being then asleep. When she awoke, she at first thought he was her husband, but on hearing him speak, and seeing her husband at her side, she flung the prisoner off, and called out to her husband, when the prisoner ran away.

Held the prisoner was guilty of the crime of rape.

Case stated for the opinion of this Court by Huddleston, B.

The prisoner, John Young, was indicted for a rape upon Johanna Hurley.

The evidence proved that the prosecutrix, a married woman, being partially under the influence of drink on the 2nd Feb. 1878, went to bed in her lodgings in the Seven Dials with her youngest child about nine o'clock; her husband with another child came home about midnight.

About four o'clock in the morning, when all four were asleep, the prisoner entered the room, the door not having been locked, got into bed, in which were the prosecutrix, her husband, and the two children, and proceeded to have connection with the prosecutrix, "she being at the time asleep. When she awoke" (b) at first the prosecutrix thought that it was her husband, but on hearing the prisoner speak she looked round, and seeing her husband by her side, she immediately flung the prisoner off her, and called out to her husband.

The prisoner ran away, but before he could make his escape he was secured by a police-constable. None of the parties had ever seen the prisoner before.

In answer to questions put by me the jury found that the prosecutrix did not consent before, after, or at the time of the prisoner's having connection with her, that it was against her will, and that the conduct of the prosecutrix did not lead the prisoner to the belief that she did consent.

I put the last question to the jury in consequence of what fell from Denman, J., in Reg. v. Flattery (2 Q. B. Div. 410-414, 13 Cox C. C. 388).

Upon these findings I directed a verdict of guilty, but reserved the question as to whether the conviction was right, the Court of Criminal Appeal in Reg. v. Flattery having expressed a desire that the case of Reg. v. Barrow (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 156; 28 L. J. M. C. 20, 11 Cox C. C. 191), should be reconsidered.

See Reg. v. Clarke, Den. C. C. 397; 24 L. J. Rep. M. C. 25, 6 Cox C. C. 412;

Reg. v. Jackson, E. & R. 487.

J. W. HUDDLESTON.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

Lilley for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. In Reg. v. Camplin (1 Den. C. C. 89; 1 Cox C. C. 220), where the prisoner made the prosecutrix, a girl aged thirteen, drunk, and whilst she was insensible violated her person, it was held that a rape was committed without the consent and against the will of the prosecutrix, although the jury found that the liquor was given to her for the purpose of exciting her and then having sexual intercourse with her, and not for the purpose of rendering her insensible. [CLEASBY, B.—In that case the girl was insensible, and incapable of consenting. This case, as stated, says, "The prosecutrix at first thought it was her husband," and leads to an impression that she at first consented. In Reg. v. Clarke (6 Cox, 412 C. C.; 24 L. J. 25 M. C.) it was held that if a married woman consents, under the belief that the man is her husband, the man cannot be convicted of rape.] [MELLOR, J.—The jury found that the prosecutrix did not consent before, after, or at the time of the prisoner's having connection with her, that it was against her will, and that the conduct of the prosecutrix did not lead the prisoner to the belief that she did consent. LUSH, J.—I will go and speak to Baron Huddleston as to this (a).] In Reg. v. Mayers (12 Cox C. C. 311) Lush, J., held that if a man has or attempts to have connection with a woman while she is asleep, it is no defence that she did not resist.

On the return of Lush, J.,

Lord COLERIDGE, C. J., said:—We are all of opinion that the addition made by the learned Baron to the statement of this case puts an end to any doubt as to the case, under the circumstances, being clearly one of rape.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

(b) The words between the inverted commas were added by Huddleston, B., on being consulted by the court during the argument, to clear up an ambiguity that had been suggested on the case as previously stated.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Thursday, Feb. 28, 1878.

(Before JAMES, BAGGALLAY, and THESIGER, L.JJ.)

Ex parte ARROWSMITH; Re LEVESON. (a)Ecclesiastical livings—Mortgage of pew rents—
13 Eliz. c. 20.

A mortgage by a vicar of the pew rents of a district church, paid to the churchwardens upon trust to pay thereout the expenses of the church, and hand over the surplus to the vicar:

Held, to be void as a charging of a benefice within the meaning of the 13 Eliz. c. 20.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Mr Registrar Spring-Rice, sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The Rev. C. A. Leveson was the vicar of the district church of St. George, Campden Hill, which was established for parts of two parishes by an Order in Council of the 18th May 1865, under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 38, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, and other Church Building Acts.

The site of the church had originally been conveyed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whose interest was, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 13, vested in Mr. Leveson, on his presentation by the patron. The freehold was afterwards vested in trustees for the benefit of Mrs. Leveson.

The pew rents, the scale of which was fixed by Act of Parliament, were paid to trustees upon trust to pay thereout the expenses of the church, and to hand over the surplus to the vicar.

On the 19th Oct. 1876 Mr. Leveson assigned the pew rents of the chapel to trustees on behalf of E. M. Arrowsmith, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of a loan of 4800*l.* made to him by the latter.

On the 25th Oct. 1876 Arrowsmith entered up judgment against Mr. Leveson for the 4800*l.*

On the 8th Oct. 1877 Mr. Leveson filed a petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement. Resolutions were duly passed and confirmed in favour of a liquidation, and appointing a trustee.

On the 15th Nov. 1877 the trustee in the liquidation obtained from the Bishop of London, under the 83rd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, a writ of sequestration of "all and singular the fruits, tithes, or other profits, rights and emoluments whatsoever to the said vicarage or benefice of St. George's Campden Hill, and to the aforesaid C. H. Leveson, the vicar or incumbent thereof, being or in anywise appertaining," for the benefit of him, the trustee.

On the 14th Jan. Mr Registrar Spring-Rice, sitting as Chief Judge, decided that the mortgage of the pew rents was void as against the trustee in the liquidation, and granted an injunction restraining Arrowsmith and the trustees of the mortgage deed from proceeding under the judgment or commencing or prosecuting any proceedings against the trustee in the liquidation or the sequestration.

From this decision Arrowsmith and his trustees appealed.

The question turned upon the construction of the 13 Eliz. c. 20, which is entitled "An Act touching leases of benefices and other ecclesiastical livings with cure," and the 1st section of which, in order that the livings appointed for ecclesiastical ministers may not by corrupt and indirect dealings be transferred to other uses, enacts (inter alia) that no lease after the 15th May then next to be made of any benefice or ecclesiastical promotion with cure shall endure any longer than while the lessor shall be ordinarily resident and serving the cure of such benefice without absence above fourscore days in any one year, &c., and "that all chargings of such benefices with cure hereafter with any pension, or with any profit out of the same to be yielded or taken, hereafter to be made, other than rents to be reserved upon leases hereafter to be made according to the meaning of this Act, shall be utterly void."

This Act has been at various times partly repealed, and the repealing statutes have been subsequently also partly repealed; but the provision with regard to "chargings of benefices" remains law.

Dr. Stephens, Q.C. Dr. Tristram (with them E. O. Willis) for the appellants.—The Act of 13 Eliz. c. 20, was one of a number of statutes passed to prohibit a then very common evil, that of the alienation of ecclesiastical property by bishops, beneficed clergy, &c. The 1 Eliz. c. 10, s. 5, the 13 Eliz. c. 10, the Act under which this case is said to come, and the 14 Eliz. c. 11, were all passed for that purpose. This is a prohibitory statute; and, as Lord Cranworth said in Philpott v. President and Governors of St. George's Hospital (6 H. of L. Cas. 349), "prohibitory statutes prevent you from doing something which formerly it was lawful for you to do. And whenever you can find anything done that is substantially that which is prohibited, I think it is perfectly open to the court to say that that is void, not because it comes within the spirit of the statute, or tends to effect the object which the statute meant to prohibit, but because by reason of the true construction of the statute it is the thing, or one of the things actually prohibited." And in the same case Lord Brougham (at p. 363) says: "Because the Legislature has confined itself to one specific mode of accomplishing its purpose, of carrying into effect the intention with which it made the enactment, we are therefore to add enactments which the Legislature never made, provisions beyond what the Legislature has made, for the purpose of completing that which it left incomplete, for the purpose of supplying what it left defective. I am not at all prepared to adopt any such general principle of construction." Yet that is the principle which the registrar has applied to the construction of this statute of the 13 Eliz. c. 20. We do not dispute that a charge of, or even an agreement to charge, a living is void under the Act, for that was held in Shaw v. Pritchard (10 B. and C. 241). But how can this old Act be held to have contemplated pew rents, which were unknown to the law till the 58 Geo. 3, c. 45? How can an Act passed in 1571 apply to what was unknown till 1818? There is no personal right to a pew, except in certain special cases of prescriptive right:

The vicar has no such interest in the pew rents as can bring them within the Act. He has no property in the pews, and cannot sue for arrears of pew rents. Then this is a penal statute, and on that account it should be construed strictly. It is true that this statute does not impose any penalty upon the granting of a charge; but that is done by the 18 Eliz. c. 11, s. 7. Pew rents are not part of a benefice; moreover, this is not a benefice at all, but an endowed perpetual curacy. The 13 Eliz. c. 20, takes away a common law right, and it should not be construed in such a way as to extend its operation. They also cited

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Robson, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—We need not trouble you, Dr. Deane. I have no doubt upon this case at all. The words of the Act of Parliament are too plain to admit of any controversy. The mischief of the Act was “that the livings appointed for ecclesiastical ministers may not by corrupt and indirect dealings be transferred to other uses.” In order to prevent that it was enacted that all chargings of benefices or ecclesiastical promotion, with cure, or any part thereof hereafter with any pension or with any profit out of the same to be yielded or taken hereafter to be made other than rents to be received upon leases hereafter to be made according to the meaning of this Act, shall be utterly void. Now this is, in my opinion, what we may call a consolidated chapel rent; it is a living appointed for ecclesiastical ministers. By reason of the increase of population a new church has been created, and a new endowment of that church has been provided for by means of the letting of pews, which letting of pews is put under public officers by the Act of Parliament to the intent that such persons shall receive the rents and profits from them, and, after paying the necessary charges incident to the collection of the same to give the surplus to the vicar, that is, to the ecclesiastical minister to whom that living is appointed. Therefore it appears to me to be quite clear that this is a case within the statute. It is said that this property is of a different kind to that which was contemplated by the statute. Certainly, beyond all question it is a living adapted to the ecclesiastical minister. The word “living” there is the beneficial interest given to the minister; it is a beneficial interest given to a man for his maintenance. If that be so, it is said that he has not the legal estate because the legal right to receive the pew rents is in the churchwardens, and that all he had got was a beneficial interest arising from the surplus. That beneficial interest was as much an interest in law as any interest known to the courts of equity formerly, and now to all the courts of this country as an interest in a legal estate. It was an equitable interest of exactly the same character as if it had been rents received from glebe lands, from tithes or any other property which might be more commonly known at the time the statute was passed.

Then, it is said that it is deriving in some degree a profit from the personal exertions of the gentleman, and therefore is not within the statute. It may be that the personal exertions of the gentleman are the means by which the thing is rendered valuable. Real estate is rendered more valuable in this country because something is annexed to it, as, for instance, a public-house is more valuable by reason of a licence being attached to it because more profit would arise from it. In this particular case I cannot see any reason for saying that the right given by the churchwardens to certain persons to use certain seats at certain times for the purpose of hearing a particular individual is not a right to have a certain use and occupation of a certain portion of the pews. Then the sums received from those seats which are called rents are sums arising as profits out of that freehold estate by the use to which it is so put. I am of opinion that this case is not only within the plain mischief, but within the plain words, of the Act of Parliament, and that therefore the decision of the court below must be affirmed.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary to consider the various Acts of Parliament subsequent to that of the 13 Eliz., by which the statute was repealed, set up again, and again repealed, except to mention that there was a further repeal by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1874, which repealed, amongst others, the first section of the statute 2 Vict. c. 106. The practical result of all these repeals is that the last portion of the first section of the statute 13 Eliz., namely, that which prohibits charging of benefices, remains in full force, though the earlier part has been repealed. What is really the effect of that provision in the first section of the 13 Eliz.? It prohibits “all chargings of such benefices.” Now, that must clearly be the charging of such benefices as have been before mentioned; and there you have the interpretation put upon the word “benefices”; they are “benefices, or ecclesiastical promotion with cure.” Then you have prohibited “all chargings of benefices with any pension, or with any profit out of the same.” It may be quite true that pew rents were unknown before the time to which Dr. Stephens has referred. It is true that under the Act of Parliament vicarages, or whatever they are called, are not referred to; but I have no doubt that in this case the pew rents of this particular church have become a portion of the benefice or ecclesiastical promotion within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth, and that therefore this is a charge upon that contemplated by the Act of Parliament.

THESIGER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that pew rents do not come within the statute of Elizabeth, because there is no permanent or durable interest in them, and they have been likened in argument to the moneys received by an officer on half-pay. This argument is founded, as it appears to me, upon a confusion between the rents themselves and the thing out of which those rents are derived. The rents, like any other rents, may be greater or less, or may cease altogether, and are dependent, no doubt, in some measure upon the exertions of a particular clergyman. But at the same time the power of obtaining them is derived from the benefice, which in itself is permanent and durable. That being so, when the pew rents in fact exist, they are a profit derived from that benefice, and come within the meaning of the statute, where the words are "any profits out of" such benefice.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

CHILTON v. CORPORATION OF LONDON. (a)

Profit à prendre—Right of lopwood—Crown grant to inhabitants of a parish—Action by one inhabitant—Motions on admissions in pleadings—Rules of Court 1875, Order XL, r. 11.

An action to enforce rights granted by the Crown to the inhabitants of a parish, whereby such inhabitants were created a corporation, is not maintainable by an individual inhabitant, but only by the inhabitants as a corporation.

Willingale v. Maitland (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 103) discussed.

THIS was a motion for judgment on admissions in the pleadings under Order XL, r. 11.

The material paragraphs in the statement of claim were as follows :

Par. 2. The plaintiff is the lessee for a term of ninety-nine years, commencing in the year 1868, of a certain hotel called the Robin Hood Hotel, in which the plaintiff has for some years past resided, and now resides, with a cottage and certain lands held therewith, situate in the parish of Loughton, in the county of Essex, and is also the lessee for a term of ninety-nine years, commencing in the year 1868, of another cottage and lands held therewith, adjoining the said hotel and situate in the same parish. The said hereditaments comprised in the said leases respectively are situate within the ambit of the manor of Loughton, and within the precinct of Epping Forest, and formed part of the waste of the said forest, and were inclosed from the said waste by the lord of the said manor, with the consent of the homage at the manorial court, at some time since the 21st Aug. 1857, and the said hotel, cottages, and other buildings upon the lands so inclosed were erected at some time before the 21st Aug. 1871. At the time when the said inclosure was made, such inclosures were generally believed to be lawful; but such belief was mistaken, and the hereditaments so inclosed still remain in law subject to the rights of common formerly exercised thereon.

Par. 4. There is vested in the inhabitants of the said parish of Loughton, within the ambit of the said manor of Loughton (of whom the plaintiff is one) the right from the hour of twelve o'clock at night on the 11th Nov. in every year until the same hour on the 23rd April in the succeeding year to cut or lop, under the name of lopwood, the boughs and branches of the trees growing upon the waste lands of the said forest within the ambit of the said manor, "except upon certain specified lands, "in such a way as not to destroy or unnecessarily injure the said trees, for the proper use and consumption of such inhabitants as fuel within the said manor and parish of Loughton (which said right is hereinafter called "the right of lopwood")."

The statement of claim then alleged that the defendant had recently purchased about 3000 acres of the forest waste, situate within the limits of, amongst other manors, the manor of Loughton, to hold the same as open spaces for ever, subject to such rights of common and rights of lopwood, cutting and carrying away wood, as the said lands were subject to at the time of the purchase; and that in the course of making a pond upon part of the forest waste in the parish of Loughton so purchased by them, the defendants by their workmen and agents had lately cut down and carried away all the trees (upwards of forty in number) growing upon a part of the said waste, about two acres in extent, where the plaintiff and the other inhabitants of the said parish of Loughton were entitled to use their said right of lopwood, and had thereby disturbed and materially injured the said right of lopwood. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, agents, and workmen "from digging up, cutting down, destroying, or injuring any of the trees growing on the waste of the said forest lying within the ambit of the said manor of Loughton, so as to interfere with the said right of lopwood to which the plaintiff is entitled as afresaid."

The defendants, by their statement of defence, admitted the allegations in the second paragraph of the statement of claim, except that they did not know the precise extent of the plaintiff's interest in the premises therein mentioned; and they also admitted the statements in the fourth paragraph of the statement of claim, "but with the qualification that the right of lopwood therein mentioned is limited to the cutting of such of the boughs and branches of the trees subject to the said right as are above the height of seven feet from the ground; and that certain trees, locally called 'spears,' growing upon the waste lands of the said forest within the ambit of the said manor, are not subject to the said right of lopping; and, except that the corporation do not admit that the said John Chilton, as the occupier of a house built upon land which forms part of the waste of the said forest, or, otherwise, is an inhabitant of the said parish entitled to exercise the said right." They also admitted making the pond, and that in doing so a few trees, (but, as they believed, much less than forty in number) were cut down and carried away, and that such trees were growing upon a part of the waste where the inhabitants of the said parish of Loughton were entitled to use their said right of lopwood; but they denied "that the said John Chilton is an inhabitant entitled to use the said right; and they deny that they have thereby disturbed and materially, or in fact, injured the right of lopwood belonging to the said inhabitants; and they do not admit that the said trees were trees which were subject to the said right of lopwood."

Elton, for the plaintiff, asked for an injunction in the terms of the claim upon the admissions in the statement of defence, and referred to Willingale v. Maitland, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 103.

Chitty, Q.C. and W. R. Fisher, for the defendants, were heard only upon the question of costs.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think you must have your costs, Mr. Chitty. A plaintiff who comes on admissions made by a defendant must have a clear case; but I can see all sorts of difficulties about the plaintiff's case, some of them so serious that I think he had better consider whether he should proceed any further with it. In the first place, the right alleged is one which I do not understand has any existence in law. It is thus stated in the fourth paragraph of the statement of claim: "There is vested in the inhabitants of the said parish of

(a) Reported by G. WELBY KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Loughton, within the ambit of the said manor of Loughton (of which the plaintiff is one), the right from the hour of twelve o'clock at night on the 11th Nov. in every year until the same hour on the 23rd April in the succeeding year, to cut or lop, under the name of 'lopwood,' the boughs and branches of the trees growing upon the waste lands of the said forest within the ambit of the said manor, 'except upon certain parts which are named,' in such a way as not to destroy or unnecessarily injure the said trees for the proper use and consumption of such inhabitants as fuel within the said manor and parish of Loughton (which said right is hereinafter called the 'right of lopwood')."

It has been admitted in argument, and could not be denied, that, except in a certain case of Willingale v. Maitland (sup.), to which I am about to call further attention, no such right as this is known to the law. It cannot exist by custom, and it cannot exist by grant, or so-called prescription, except by Crown grant; and therefore it is a right which cannot be supported; and if the right by itself is one which cannot be supported in law, it cannot entitle the plaintiff to judgment merely because the defendant does not deny the right. The court is bound to give judgment according to law. But then it is said that, although the right is not known to the common law, it may be created by Act of Parliament; and the judge is bound to assume, when not disputed by the pleadings, that it has been so created. The answer to that is, simply, that the judge is theoretically bound to take judicial notice of all Acts of Parliament; he is bound theoretically to know the contents of them, and to be aware that there is no such Act of Parliament. I say "theoretically," for practically the judge requires attention to be called to the particular statute and to those clauses and sections of it that bear upon the matter in hand. But he is bound to take judicial notice of all Acts of Parliament; and even on demurrer, which is the strictest form of pleading, any Act of Parliament can be taken notice of by the judge without its being pleaded on either side. I am not at liberty therefore to assume or presume that there is a public Act of Parliament conferring the right. It was then said that if there is not a public Act of Parliament, the right can exist by Crown grant, and for that proposition the case of Willingale v. Maitland was cited. Now as far as I am aware (and probably no one has had more to do with these cases, or has looked into more authorities upon them than myself) there is no other case to be found at all like this; and the learned counsel who has argued the case on the part of the plaintiff, and who is not only the author of a valuable work upon the subject, but has had considerable experience in these cases, and probably knows as much about the authorities as any man living, has not been able to find any authority or case bearing upon the subject, except this case of Willingale v. Maitland. Therefore I think I may, without presumption, say that no such case exists. Being therefore compelled to see what Willingale v. Maitland decided—without attempting for a moment to say that I can or that I should wish to overrule it, it being decided by my predecessor in 1866—I must see what it did decide. Now what it decided was this, that a Crown grant to the inhabitants of a parish to take certain profits à prendre out of a royal manor was valid, and that the effect of the grant was to incorporate the inhabitants for the purpose of enabling them to exercise the rights. That is all Willingale v. Maitland decided. In the first place the case was decided on demurrer, and the bill alleged this: "That Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, being then lady of the manor of Loughton, by her royal charter granted to the inhabitants of the parish, that the labouring or poor people inhabiting the said parish, and having families, might at all times, commencing from the hour of twelve at night on the 11th day of November in every year, cut or lop the boughs and branches above the height of seven feet from the ground on the trees growing upon the waste lands of the said manor and parish (except on certain specified portions thereof)". Now I find this stated: "That the inhabitants had, since the charter, continually exercised the right so granted." That is all fiction, because if it had been a Crown grant, it would have been found among the patent or close rolls, which are perfect from the time of Queen Elizabeth. However, it was not to be found; so, in order to get rid of the difficulty, the pleader chose to invent this fiction: "The said charter, which was formerly among the records of a forest court called the Verderer's Court, has, together with such records, been long since lost or improperly disposed of; but there were divers documents and entries in the court rolls and other records relating to the manor, referring to or containing evidence of the charter, and the right thereby granted." That being so, the Judge dealing with the demurrer was bound to take those statements as true; though, of course, he and everybody else in court knew that they were fictitious. Therefore he was dealing with a case in which an actual Crown grant by Queen Elizabeth, the owner of the royal manor of Loughton, was pleaded. Then, it being admitted that the right could not exist by custom, or by grant, or prescription in the inhabitants as individuals, the counsel for the plaintiffs argued thus: A grant by the Crown to the inhabitants of a place is valid, because the Crown having the power of creating a corporation, the inhabitants are by the grant incorporated for the purposes of the grant. That was the argument for the plaintiffs. Then there were certain old cases cited, which went very far to support that proposition. Now that argument was adopted by the court. Lord Romilly says: "A passage has been cited from Sheppard's Touchstone to the effect that a grant cannot be made to the inhabitants of a parish as such, for, although, they may be all capable of taking individually as grantees, yet they cannot take under that general designation; but that passage applies solely to grants by private individuals. Several authorities were cited by Mr. Joshua Williams"—he was the leading counsel for the plaintiffs—"to establish the proposition which I apprehend to be indisputable, that a grant by the Crown to a class of persons is good. The distinction between a grant by a private individual and a grant by the Crown is this, that as the Crown has the power to create corporations, so, if it is necessary for the purpose of establishing the validity of a grant, the grantees will be treated as a corporation quoad the grant, which is not the case with a grant by a private individual, because a private individual has no power of creating a corporation. The result therefore is that, according to that decision, and according to some ancient decisions, a grant by the Crown to the inhabitants of a parish for the purpose of taking a profit d prendre from land belonging to the Crown, would be a valid creation of a corporation of the inhabitants of the parish. That being so, does it go any further? I admit that the court in that case did not take the objection that, if the inhabitants of the parish were a corporation, the corporation must sue. The objection does not seem to have been taken, though that is undoubted law. An individual corporator cannot sue a third person for injuring the property of the corporation. It seems that it did not occur to anyone to take that point. In the present case, if the plaintiff takes anything at all, he takes it under the doctrine of Willingale v. Maitland, so that he is a member of a corporation to which certain rights were granted quod corporation. Whether such a corporation should sue under a corporate name, or whether, they not having a corporate name, the action should be by some on behalf of all, as being the corporation, is not for me now to decide. All I can say is that the corporation must sue, and that an individual corporator cannot. Therefore, in that way, I think the present plaintiff cannot get judgment; that is, he cannot bind all the inhabitants of the parish, for it would be deciding the extent of the right in their absence, which I think cannot be done. That appears to dispose of the main point argued on the part of the plaintiff. But I cannot help seeing that there are two other difficulties, and very singular ones—although here I must say there is more temptation to the plaintiff to come into court, for I do not find the points so distinctly raised on the pleadings as I think they might have been. The second objection is this, that, although the plaintiff is an inhabitant of the parish in a sense, he is not an inhabitant of the parish in the sense of being a member of this corporation. What the defendants say in their statement of defence is: "We do not admit that the plaintiff, as the occupier of a house built upon land which forms part of the waste of the forest, or otherwise, is an inhabitant of the said parish entitled to exercise the said right." That means this: the house and land of the plaintiff were on part of the waste of the forest; the land had been inclosed by the lord of the manor, with the consent of the homage, since August 1851, and the buildings had been erected before August 1871. Then the plaintiff says: "At the time when the said inclosure was made, such inclosures were generally believed to be lawful; but such belief was mistaken, and the hereditaments so inclosed still remain in law subject to the rights of common formerly exercised thereon." Now, if that is so, if the house itself is built upon land subject to rights of common, what the defendants mean to allege, although they do not put it as plainly as might be, is this: that, inasmuch as the land upon which the plaintiff's house is erected is land itself subject to the right of common, the house is improperly and illegally erected; and that the inhabitant of a house illegally erected, and erected against the custom, is not an inhabitant within the meaning of the custom. That is perfectly intelligible, and I think raises an objection which appears to me at present a valid objection, although I do not wish finally to dispose of such a point as that. At present it seems to me that a grant to the inhabitants of a parish means the inhabitants of houses within the parish, and must be restricted to houses lawfully erected, and does not apply to houses which are illegally erected, and which may be levelled at any moment as having been erected in defiance of the law which regulates the rights of common; and that consequently the inhabitants of such houses do not get the benefit of the grant. That, at all events, appears to me now to be a valid objection. Then there is a third objection to these pleadings, to which I do not see the answer. The plaintiff alleges a custom as to lopping the trees growing upon the waste lands, but the defendants do not admit that custom in its entirety. They admit the custom except as to certain trees, locally called "spears," as to which they say the custom does not exist. I do not see the definition of "spears" anywhere. Then the plaintiff alleges that the defendants carried away all the trees, upwards of forty in number, growing upon part of the waste, about two acres in extent, thereby injuring his right of lopwood. The defendants say they have cut down and carried away a few trees, but, as they believe, much less than forty in number; and that such trees were growing upon a part of the waste where the inhabitants of the said parish of Loughton are entitled to use their said right of lopwood. But they deny that "the said John Ohilton is an inhabitant entitled to use the said right; and they deny that they have thereby disturbed, and materially or in fact injured, the right of lopwood belonging to the said inhabitants; and they do not admit that the said trees were trees which were subject to the said right of lopwood." Now, of course, if they admitted that the custom was as to all trees, this allegation would have been inconsistent; but, inasmuch as they have only admitted the custom as to trees other than spears, and as they say the trees cut down are not within the custom, it is an implied allegation that those trees are spears, and is therefore quite consistent with their admission of the custom or right, or whatever it may be called, which the plaintiff claims. I should say that upon that ground also it is impossible to give judgment against the defendants upon these pleadings. The motion will therefore be dismissed with costs.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON v. FAULCONER. (a)

Transfer to a school board of a local school, and of an annuity payable to the school so long as it was not materially altered—Elementary Education Act 1870, sect. 23—Right of the school board to the annuity.

By a charity scheme settled by the Court of Chancery, it was directed that a sum of 90l. a year should be paid to the treasurer for the time being of a school association in aid of a certain school for the education of the children of the poor of every religious denomination, and that if at any time the school should not fall substantially within this description, or should become materially altered in discipline, number of children, or other circumstances, the trustees of the charity should appropriate the 90l. a year for educational purposes among other schools of a similar character. The school and the endowment were subsequently transferred to a school board under the 23rd section of the Elementary Education Act 1870. The trustees of the charity refused to pay the 90l. a year to the board, on the ground that the endowment was not one which could be transferred to the school board under the said section, and that the school had, by the transfer, become materially altered in circumstances.

Held, that the board was entitled to the 90l. a year, as the endowment was transferable under the said section, and the school had not become materially altered.

THIS was an action by the London School Board against the trustees of the St. Mary Newington Surrey Copyhold Charity Estates. It was brought to decide the question whether the School Board were entitled to a yearly sum of 90l., which, under the provisions of a charity scheme, had formerly been paid to the managers of a school in Flint Street, Walworth, and which the managers and trustees of the school had, under the Elementary Education Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), sect. 23 (a), transferred to the School Board along with the school and school-house.

The following are the material facts:—In the year 1852 the Court of Chancery approved of a scheme, providing for the appropriation of the increased revenues of certain portions of the St. Mary Newington Surrey Copyhold Charity Estates. This scheme contained (inter alia) the following provisions.

Clause 4:

That the sum of 90l. a year be paid to the treasurer for the time being of the St. Mary Newington School Association, for the education of the children of the poor of every religious denomination, to be appropriated by the committee for the time being of such association, in aid of the charges and expenses attendant upon carrying on of the school in Flint-street, Walworth, or of any other school that may be established in its stead; provided no sum shall be paid to any school which shall become the property of any exclusive denomination or sect, or exclude by reason of its regulations the children of any class or denomination of persons.

Clause 10:

That if the said school shall not at any time hereafter or from time to time fall substantially within the description of school, or within the terms of the grant, or if such school shall become materially altered in discipline, number of children, or other circumstance, then the application of the 90l. a year should in the discretion of the trustees (of the charity) be in the appropriation of such trustees for educational purposes amongst other schools of a similar character in the said parish, subject to the same conditions or provisions as contained in the said 4th clause.

The 90l. a year was, after the approval of the above-mentioned scheme, duly paid to the managers of the Flint Street school. On the 2nd Sept. 1873 the trustees and managers of the Flint Street school agreed with the London School Board to assign to them the school and school-house and the endowment of 90l. a year; and the Board agreed, in consideration of the assignment of the endowment, to give the then schoolmaster a pension during his life, and on his decease to make his wife an allowance. After this agreement the school was carried on by the School Board, and on the 4th June 1875 the assignment was duly made. The school was still undenominational, and apparently the only changes in the condition of the school of any importance were that there was a Government inspector, that girls were admitted, and that the connection of the school with its former governing body was severed. The trustees of the charity, however, refused to pay the 90l. a year to the School Board, and hence the present action was brought.

In their statement of defence the trustees insisted that the school had become materially altered in circumstances by being transferred to the School Board; that the endowment was not one which could be transferred to the Board; and that if the 90l. a year were paid to the School Board, the only effect would be the diminution of the rates, and the poor inhabitants of St. Mary, Newington, for whose benefit the charity estates were originally given, would obtain no advantages from the 90l. a year which they would not otherwise obtain.

It appeared from the evidence that the School Board had not decided how to apply the 90l. a year; but they contemplated keeping it as a special fund to provide scholarships and prizes for the pupils in the school.

Hemming, Q.C. and Bomer for the plaintiffs.—The school has not, under the provisions of the scheme, forfeited this endowment. As required by clause 4, it is still undenominational, and does not exclude the children of any class. Nor is it "materially altered in discipline, number of children, or other circumstance," for those words can only refer to alterations for the worse. The transfer of this endowment will not affect the rates, for the School Board are only bound to supplement the existing means of education; and this endowment, whether paid to the School Board or to the governing body of a school, forms part of those means. The 23rd section of the Education Act contemplates endowments being transferred when the Board take on them the burden of existing schools. The 90l. a year must be paid either to this school or to a similar school within the same parish. The defence that the 90l. a year, if paid to the Board, will not give the poor of the parish any special benefit, cannot be considered now, as it would take us behind the scheme.

Sir H. Jackson, Q.C. and Maidlow for the defendants.—This annuity was not the alienable property of the managers of the Flint Street School. They could not have assigned it to any other school in the same parish, nor can they assign it along with their own school. The 23rd section of the Education Act says that no property which is not vested in the managers of the transferred school, or in a trustee for them or the school, can be transferred to a school board. This endowment was not vested in the managers or in a trustee for them, nor are the funds from which it is derived held simpliciter in trust for the school. They are funds administered by the trustees at their discretion, that discretion being

(a) "An arrangement" (with a school board under this section) "may provide for the transfer or application of any endowment belonging to the school. . . . When an arrangement is made under this section, the managers (of the school) may, whether the legal interest in the endowment is vested in them, or in some person as trustee for them or the school, convey to the school board all such interest in the endowment as is vested in them, or in such trustee. . . . Nothing in this section shall authorise the managers to transfer any property which is not vested in them, or a trustee for them, or held in trust for the school."

limited and guided by the court. The principle which prevents the application of charity funds in relief of the poor rates will apply in the case of education rates. The changes in the school are within the words, "discipline, number of children, or other circumstance." The proposed application of the 90*l.* a year to the payment of a pension or the giving of scholarships and prizes is inconsistent with the scheme, which says it is to be expended "in aid of the charges and expenses of the school."

No reply was called for.

BACON, V.C.—The scheme is the law upon the subject. I cannot go behind the scheme; I cannot doubt that the scheme was right in itself, or hesitate to say that all its provisions must by the law be recognised and carried into effect. The scheme is plainly this: [His Lordship, having read the clauses of the scheme which are set out above, continued:] The trustees' duty is to pay the 90*l.* a year for the maintenance of the Walworth School, or any other school which shall be established in its stead, provided the provisions of the scheme are complied with. There is a certain discretion vested in the trustees. The obligation may not in all cases be upon them to pay that 90*l.* a year; for, if the school shall be materially altered, or if any other circumstances should render it expedient—I am giving the largest construction to those words, "or other circumstance"—then the trustees in their discretion may apply that 90*l.* a year for other similar educational purposes, and for no other purpose, no other purpose being suggested. Then comes the Elementary School Act, the provisions of which were referred to, which are very clear and distinct, and which apply directly to this case. It is found by the managers of the school that it would be expedient that the Walworth School should be transferred to the management of the Government board, the Elementary School Board, and accordingly the requisitions of the 23rd section of the Act are duly and punctually complied with. The conveyance is made, and the managers, as far as they have any legal power to do so, assign and transfer the 90*l.* a year for the purposes of that school. Then the Act of Parliament, the clauses of which have been read, contains this provision: [His Lordship read the clause of the 23rd section of the Act beginning, "When an arrangement is made," and then continued:] No words could be suggested more clearly and explicitly, or more directly covering this particular case before me, for the 90*l.* a year is vested in the trustees in trust for the school, payable by them to the managers of the school, and the managers have power to transfer that interest, that 90*l.* a year which they are bound to receive, to the School Board. The Act of Parliament is literally in every respect complied with. Sir Charles Reed, having been asked some questions in the box yesterday, said that it was the intention of the School Board to keep the 90*l.* as a distinct fund, but (among other suggestions which were made) to apply it in giving prizes or encouragement to the pupils in the school; and Mr. Maidlow has argued thereupon that that is a clear proof, which the court ought to adopt, that it is the intention of the School Board to misapply this fund, to make the school one for middle-class education, where in point of fact it is meant for elementary education. I cannot attend to that argument in the slightest degree. If the 90*l.* a year had been paid, without any School Board Act existing at all, to the managers of the school, who can doubt that it would be within their power and discretion, in carrying on this school, to apply the 90*l.* a year, or such part of it, as they thought fit, to any lawful proper purpose connected with the management of the school, it being always an elementary school; for that fact has been plainly proved, and this school, as in all other respects so also for public purposes of education, is exactly the same as that school which existed before the Elementary Education Act was passed. I cannot find any reason why the plain words of this Act of Parliament should not be carried into effect, why that 90*l.* a year, which is to be paid to the Walworth School for the purposes of education, should not be paid to the persons upon whom the task of conducting that general education is now imposed, instead of the individuals who formed the managing board. There is no reason in the world to doubt that the matter has been carried out in the manner prescribed by the general statute, the policy and expediency of which it is not for anybody to question, and being satisfied, as I am, by the law, and by the force of the Act of Parliament especially, that the managers who have the right to have the 90*l.* a year, are now the School Board, I cannot hesitate to make a declaration to that effect, and to order the payment of the 90*l.* a year by these trustees to those persons who by law are entitled to receive them.

Excise licence—Wine and spirits—Orders taken at unlicensed premises—Bond fide traveller—6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 10; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 17.

The appellants carried on business under proper licences as wine and spirit merchants at Worcester, and were also duly licensed with another partner to deal in beer at Cheltenham. A person who was formerly the appellants' traveller rented in his own name the rooms which were entered at Cheltenham by the appellants as their premises for storing and dealing in beer, and he was resouped by the appellants for the rent. The appellants' name and description, as wine and spirit merchants at Worcester, appeared upon the window blinds and inside the rooms; and orders were received there for wines and spirits, which were transmitted to and carried out by the appellants at Worcester. No wines nor spirits were ever kept upon the Cheltenham premises, and the appellants had no licence to deal in wines or spirits there.

The appellants were convicted under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 10, of retailing spirits at Cheltenham without a licence, and under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 17, of selling wine without a licence at the same place.

Held, upon a case stated, that this was not the case of a bond fide traveller taking orders for goods which his employer is duly licensed to deal in or sell, within the proviso to the 17th section of the latter Act; and that the appellants were rightly convicted.

THIS was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the Cheltenham division of the county of Gloucester, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the High Court of Justice on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated:—

1. At a petty sessions held at Cheltenham on the 15th March 1877, an information which had been laid by William Henry Marks one of Her Majesty's officers of excise (hereinafter called the respondent), against Josiah Stallard, William Stallard, and Josiah Valentine Stallard (hereinafter called the appellants), setting forth that the appellants then and there being persons retailing the goods and commodities, to wit, spirits, thereinafter mentioned, for the retailing of which goods and commodities a licence was then and there required by the statute in that case made and provided, and being retailers of spirits (but not being retailers of spirits in Ireland), between the 1st and 5th Jan. last, at Cheltenham aforesaid, did retail certain spirits, to wit, one gallon of whisky, without taking out such licence as in that behalf was and is required by the statute in that case made and provided; and further that the appellants, after the passing of a certain Act of Parliament in the year 1860 intituled "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain duties on wine licences and refreshment houses, and for regulating the licensing of refreshment houses and the granting of wine licences," between the 1st and 5th Jan. last at Cheltenham aforesaid, did sell certain wines by retail, to wit, three quarts of sherry and three quarts of port, without having a proper licence in force authorising them in that behalf, contrary to the form of the said Act, was heard and determined by the justices, and upon such hearing the said justices convicted the appellants in the mitigated penalties of 12l. 10s. for retailing the spirits, and 5l. for retailing the wines without having taken out the requisite licences. And the appellants, being dissatisfied with this determination, as being erroneous in point of law, applied to the said justices within three days to state a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice, and the justices granted their application.

2. Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties.

3. The appellants have been in business as wine and spirit merchants for a great number of years, and at the times alleged in the information held at Worcester all the licences the law required for dealing in and retailing spirits and wines, but did not hold at Cheltenham licences to retail spirits or wines; though they, with their copartner in the beer trade, Richard Stallard, held a licence for dealing in beer at Cheltenham, and kept a stock of beer there.

4. In accordance with directions of the supervisor of Excise of the Cheltenham district (Gerald Fitzgibbon), an officer of the Inland Revenue, on the 2nd Jan. last, visited an office No. 54A, in Winchcomb-street, Cheltenham, and observed upon the premises a board set up with these words printed upon it: "Josiah Stallard and Sons, Distillers, Wine Merchants and Brewers, Worcester, Established 1808, Wine Merchants to the Queen." Upon the window blind were printed also these words: "Established 1808, Stallard and Sons, Distillers, Wine Merchants and Brewers, Worcester." Mr. Fitzgibbon ordered of Mr. Dredge (whom he saw in the office, and whom he described in his examination as clerk or traveller) one gallon of whisky, three bottles of port, and three bottles of sherry, for which he paid him 33s., and took his receipt. Mr. Dredge stated that the goods would be supplied from Worcester, and having taken Mr. Fitzgibbon's name and address sent the order in due course to the appellants' place of business at Worcester.

5. In a day or two afterwards a jar containing the gallon of whisky and a case containing the three bottles of port and three bottles of sherry, were sent by railway from Worcester to Mr. Fitzgibbon's address in Cheltenham, and on the day the goods were forwarded from Worcester an invoice made out in the appellants' names was also sent him by post from Worcester.

6. Mr. Dredge stated in his evidence that he resided at Cotswold-terrace, in Cheltenham, and was a traveller in the employ of the appellants, and worked the Cheltenham district, and that his sole employment was to receive orders for the appellants to be executed at Worcester; that at first he used to drive about for orders, and has never given up doing so, but in September last year, for convenience, he took in his own name, as yearly tenant, two rooms, being the office before adverted to, No. 54A, in Winchcomb-street, and the beer store adjoining, for which he has since paid the rent, and the receipts are made out in his name, but he is reimbursed in the shape of expenses; that no stock of wine or spirits has at any time been kept upon the premises, but the appellants, with their copartner in the beer trade, Richard Stallard, hold an excise lice for storing or keeping beer there.

7. On the 16th of last Nov. the appellants and the said Richard Stallard, in the Excise official paper they signed, making entry of these premises for the purpose of storing and keeping beer for dealing, described themselves as of No. 54A, Winchcomb-street, Cheltenham, and being dealers in beer; and the said premises so entered by the appellants and the said Richard Stallard for storing beer there, were the same premises in which the said order for wines and spirits was taken, and were held under one and the same agreement at one gross rent for the whole, which rent was paid by Mr. Dredge, and repaid to him as expenses.

8. The appellants contended that the premises, 54A, in Winchcomb-street, were rented by Mr. Dredge on his own account as a convenient place to take orders, and were not used for retailing spirits or wines, and that no spirits or wines ever were stored or kept in them, and that, although he is reconped the rent and any other payments he may make, the reimbursement is in the nature of expenses which he is entitled to receive in addition to his commission, and does not make the premises the appellants'; that Mr. Dredge was the bonâ fide traveller of the appellants in the Cheltenham district, as he carried on his business as such in these stationary premises, as well as by calling at places to obtain orders; that the transaction with Mr. Dredge was an order for the spirits and wines, which he did not execute, but sent to Worcester to be executed there by the appellants, and that the goods were sent direct from Worcester to the purchaser; that the appellants do not carry on their spirits or wine businesses in any other place than Worcester, and have not retailed any spirits or wines in Cheltenham.

9. The respondent contended that the premises, No. 54A, Winchoomb-street, were premises occupied and used by the appellants for retailing wines and spirits, that the sale of the whisky, and sherry and port wines there by Mr. Dredge to Mr. Fitzgibbon was perfect and complete, and amounted in law to a retailing of these spirits and wines by the appellants.

The question for the opinion of this court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the justice were right in convicting the appellants.

Feb. 21.—Forbes argued for the appellants, and C. Bowen for the respondent.

The arguments and the enactments relating thereto sufficiently appear in the considered judgment of the court.

Our. adv. vult.

May 13.—MANISTY, J. delivered the judgment of COCKBURN, C.J. and himself.—This was an appeal against a conviction of the appellants for retailing spirits in Cheltenham without having a retail dealer's excise licence. The appellants carried on business as wine and spirit merchants in Worcester, and held all the licences the law required for dealing and retailing spirits and wines there; but they did not hold a licence to retail spirits at Cheltenham, though they with their copartner in the beer trade (Richard Stallard) held a licence for dealing in beer at Cheltenham, and kept a stock of beer there. The justices convicted the appellants for retailing spirits in Cheltenham without having taken out the proper excise licence, and the question is, whether upon the facts proved before them they were right in so doing. The case was argued before the Lord Chief Justice and myself on the 21st Feb. last, and we took time to look into the Acts of Parliament to which our attention was called; and having done so, we are of opinion that the conviction was right. By sect. 2 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, every retailer of spirits in England is required to take out an excise licence. By sect. 10 of that Act it is enacted that "no one licence taken out under or by authority of this Act by any person or persons except auctioneers and maltsters shall authorise or empower such person or persons to exercise or carry on the trade or business mentioned in such licence in more than one separate and distinct set of premises, such premises being all adjoining or contiguous to each other, and situate in one place and held together for the same trade or business, and of which he, she, or they shall have made lawful entry to exercise or carry on therein his, her, or their trade or business as aforesaid at the time of granting such licence, but that a separate and distinct licence shall be taken out by all and every such person or persons as aforesaid, except as aforesaid to exercise or carry on his, her, or their trade or business as aforesaid, at or in any other or different premises than as before mentioned." By the 17th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, it is enacted: "If any person shall solicit, take, or receive any order for spirits, wine, or other article, for the dealing in, retailing, or selling whereof an excise licence is by law required, without having in force a proper excise licence authorising him so to do, he shall forfeit the penalty imposed by law upon a person dealing in, retailing, or selling such article without having an excise licence in force authorising him so to do; and in any case in which the place of business or residence of the offender shall not be known to the officer of excise who shall exhibit any information for the recovery of such penalty as aforesaid, or if known shall be out of the United Kingdom, it shall be sufficient service of the notice and summons required to be given to a defendant by any law of excise if the same be left at the house or place where the offender shall have solicited, taken, or received any such order as aforesaid, addressed to such offender: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to apply to the sale of any spirits or foreign wine, while the same shall be and remain in the warehouse or warehouses in which the same shall have been deposited, lodged, or secured according to the law, before payment of duty upon the importation thereof, where such spirits or foreign wine shall be sold in a quantity not less than 100 gallons at one time; or to impose a penalty upon a bond fide traveller taking orders for goods which his employer is duly licensed to deal in or sell." The information in the present case was laid for retailing spirits in Cheltenham without a licence contrary to the provisions of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, and not for taking an order for spirits contrary to the provisions of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, but this latter statute was relied upon on behalf of the appellants, and it was contended that they did not carry on the business of retail dealers in spirits at 54A, Winchoomb-street, Cheltenham, that the transaction in question was simply a taking of an order for spirits by a Mr. Dredge as their bond fide traveller in the Cheltenham district; and that the order was executed by the appellants at Worcester. If that contention were well founded, the appellants incurred no penalty, but we think it is not. The facts are stated at length in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the case, but may be shortly stated thus:—Premises known as 54A, Winchoomb-street, Cheltenham, were let to Mr. Dredge, who was a traveller in the employment of the appellants, and took orders for them in a district called the Cheltenham district. These premises were occupied by him for the use of the appellants. They recouped him the rent which he paid to the landlord. They entered the premises as their own for the purpose of storing and keeping of beer (see par. 6 of case); they took out a licence for the purpose of carrying on there the business of dealers in beer; they printed their name and description upon the premises. Mr. Dredge, acting for the appellants, took orders for spirits at 54A, Winchoomb-street, Cheltenham, and transmitted the orders to Worcester, and the appellants executed them by sending the spirits from Worcester. In other words, the appellants by their agent Dredge sold spirits by retail at 54A, Winchoomb-street, Cheltenham. We are of opinion that upon these facts the justices were justified in convicting the appellants. We think that, if a person takes a house or part of a house either in his own name or the name of any other person, and there either personally or by his agent makes sales of spirits by retail, he carries on business there as a retailer of spirits, notwithstanding he keeps no spirits there, and the spirits which he sells there are (as in the present case) kept in and delivered from a store in another town where he has a store and carries on the business

POWELL (app.) v. KNIGHT (resp.) (a)

Cruelty to animals—Lawfully shooting a dog—Leaving it to die in pain—No offence—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2.

The appellant had been convicted by a stipendiary magistrate under sect. 2 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, of ill-treating and torturing, and causing to be cruelly ill-treated and tortured, a dog.

The appellant had shot, with a bullet from a pistol, through the eye a neighbour's dog, which was trespassing in his garden, and the magistrate assumed for the purposes of this case that the shooting the dog was lawful. The appellant immediately gave notice of what he had done to the owner of the dog and to a policeman, and dragged the dog into the road. When in the road he found for the first time that the dog was not dead, but was in pain; he however left it in the road, and, although desired to do so by the policeman, refused to cause it to be killed. It died some hours afterwards in great pain, and the defendant knew when he left it that it could not survive its wound, and that death only could put an end to its pain.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant had not been guilty of any offence within the Act; and that the conviction was wrong.

This was a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate, in pursuance of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions held at the police court, Wandsworth, in the county of Surrey, and within the metropolitan police district, on the 15th March 1878, one Edward J. Powell, the above-named defendant, was charged upon a certain information or complaint made by Edmund Knight, an officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, "for that the defendant did ill-treat and torture, and cause to be cruelly ill-treated and tortured, a dog, contrary to the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92."

At the hearing of the said information it was proved that the defendant, about nine o'clock in the evening on the day of 1878, found in his garden a large retriever dog, the property of Fitzgerald O'Brien, who lives at No. 58, Garden-road, Clapham, within three doors of the defendant, who lives at No. 64 in the same road, and the defendant then shot the dog with a pistol. The owner of the dog had at the time of the hearing of the information commenced an action against the defendant for the value of the dog. Whether the defendant had or had not a right under the circumstances to shoot the dog was raised, but was not determined, as the magistrate convicted the defendant for conduct subsequent to the shooting hereinafter set forth; and it is to be assumed for the purposes of the case that the shooting the dog was lawful.

The dog was shot by a bullet through the eye, and on being shot fell on the ground at the defendant's kitchen door, which was some yards distant from the road.

The defendant, after shooting the dog, went immediately to the house of the owner of the dog and told him that he thought he had shot his dog; the defendant and the owner then went to where the dog was, and both thought the dog was dead.

The defendant then sent for a policeman, and on his arrival took the dog by the collar to drag him into the road; the dog appeared to be dead, and the defendant believed that it was dead; but as the defendant was dragging it into the road the dog showed signs of life; after dragging the dog into the road, which he did in the presence of the owner of the dog, the dog gave evident signs of life, and the defendant then became aware that the dog was alive and in pain; the defendant then left the dog in the road, saying to the owner of it, "I do not think it is dead, if you like to look after it." The owner of the dog replied, "You shot it, you must see to it," or words to that effect; the defendant went indoors.

About an hour afterwards, that is, between ten and eleven, another constable found the dog in the road still alive, and went and knocked at the defendant's door and called his attention to the fact that the dog was still alive. The defendant refused to come out, and did not kill the dog or cause it to be killed. The injury to the dog was such that it would sooner or later have caused death, and would, until death ensued from it, cause great pain, and the only mode to stop the pain was to kill the dog; and the defendant knew the extent and nature of the injury when he left the dog in the road.

The dog remained lying in the road until about three o'clock in the morning, when it was found in the same place in the road by another policeman in great agony, shown by its howling and bodily movements, and the policeman then killed it. The howling had then been going on for some time in the road nearly opposite the defendant's house.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant, that as the magistrate assumed for the purpose of this case that the original shooting of the dog was lawful, the not killing the dog afterwards, or seeing that it was killed, was merely an act of omission, and was not an offence within the statute.

The magistrate thought that, as the wound from which the dog suffered was caused by the defendant, the torture caused by that wound, when it was allowed to continue, continued as an act of the defendant, and was evidence of an offence within the statute; and if there was evidence, he thought the offence had been committed.

He accordingly convicted the defendant, and fined him 5*l.* and 2*s.* costs.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the conviction was legal.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the conviction was to stand; if in the negative, the conviction was to be quashed.

332); there a mare with a swollen hoof was allowed by the owner to remain alive in a field, although he was told that the animal was incurable, and in pain. Kelly, C.B.; whilst holding that proceeding of itself to be no offence, said: "I think, however, under all the circumstances of the case, that the real question which the magistrates ought to have considered is this, whether the owner, by turning the mare into a field where she could only feed by moving about and suffering intense torture, did not cause and procure her to be tortured within the meaning of the Act." An exactly similar question of fact has here been determined by the magistrate against the appellant, and it may be accurately said, upon these facts, that he caused or procured this dog to be tortured.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that to justify a conviction under this statute the torture of the animal must have been caused intentionally. Here it is to be taken upon the magistrate's finding that the dog was shot justifiably. The defendant thought he had killed the dog, and dragged it into the road merely for the purpose of removing the dead body off his premises. It was when the dog was in the road the defendant found that it was not dead; any man of common humanity, and not made of the hardest materials, would then have immediately put an end to the animal. Passively it was inhuman cruelty to do otherwise; but passive cruelty of that kind is not, in my opinion, an offence provided for by the statute. There was no intentional infliction of pain after firing the shot which is to be taken as lawful. However much we may desire to punish such an act, as the statute does not provide for it, we cannot assume the functions of the Legislature. I do not see why such an act of passive cruelty should not be made an offence punishable in the same way as active torture, but that can be done only by the Legislature.

MELLOR, J.—The shooting not being unlawful, the act of torture is not in this case anything done by the defendant. The words of the 2nd section touch only a person who actually tortures an animal or causes or procures it to be tortured. The appellant's only act which in any way caused the torture in this case is expressly found to have been legal.

NUTTER v. ACCRINGTON LOCAL BOARD. (a)

Local board—Power to raise level of turnpike road —Liability for compensation by arbitration—Maintenance of footway only—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 68, 144—21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 41.

The defendants, by agreement with the trustees of a turnpike road which they were liable to repair, resolved to take upon themselves the maintenance and repairs of the footway only of this road; the defendants afterwards raised the level of this footway and thereby caused damage to the plaintiff, whose house and land were adjacent.

The plaintiff took proceedings to obtain compensation for this damage under sect. 144 of the Public Health Act 1848, and was awarded a substantial amount and costs.

Held, in an action upon the award, that sect. 41 of the Local Government Act 1858 does not empower a local board to take upon themselves the repair or alteration of a longitudinal section of a turnpike road; and that no damage done by a local board in repairing a turnpike road under that section can be compensated by arbitration under the Public Health Act 1848.

THE following case was stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the court in an action upon an award:—

1. The plaintiff was in Sept. 1864, and is now, the owner of a house and land in the town of Accrington, adjacent to a certain road called the Whalley-road.

2. The defendants became in 1857 the local board of health, and are the urban sanitary authority for the town and district of Accrington under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848 and the other Acts therewith incorporated.

3. The house and land of the plaintiff, and that part of the Whalley-road adjacent thereto, are within the district of the said local board.

4. By Act of Parliament of the twenty-ninth year of George III. a turnpike trust was established which included the Whalley-road, part of which was within and some part without the district of the Accrington Local Board; and such trust expired in 1874, up to which time toll-gates were maintained, and tolls taken at various parts of the road.

5. There has always, for fifty years at least, been a footway immediately adjacent to the plaintiff's premises, and previous to the establishment of the local board the turnpike trustees had maintained, and from time to time repaired, the footway and the carriage way, both within and without the local board district, with the exception of the pavement within the local board district. The carriage way adjacent to plaintiff's property had not been paved at the time the footway was raised as hereinafter set forth.

6. After the establishment of a local board, and previous to the year 1871, by agreement between the local board and the turnpike trustees, the local board sometimes provided curbstones for the footpath of such part of the Whalley-road as was within their district, and the trustees put them in; and the trustees did everything that was done for the maintenance and repair of the carriage way.

7. In the year 1864 the trustees communicated to the defendants their intention of erecting a toll-bar in another turnpike road in the township of Accrington subject to the same trust; and afterwards in Feb. 1865 the defendants, in order to induce the trustees not to erect such toll-bar, passed the following resolution, which was in due course communicated to the trustees and accepted by them:

Resolved that the proposal made to a deputation from this board by the trustees of the turnpike road at their meeting of Sept. 15th last to the following effect, "That the local board should take upon themselves the future repair of such parts of the turnpike road within their district as are already or may be hereafter pitched with stone, and all such parts of the footpath as are already or may hereafter be flagged at least a yard in width, and that other parts of the road and footpaths shall continue to be repaired by the trust," be accepted by this board.

NUTTER v. ACCRINGTON LOCAL BOARD.

[Q.B. Div.]

8. That part of the footpath immediately adjoining the plaintiff's land was flagged more than a yard in width previous to 1864.

9. Previous to 1871 a further agreement had been entered into between the local board and the trustees, whereby, among other things, the trustees undertook to raise the level of the carriage way at a part of the road immediately opposite the house and land of the plaintiff; and the defendants on their part undertook to raise the footpath to a corresponding height.

10. In or about the month of May 1871, in execution of the last-mentioned agreement, the trustees raised the level of the carriage way opposite to the plaintiff's house and land; and the defendants raised the footpath to a corresponding height.

11. The plaintiff sustained damage within the meaning of sect. 144 of the Public Health Act 1848, by the raising of the footway by the defendants, and such damage was the necessary and direct result of the raising of the footpath, and not of any negligence of the defendants in the execution of the work.

12. In Oct. 1874 proceedings against the defendants were commenced by the plaintiff to obtain compensation under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, and, after all due preliminaries required by the Act were performed, were carried on ex parte by the plaintiff, and on the 19th Jan. 1875 an award was published whereby the defendants were ordered to pay to plaintiff 112*l.* compensation for the damage she had sustained, and a further sum of 111*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* taxed costs.

13. The said award was in all respects a good and valid award, provided that the damage sustained by the plaintiff was a proper subject for arbitration and compensation within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1848, and the other Acts therewith incorporated.

14. Neither of the sums of 112*l.* and 111*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* have been paid by the defendants to the plaintiff.

15. That part of the Whalley-road which is adjacent to plaintiff's house and land was at the time the footpath was raised as herein mentioned, and is, "a street," unless the court find (1) that: was a turnpike road; and (2) rule as a matter of law that a turnpike road is excepted from the definition of street within the true intent and meaning of the Public Health Act 1848 and other Acts incorporated therewith.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether the claim of the plaintiff was a claim within the true intent and meaning of the Public Health Act 1848, and other Acts incorporated therewith. And (2) whether the arbitrator had authority to make such award, and whether the said award is good and binding upon the defendants.

The court to direct for whom judgment is to be entered with the costs of the cause and special case, unless upon application made on the hearing for good cause shown the court shall otherwise order.
